There are also thousands of hours of recordings from his Fox News show and radio show for opposition researchers, including those in the GOP, to scour. He was perhaps the most prominent national Republican figure to rally to Todd Akin’s defense in 2012 after the national party abandoned him over his comments about “legitimate rape.”

“He’s said a lot that hasn’t been scrutinized,” said Rollins, his former adviser.

One of the things often missing in stories about Huckabee is how central the economic populism is to his message. He’s best known for provocative comments on gay marriage, abortion and social issues. But he’s trying to broaden his base of support beyond born-again evangelicals.

“The narrative that I was almost like a monolithic candidate for the evangelicals was never the accurate reality,” he said in the interview. “If I had been, I probably would have been the nominee” in 2008.

Huckabee is critical of “trickle-down economics,” as he calls it, using the parlance of the left. His willingness to raise taxes as governor has made him an enemy of the Club for Growth and other conservative groups. He is also against fast track and wants more safeguards in the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal.

For his part, Huckabe e points out that he presciently warned about how fundamentally unsound the economy was throughout the 2008 primaries. “The Wall Street Journal ripped me a new one after the September 2007, Dearborn, Michigan, debate,” he said. “A year later, I was absolutely vindicated in what I said.”

Rand Paul, Finally, To Open That Office in Silicon Valley // National Journal // Shane Goldmacher - May 5, 2015

May 4, 2015 It was almost eight months ago, on a swing through California, when Sen. Rand Paul declared he would open an office in Silicon Valley to tap into the brains and big bucks of the tech industry.

"There's a lot of smart people in Silicon Valley," Paul told the San Francisco Chronicle in September, "and we want to use their brains to figure out how to win."

His proclamation spurred an avalanche of news stories, think pieces, and analyses—about how Paul was a different kind of Republican, about how he was appealing to the next generation, about the potential for a libertarian-tech alliance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The problem: For the past eight months, no such Rand Paul outpost actually existed.

That's about to change. As Paul returns to the San Francisco Bay Area this weekend for the first time in 2015, he plans to formally open an office there, his spokesman Sergio Gor confirmed.

To be fair, Paul didn't promise when, exactly, the Silicon Valley office would be opening last year. "We're in the process of it," he told the Chronicle at the time. But since then, the Kentucky Republican has set up an office in Austin, the Texas tech hub where his digital strategist Vincent Harris is based, and launched his presidential bid.

Paul has one public event on his San Francisco schedule so far, appearing at a "disrupting democracy" conversation with Lincoln Labs, a Republican-leaning tech group. Paul also has fundraising meetings scheduled in the donor-rich region.

The power players behind Carly Fiorina's campaign // POLITICO // Katie Glueck - May 4, 2015

Carly Fiorina, the former head of Hewlett-Packard, is the only female Republican candidate in the 2016 presidential race.

Fiorina is running on a combination of her business background and a disdain for “crony capitalism.” She’s also embracing her outsider status and is playing up a reputation she has recently cultivated as the GOP field’s most frequent and tough critic of Hillary Clinton.

Fiorina, who has never held elected office and struggles with name identification, faces an uphill battle for the nomination. But she has hired several well-respected operatives to help her political efforts. Her super PAC, Carly for America, had a fairly full staff at the time of her announcement, while her campaign staff is still expanding.

Here’s a look at key players so far in Fiorina’s orbit:

• Frank Sadler will be campaign manager. Sadler, who at one time worked at Koch Industries, also recently worked at the public affairs firm Cove Strategies, where American Conservative Union chairman Matt Schlapp is a principal.

• Sarah Isgur Flores will be deputy campaign manager. Flores is a well-regarded GOP operative who most recently worked at the Republican National Committee as deputy communications director.

• Anna Epstein will serve as a spokeswoman. Epstein also previously worked at the RNC.

• Amy Noone Frederick is senior adviser for strategy and outreach. Frederick, a GOP consultant, was most recently head of the 60 Plus organization, a senior citizens-focused group.

• Lauren Carney, a longtime GOP consultant, is aiding Fiorina’s efforts in the Granite State from the campaign side. She and her husband, GOP strategist Dave Carney, are well-regarded in New Hampshire and have a consulting firm together.

• Steve DeMaura is executive director of Carly for America, the super PAC boosting Fiorina’s bid. DeMaura is president of Americans for Job Security, a pro-business outside group.

• Tom Szold is political director of the super PAC and is expected to remain there. He has New Hampshire knowledge after managing the unsuccessful campaign of congressional candidate Marilinda Garcia, who has endorsed Fiorina — and he also worked for the RNC in Iowa.

• Kerry Marsh is New Hampshire state director for the super PAC. She held the same position for former Texas

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gov. Rick Perry's 2012 presidential campaign, and is also the chairwoman of the Concord City Republican Committee. Bettie Lamontagne, a conservative activist in the Granite State, is also backing Fiorina (her husband, Ovide, was the 2012 GOP nominee for governor. Both were influential hosts on the 2012 presidential circuit in the Granite State) but isn't expected to be on staff.

• Mary Earnhardt is Iowa state director for the super PAC. The GOP consultant is a veteran of Iowa statehouse politics.

• Katie Hughes is communications director at Carly for America. She is a senior account executive at CRC Public Relations, a conservative firm. Leslie Shedd, who previously worked for the Georgia GOP and on Capitol Hill, is press secretary.

• Greg Mueller is a senior communications adviser to the super PAC. He is president of CRC Public Relations.

• Keith Appell, also of CRC and a longtime conservative operative, is also senior communications adviser to the super PAC. He is a senior vice president at the firm.

Carly Fiorina Says She Would 'Roll Back' Net Neutrality Rules // TIME // Charlotte Alter – May 5, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina speaks at TechCrunchÕs Disrupt conference on May 5, 2015 in New York City.

Andrew Burton—Getty Images Republican presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina speaks at TechCrunchÕs Disrupt conference on May 5, 2015 in New York City.

And she wants the government to use technology to "re-engage" people

Carly Fiorina said Tuesday in her first public appearance since announcing her candidacy for the GOP nomination that she would "roll back" the new rules on net neutrality.

The former Hewlett-Packard CEO, arguably the presidential candidate with the most experience in the tech industry, came out swinging against the regulations in a talk at TechCrunch's Disrupt event in New York City. "You don't manage innovation, you let innovation flourish," she said. "Regulation over innovation is a really bad role for government."

Other Republican hopefuls have also come out in recent months against net neutrality—or the idea that all web content is treated equally—perhaps in opposition to Obama or in order to protect campaign donations, despite the fact that 85% of Republican voters say they oppose the creation of Internet "fast lanes."

At other points during the talk, Fiorina pointed to her experience in the tech industry as a qualification for the Oval Office. "It is important to have someone in the White House who has a fundamental understanding of technology, and a fundamental vision of how technology could be used," she said, adding that she hopes to use technology to "re-engage" people in politics.

Fiorina also addressed the industry's inequalities for women, noting that they are "caricatured differently, criticized differently, scrutinized differently, because we're still different." To that end, she noted that she was pleased Hillary Clinton is also running for the Democratic nomination. "Obviously I'm running to beat Hillary Clinton, but I think It's great there there are women on both sides of the aisle running for the highest office in the land."

When the interviewer, a female journalist, asked Fiorina if she would consider a Vice Presidential slot, she bristled and replied: "Would you ever ask a man that question?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the past, male presidential candidates like former North Carolina Senator John Edwards and former New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson have been asked whether they're running for VP, and the idea has also been posed for former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, a presumed Democratic candidate. After the journalist responded that she would, the candidate said, "I'm not running for something else, I'm running because I want this job, and I think I can do this job."

Fiorina: Clinton "pandering" on immigration // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – May 5, 2015

Washington (CNN)Presidential candidate Carly Fiorina said on Tuesday that Hillary Clinton was "pandering" in her plan to go further than President Barack Obama on immigration policy.

Fiorina, a Republican businesswoman who has emerged as one of the harshest critics of Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee, said she first wants to see a more secure border. Fiorina also said she would also support a "path to legal status" for the 11 million undocumented immigrants currently in the United States -- but only after the legal immigration system was fixed.

"The people who worked hard to earn citizenship the right way are totally committed to this country," Fiorina told CNN's Erin Burnett immediately after Clinton spoke extensively about her own immigration platform in Las Vegas. "I think it isn't fair to say to people who've worked hard to earn the privilege of citizenship that 'Never mind. Never mind that you played by the rules. People who didn't get to have the same privileges that you do'."

Fiorina, the only female candidate in the Republican field, also swatted away the notion that her general election argument would center only on her common gender with Clinton, though she acknowledged that would neutralize one potential Clinton attack.

Carly Fiorina's political career

Carly Fiorina's political career 15 photos

Instead, she pointed to her tenure as chief executive at Hewlett-Packard, saying that experience distinguished her from the "professional political class."

But her record there is not all rosy. Fiorina was eventually forced out as CEO, and she oversaw 30,000 job losses as head of the tech giant.

"The only way you succeed as a technology company is by leading, not by lagging," Fiorina said, striking back at unflattering media coverage of her ouster and pointing to less covered parts of her accomplishments. And, she added, she took no pleasure in any of those firings.

"The worst thing a CEO can do is to have to say to someone, 'You don't have a job,'" she said. "Everyone had to manage through tough times. And I think that's honestly what distinguishes leadership."

She also weighed in on the attack in Garland, Texas, this week at an event showcasing controversial cartoons of Mohammed.

"It clearly was provocative, just like white supremacists demonstrating is provocative," Fiorina said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She offered praise for how Obama characterized the gathering that provoked the violence.

"I'm very pleased that the President came out and called this what it is, which is an attempted act of terror," Fiorina said.

Marco Rubio to raise cash in Bellevue Thursday // Seattle Times // Jim Brunner – May 5, 2015

Republican 2016 presidential candidate Marco Rubio will raise campaign cash Thursday in Bellevue.

Rubio, a U.S. Senator from Florida, plans to attend a 3:30 p.m. round-table discussion that will cost donors $2,700 per person or $5,400 per couple — followed by a reception at $1,000 per person. The events are to be held at Steelhead Partners, a Bellevue investment firm, according to a copy of the invitation. Hosts include the firm's co-founder, Brian Klein, former state GOP chair Diane Tebelius, and local venture capitalist Matt McIlwain.

No public events have been announced and organizers did not immediately respond to requests for more details.

Rubio's visit follows a similar low-key, money-raising stopover by a man who was his political mentor, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who also is traveling the country to raise money for 2016 presidential run — even though he has not declared as a candidate. Bush held a $12,500 per person fundraiser for his Right to Rise super PAC in Seattle last month.

Rubio, 43, entered the 2016 race last month, repeatedly calling for "a New American Century" in an effort to contrast himself with the dynasties represented by 2016 rivals, including Bush and Democrat Hillary Clinton. Bush and Rubio topped a crowd of declared or likely GOP presidential contenders in a recent NBC News / Wall Street Journal poll of Republican primary voters.

While he's not well known in Washington state, a Rubio presidency could spell trouble for the state's legalized marijuana system, if his recent comments are any indication.

In an interview last month with conservative talk show host Hugh Hewitt, Rubio was asked about Washington and Colorado's legalized marijuana systems. Hewitt asked whether Rubio would "enforce the federal drug laws and shut down the marijuana trade?"

According to a transcript of the interview, Rubio responded: "Yes. Yes, I think, well, I think we need to enforce our federal laws. Now do states have a right to do what they want? They don't agree with it, but they have their rights. But they don't have a right to write federal policy as well. It is, I don't believe we should be in the business of legalizing additional intoxicants in this country for the primary reason that when you legalize something, what you're sending a message to young people is it can't be that bad, because if it was that bad, it wouldn't be legal."

Marco Rubio says the United States is not modernizing its nuclear weapons // Politifact // Amy Sherman – May 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., argues that the United States needs to do more to beef up its military to face down evil.

Speaking at the Iowa Faith and Freedom summit on April 25, Rubio said that threats worldwide "require strong American leadership, which we cannot exert as long as we eviscerate military spending, which is what we are doing now. We are placing our nation at a dangerous position."

Then he said this about the country's nuclear stockpiles: "We are the only nation that is not modernizing its nuclear weapons."

We wanted to know whether Rubio was correct that the United States isn't modernizing its nuclear weapons, so we consulted with experts on U.S. nuclear policy. (We reached out to Rubio's presidential campaign and Senate office and did not get a response.)

Modernizing nuclear weapons

Multiple experts told us that Rubio's claim about nuclear weapons is wrong because ongoing and planned nuclear modernization efforts are extensive. The United States has been spending billions modernizing nuclear equipment -- and has plans to continue to do so.

The National Nuclear Security Administration's March 2015 report to Congress details plans to modernize nuclear equipment including various warheads over the coming years. A Congressional Research Service Report issued the same month covered similar topics.

Modernization is happening for many different types of nuclear programs, said Matthew Bunn, an expert on nuclear proliferation and a professor Harvard University. (During the 1990s, Bunn was adviser to the White House's Office of Science and Technology Policy.)

"First, while we haven't deployed major new strategic systems in some time, we've been modernizing the ones we've got more or less continuously — new rocket motors and guidance systems for the Minuteman missiles, lots of rebuilt parts for the B-52s, etc., etc. We're in the middle of a $10 billion modernization of the B-61 bomb," Bunn said.

These modernization plans are not cheap. The Congressional Budget Office estimated in January that the administration's plans for nuclear forces would cost $348 billion over the next decade. During the next three decades, the cost to maintain the nuclear arsenal and purchase replacement systems could rise to more than $1 trillion, according to a 2014 report by the The James Martin Center for Nonproliferation Studies.

The size of the U.S. stockpile has been declining since the 1960s and will decline further under the new START Treaty agreed to with Russia in 2011. But nuclear weapons can "live" for a long time. Several nuclear weapons introduced or upgraded in the 1990s or 2000s can be used for another 20 to 30 years, said Hans Kristensen, director of the Nuclear Information Project at the Federation of American Scientists. (Kristensen pointed to several upgrades in recent decades.)

One analyst we spoke with had concerns that the upgrades aren't happening fast enough. Tom Donnelly, a defense policy analyst at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, told PolitiFact that "we are not really modernizing our nukes very seriously" and that some projects are years -- even decades -- away and could could fall prey to budget cuts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Benjamin Friedman, an expert at the libertarian Cato Institute, said that even if some modernization plans were canceled, "we would still be modernizing our nuclear arsenal or our nuclear weapons, just less of them. So any normal definition of ‘modernize,’ describes what the United States is doing with its nuclear weapons."

Rubio compared the United States to the rest of the world without naming any other countries when he said "we are the only nation that is not modernizing its nuclear weapons."

Rubio said that the United States was "the only nation" not modernizing its weapons, but Bunn, the Harvard professor, said comparing the United States on that basis with other countries is misleading. China, for example, is modernizing its arsenal, but its arsenal is also far smaller. The United States and Russia have over 90 percent of the world’s nuclear weapons, he said.

"So I would say: (a) not true that we haven’t been modernizing at all; (b) IS (mostly) true that we haven’t bought any big new strategic delivery systems lately; (c) highly misleading not to mention that all nuclear powers other than ourselves and Russia have tiny nuclear arsenals compared to ours," Bunn said.

Our ruling

Rubio said that the United States "is not modernizing its nuclear weapons."

Most of the experts we interviewed disputed Rubio’s statement. While the United States has reduced the number of warheads, it has also been modernizing nuclear equipment and has plans to continue to do so.

We rate this claim False.

Clinton Cash author: I like Marco Rubio // POLITICO // Nick Gass - May 5, 2015

Enough with the doom-and-gloom candidates, says author Peter Schweizer.

There needs to be optimism in the race for the White House, the “Clinton Cash” author told POLITICO’s Glenn Thrush in an hour-long interview ahead of his May 5 book launch, noting that he always liked President Ronald Reagan’s upbeat messaging.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio would seem to fit the bill this time around, he said.

Schweizer, who makes his home in Tallahassee, is also probing the finances of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

“If your basic position is ‘everything’s going to heck in a handbasket, we can’t do anything about it,’ that’s going to throw a lot of people off. So I do think the optimism will be there,” Schweizer said. “The question is: Is that optimism backed up by real boldness? Because if you aren’t an optimist and you feel like we are struggling or facing challenges, it’s bold change that’s going to be required.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You don’t want a grinder as president,” Schweizer said. “You don’t want somebody who’s doom and gloom.”

Regarding the Clintons, Schweizer says he has been talking to congressional investigators about his findings, both in the House and Senate, and broached the possibility of more interactions with Republican staff.

“I think you need to have congressional committees with subpoena power, and I think you need to have somebody with law-enforcement capability in power, either by DOJ or a federal prosecutor somewhere,” he added.

He also revealed details about his process and cast himself as the head of a sprawling Florida-based research team that he described as as an eccentric group of diggers, “Columbo”-type investigators and 30-something computer experts.

“I call them the Island of Misfit Toys, ‘cause we have all these different personalities,” he said. “We’ve got some people who have a background in hacking, they are not computer hackers now, but they can do research on the so-called deep web and find information that has not been sort of charted. It’s actually surprising how much information you can find, not going past a firewall doing anything illegal [but finding information] not catalogued by Google.”

The Clinton book was funded by specific conservative donors, but not the Koch brothers, with whom he has had a long-term collaborative relationship. “We have received funding from the Kochs in the past, not for this project, but on a project-by-project basis,” he told Thrush. “We have other donors that to varying degrees made this project possible.” He went on to talk about his association with New York-based donor Rebekah Mercer.

Schweizer also described his work for Sarah Palin’s PAC, saying he was drawn to her hawkish, assertive views on American foreign policy, but that he turned down her offer to go grizzly bear hunting in Alaska.

Schweizer’s book, “Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich,” hits shelves Tuesday.

Chris Christie's Other Problems // National Journal // Charlie Cook - May 5, 2015

There was a lot of talk last week about New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's presidential hopes suffering a mortal blow after two of his associates, including a former deputy chief of staff, were indicted on charges related to the "Bridgegate" matter, with a third pleading guilty. The only part I would quibble with is whether his hopes were still alive before the indictments or if they were, in fact, already dead for reasons mostly unrelated to the George Washington Bridge controversy.

For the first 10 months or so of last year, there were a lot of heavyweight Republicans, many of them big donors, urging Christie to run. They were disproportionately corporate chieftains and Wall Street folks, mostly from the greater New York City area, looking for an establishment-oriented Republican, one more conservative than not, but clearly not from either the tea party or the social, cultural, and evangelical wing of the GOP. The first choice for most of these folks was former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, but up until around Thanksgiving, the betting was that the son of one president and brother of another would pass up the race. The understanding was that certain members of his family were unenthusiastic about such a bid. In September and October, word from folks in Bush's orbit was that while it was still more likely that he would not run, the chances of him getting in were rising. Then around Thanksgiving that all changed, and it became increasingly clear that Bush was going to make the leap. Must have been something said over turkey and dressing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(RELATED: Bridgegate Is Back to Haunt Chris Christie's Potential 2016 Run)

From the time a Bush candidacy started looking more likely, the wind came out of Christie's presidential sails to the point when he was effectively dead in the water. It was mostly because Bush filled a void that Christie planned to fill in himself. The bridge mess was just icing on the cake.

Now things are rarely as simple as that. Christie's style was an acquired taste; I personally find the muscular moderate approach as interesting as it is rare. But it was never clear that the tough New Jersey-guy approach could sell in Iowa and other environs among those who aren't that into Philly cheesesteaks, Coney Island hot dogs, or more importantly, the politics of those who do love them.

Also hurting Christie has been the successful campaign launch of Sen. Marco Rubio, adding another attractive face to the center-right breed of Republicans. Curiously, Rubio ran for the Senate against the establishment, as a tea-party conservative. But since coming to the Senate, his approach has been much more conventional, and more into the space that Bush and Christie were occupying than the world of Sens. Ted Cruz and Rand Paul, or Dr. Ben Carson, who entered the race this week. There is room for a non-establishment candidate, someone who is conservative, but not overly so—not of the tea-party or social conservative ilk.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker enjoyed a meteoric rise to co-frontrunner status, but seems to have leveled off as Republicans wait to see if he can play at this level, if he has the dexterity to deal with tough questions from the media, opponents, and GOP primary voters, in some cases on subjects that he is not particularly well-versed. A number of cringe-worthy moments diminished some of the star power that Walker seemed to be developing.

News that Ohio Gov. John Kasich and Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder are leaning toward candidacies may further subdivide the non-tea party and social conservative space. Both governors' names were mentioned a lot early on but an—apparently erroneous—assumption built that if they weren't sending signals that they were running by February or March, they probably weren't going to run. If Walker were still going gangbusters, or Bush's nomination afait accompli, neither would be seriously considering the race.

Snyder is very much a blank slate among Republican activists and political reporters outside of Michigan; few seem to know what to make of him. The political world and business leaders in Ohio are buzzing about a spot-on article in the new issue of The Atlantic, "The Unpleasant Charisma of John Kasich." Though my dealings with Kasich, when he was in the House of Representatives and running for the GOP nomination briefly in 1999, were entirely pleasant, he has a real reputation for having a short fuse, not suffering fools gladly, and being unfocused and undisciplined. On paper, Kasich's candidacy makes all the sense in the world, but the question is whether those potential flaws get in the way.

The more conservative wing of the party certainly has its fights and divisions, but it is the center-right, establishment wing of the party that almost invariably wins the GOP nomination. Whoever emerges from the more ideological half of the party will have to demonstrate an elasticity, a potential for growth in support that has eluded all but Barry Goldwater in 1964.

But as far as Christie is concerned, he would be well advised to just say that the Bridgegate matter has become an unnecessary distraction that has made his candidacy untenable, even if the true reason is something else.

College Course Marco Rubio Teaches Prominently Features Hillary Clinton's Foreign Policy Guru // Daily Caller // Eric Owens - May 5, 2015

Florida senator, 2016 Republican presidential hopeful and all-around busy man Marco Rubio has been moonlighting — at least until very recently — as an adjunct professor on the Miami campus of Florida

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

International University.

A course syllabus obtained by The Daily Caller shows that one of the three books Rubio assigned in his “Contemporary International Politics” class was written by Joseph S. Nye, Jr., a former aide in the administrations of both Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton and the man who coined the term “smart power,” which Hillary Clinton has made the centerpiece of her foreign policy.

Nye’s 2011 book is entitled “The Future of Power.”

Rubio’s course description for “Contemporary International Politics,” describes the class as an exploration of the “challenges and opportunities that the United States faces” “in the post-Cold War world.” Is U.S. power “in decline?” What are the contemporary issues that are shaping American foreign policy?”

Clinton spoke about Nye’s theories of “smart power” during the 2009 Senate confirmation hearing prior to her appointment as President Barack Obama’s first secretary of state.

“I believe that American leadership has been wanting, but is still wanted,” Clinton told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. “We must use what has been called ‘smart power': the full range of tools at our disposal — diplomatic, economic, military, political, legal, and cultural — picking the right tool, or combination of tools, for each situation.”

“Smart power” means that military power must frequently take a backseat to negotiation, the ambitious former first lady explained.

“With smart power, diplomacy will be the vanguard of foreign policy,” Clinton told her former fellow senators. “This is not a radical idea. The ancient Roman poet Terence, who was born a slave and rose to become one of the great voices of his time, declared that ‘in every endeavor, the seemly course for wise men is to try persuasion first.’ The same truth binds wise women as well.”

Nye explained in a 2009 essay in Foreign Affairs that he created the term “smart power” to “counter the misperception that soft power alone can produce effective foreign policy.” The phrase means a combination of “both hard and soft power,” he wrote.

In her own book about herself, “Hard Choices,” Clinton elaborates on her use of “smart power.”

“Beyond the traditional work of negotiating treaties and attending diplomatic conferences, we had to — among other tasks — engage activists on social media, help determine energy pipeline routes, limit carbon emissions, encourage marginalized groups to participate in politics, stand up for universal human rights, and defend common economic rules of the road,” Clinton wrote. “This analysis led me to embrace a concept known as smart power, which had been kicking around Washington for a few years. Harvard’s Joseph Nye, Suzanne Nossel of Human Rights Watch, and a few others had used the term, although we all had in mind slightly different meanings.”

In 2011, Nye wrote a hagiographic paean about Clinton in Time magazine’s list of “the most influential people in the world.” Nye called Clinton “tough.” With an eerie, world-historical lack of foresight, he praised Clinton’s action in Libya by saying: “[W]hen Libya’s Muammar Gaddafi threatened to massacre civilians in Benghazi, she was key in building support in the U.N. for the multilateral military action that is helping to protect those civilians.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A little over a year later, Islamic militants attacked a U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, slaughtering an American ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and another American official.

Nye, the former dean of Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government, served in the Carter administration in two different foreign policy roles. From 1993 to 1995, he served in the State Department under Bill Clinton as Chairman of the National Intelligence Council and in another capacity as well.

The other two book Rubio assigns students in his FIU course are "The World America Made" by liberal interventionist foreign policy historian Robert Kagan and "No One's World: The West, the Rising Rest, and the Coming Global Turn" by Georgetown University School of Foreign Service professor Charles A. Kupchan.

Rand Paul's Donations Show His Small-Town Appeal // NYT – The Upshot // Derek Willis – May 5, 2015

Online fund-raising data from the first several weeks of Rand Paul's presidential campaign suggests that much of his initial small-dollar support has come from smaller cities and towns.

After starting his campaign on April 7 with a "Stand With Rand" online appeal, his campaign brought in its first $1 million in less than 30 hours, from more than 15,500 donations, according to data published on RandPaul.com and collected by The Upshot.

He has far to go to match the success of his father, Ron Paul, in collecting money over the Internet. The initial flurry for Rand Paul faded quickly. It took an additional 16 days for the figure to double.

Supporters of Ron Paul contributed $4 million in a single day in 2007, and in 2011 the elder Mr. Paul did a one-day "money bomb" online fund-raising effort that netted $1 million for his presidential campaign.

Although Rand Paul has received hundreds of contributions from donors in cities such as Houston, New York, Los Angeles and Phoenix, a disproportionate number have come from donors in smaller cities and towns. More than a quarter of Rand Paul's online donors list addresses in communities with populations of less than 10,000. According to the 2010 Census, about 15 percent of Americans lived in incorporated areas with populations of less than 10,000. That support reveals his appeal among rural donors (like those in his home state of Kentucky).

At least 21 contributions have come from donors listing an address of Cumming, Ga., which has a population of about 5,500, although places with a Cumming mailing address, in the Atlanta metropolitan area, have a population of around 100,000. At least 15 donations are from Magnolia, Tex., one for every 105 residents in the Houston suburb.

The two Pauls do share some of the same donor base: At least 2,000 of the donors to Rand Paul in April gave money to his father's 2012 campaign, an analysis of Federal Election Commission data shows; the number is very likely higher because many small-dollar contributors do not appear on F.E.C. filings.

The average donation recorded by the RandPaul.com site hovered around $60 during the first few weeks, although the site did not list the amount of each contribution, just the total number of donors and the total amount. That means that Rand Paul will be able to go back to many of these supporters during the primary season. Indeed, some of them have already given multiple times.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Beginning on April 7 and continuing through Sunday, The Upshot was able to collect records of more than 28,000 online contributors to Rand Paul. That data, which represents at least $2.6 million, doesn't include all of the contributions that the campaign has received (the campaign declined to release a total). In particular, it doesn't include high-dollar fund-raising events where donors typically provide a check. The Upshot was able to match more than 25,000 records with census data to obtain population figures.

Rand Paul started his campaign on April 7 with a "Stand With Rand" online appeal.

The data doesn't include all of the money that Rand Paul has raised online. The campaign briefly stopped showing donor information, and there were at least two periods of several hours each when The Upshot was unable to collect information.

Most of the individuals displayed on the site won't have their names recorded in F.E.C. filings, which require only disclosure of donors who give $200 or more in aggregate (the next filing deadline for most candidates is July 15).

Not all of the information displayed on RandPaul.com appears to reflect actual donors, suggesting that, despite moderating donor names, the site is showing the names of a few people who fill out donation forms even if they don't give money (or the transaction doesn't go through). On the first day, the site displayed the names of "Fake Fakerton of Fake Town, R.I." and "Hillary Clinton of Saint Clair Shores, Mich.," among others.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Passing budgets and modest bills, Congress slowly increases productivity // Washington Post // Paul Kane – May 6, 2015

For just the first time in six years, Congress gave final approval to its annual budget resolution Tuesday — the latest in a slow but steady churn of progress that suggests maybe the new boss isn't the same as the old boss.

Later this week the Senate likely could pass a bipartisan bill to set up a congressional review of a potential nuclear deal with Iran, coming on the heels of a large bipartisan vote in the House and Senate for a bill to combat sex trafficking. A little over two weeks ago, the bipartisan leadership held a back-slapping ceremony to celebrate a new law that eliminated cuts to Medicare reimbursements for doctors.

"This Senate is dramatically different than the last one in severable measurable ways," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said in an interview last week.

What Republicans tout as a sea change, however, Democrats view as a new Congress merely passing the low-hanging fruit of legislation, and even that can still look dysfunctional.

Two months ago there was a near-shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security, and it took more than a month to approve the legislation creating a fund for sex trafficking victims. Both of those largely bipartisan issues got caught up in separate contentious issues that bogged down the Capitol for weeks and weeks.

The process has left some rank-and-file lawmakers saying that they've seen some substantial progress, only to see a return to old habits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think the jury is out,” said Sen. Angus King (Maine), an independent who caucuses with Democrats and has been trying to bridge the partisan divide. “There are several other bills sort of waiting in line. We may end up being pretty productive, but I think it’s a little early to say at this point.”

There’s no question that more is happening across the Capitol. House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) has adapted into a PowerPoint presentation the work of undergraduate students from Harvard, showing that more bills were introduced in the House during the first 100 days than in the same time of 2011 and 2013.

Moreover, the House passed 62 bills in its first 100 days, more than the combined total in the first 100 days of 2011 and 2013. “With your help, things are different in Washington,” McCarthy wrote to his GOP colleagues on Friday.

Of those 62 bills approved by the House, eight were signed into law. That’s not much different than the seven signed into law in the first 100 days of 2011 when Democrats controlled the Senate and Republicans ran the House.

One of those laws, the Medicare reimbursement plan was significant because it included some changes to the program as well as an extension of a popular children insurance program. The rest were largely ceremonial or extensions of existing laws.

McConnell acknowledged that he has dialed back his expectations for big bipartisan accomplishments in the final two years of President Obama’s administration. He has, for example, cast aside hope for a comprehensive revision of the tax code.

“I can’t see it being done, which is a shame, because it would be a perfect thing to tackle in the time of divided government,” McConnell said. “But I’m very skeptical that we can go forward on that.”

Instead, the new focus is “emphasizing things worth doing that enjoy some bipartisan support,” McConnell said. He is going through a series of one-on-one meetings with Democrats to get to know them and their priorities better. McConnell recently huddled with Sen. Timothy M. Kaine (D-Va.) and has an upcoming sit-down with King.

Just a third of the way into this year, McConnell declined to give himself a full grade until the two-year Congress is complete. “I think it’s too early to make that evaluation but I think on the dysfunction issue, I think it is not too early to make an evaluation of that,” he said.

Passing the budget is an example of easing the dysfunction. Not since 2009, when Democrats controlled Congress, have the House and Senate approved annual budgets and then reconciled the differences to pass a joint resolution from which the two chambers could work the rest of the year.

A key example of dissipating gridlock came last week when Obama signed a modest energy efficiency bill into law written by a bipartisan pair of swing-state senators, Democrat Jean Shaheen (N.H.) and Republican Rob Portman (Ohio).

In 2013 and 2014, facing a very difficult reelection, Shaheen wanted to pass the legislation to demonstrate her effectiveness. The legislation made it onto the Senate floor only to get bogged down by Republican demands for amendments on other energy issues, including the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats, with many incumbents facing tough 2014 elections, shielded their incumbents from taking tough votes, so the Shaheen-Portman bill died. After Democrats lost the majority, the bill was approved unanimously at the tail end of a marathon budget marathon at 4 a.m. March 27.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who spent the previous two years trying to negotiate between McConnell and the Democratic leader, Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.), said basic politics has forced each side to stand down on some previously partisan stands.

“McConnell, as much or more than anyone, realized that we can’t go to the voters in 2016 with a record along the lines of what just happened in the last six years,” McCain said.

Some see the House as the continually unsteady pressure cooker of Congress. Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.), a leading centrist, said he was losing faith in the first two months of the year with the focus on social issues, culminating in the near shutdown of DHS over immigration, but the next two months were relatively stable.

On Thursday, however, the House voted largely on party lines to strike down a District law that banned discrimination against residents who use abortion services, a social issue that was reminiscent of the first few weeks in January. “Here we go again,” Dent said.

Some lawmakers see success in tackling some big issues, such as the legislation to have a review of the potential Iranian deal, while major ones like drafting a new war resolution for Iraq have been avoided.

“As long as we’ve got a war going on — nine months into the war come May 8, with no debate on the floor of either body — I’m not going to concede that we are shouldering our responsibilities,” Kaine said. “I’m seeing some positive signs, but we’ve got a war going on.”

California board approves emergency water rules // USA Today // Ian James - May 6, 2015

California's state water board on Tuesday approved emergency drought regulations that aim to slash water use in urban areas by 25 percent.

The measures call for cities and water agencies to reduce water usage by amounts ranging from 8 percent to 36 percent. The State Water Resources Control Board drew up the rules to meet Gov. Jerry Brown's order for a 25-percent cut in urban water use statewide.

It's the first time that California has ever put in place mandatory reductions in water use. The plan reflects just how bleak the state's water picture has become. The snowpack in the Sierra Nevada has shrunk to a record low. Groundwater levels have plummeted across much of California, and in some areas of the Central Valley, the wells of hundreds of families have run dry.

Felicia Marcus, chair of the water board, called the cutbacks "a collective issue that we all need to rise to in this time of emergency."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to the latest figures released by the board, Californians reduced water use by just 3.6 percent in March as compared to the same month in 2013. That was a slight change from a 2.8 percent reduction in February, and significantly less than a 22 percent drop in December and a 7.3 percent reduction in January.

Max Gomberg, a senior environmental scientist with the state water board, called the new mandatory measures a "desperate times approach."

epa04696368 A 'River Closed' sign is posted on theThe Truckee River is closed after it dried up because there was no water from Lake Tahoe on April 8 in the Sierra Nevada mountains near Lake, Calif. The level of the lake is 6 feet below its minimal level of flowing into the Truckee River.

The state water board will have the authority to issue fines of up to $10,000 against cities or water districts that don't reach their targets and that violate state orders.

State officials, however, said they prefer to work with water districts to help them achieve reductions in water use right away.

"We're going to be engaged with the suppliers from the beginning," Gomberg said during the meeting in Sacramento.

Under the regulations approved by the board on Tuesday night, water agencies will have discretion in determining how they achieve their overall reduction targets. They will be able to choose, for instance, how much of the cutbacks are borne by commercial and industrial customers as well as by domestic customers.

The regulations exclude the vast majority of farms in California. They also don't touch the use of recycled water. But properties such as golf courses that rely on water pumped from private wells are to be required to use 25 percent less water or limit watering to two days a week.

Brown and other state officials have recommended that water districts meet their targets using approaches such as changing prices and enforcing restrictions on watering times.

During Tuesday's meeting, the state water board for the first time released data on the actions that agencies have taken to enforce rules against wasting water, including issuing fines. The board said 290 of the 411 water suppliers provided data on their enforcement during March, and most of them issued 20 or fewer notices for incidents of water waste.

Water agencies reported a total of 10,877 complaints of wasteful water use or violations of drought rules, as well as 8,762 warnings issued and 682 penalties assessed.

Marcus and other state officials said they're focusing on ways to reduce the amounts of water used for lawns and other "ornamental" landscaping outdoors, which accounts for the biggest share of Californians' residential water use. They also are trying to move quickly to put the rules in place before the summer months, when the heaviest outdoor water use typically occurs.

With the extreme drought now in a fourth year in California, Marcus said, the latest measures aim to "ensure urban resilience" if the drought persists for another year or beyond.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It is better to prepare now than to face much more painful cuts should it not rain in the fall," she said. "I do get all the fears and the concerns, but I do think this is a moment to rise to an occasion and an all-hands-on-deck kind of a moment."

E.P.A. Carbon Emissions Plan Could Save Thousands of Lives, Study Finds // NYT // May 5, 2015

New carbon emissions standards that were proposed last year for coal-fired power plants in the United States would substantially improve human health and prevent more than 3,000 premature deaths per year, according to a new study.

The study, led by researchers at Syracuse and Harvard Universities, used modeling to predict the effect on human health of changes to national carbon standards for power plants. The researchers calculated three different outcomes using data from the Census Bureau and detailed maps of the more than 2,400 fossil-fuel power plants across the country.

The model with the biggest health benefit was the one that most closely resembled the changes that the Environmental Protection Agency proposed in a rule in June. Under that plan, reductions in carbon emissions for the plants would be set by states and would include improvements to the energy efficiency of, for example, air-conditioners, refrigerators and power grids.

The health benefits of the rule would be indirect. While carbon emissions trap heat in the atmosphere, which contributes to a warming planet, they are not directly linked to health threats. Emissions from coal-fired power plants, however, also include a number of other pollutants, such as soot and ozone, that are directly linked to illnesses like asthma and lung disease.

Researchers calculated that the changes in the E.P.A. rule could prevent 3,500 premature deaths a year and more than 1,000 heart attacks and hospitalizations from air-pollution-related illness.

The study was published Monday in the journal Nature Climate Change. The largest declines in pollution — and consequent benefits to health — would happen in states in the Ohio River Valley, including Pennsylvania and Ohio, which have some of the highest levels of emissions, researchers said.

Charles T. Driscoll, a professor of environmental systems engineering at Syracuse who was the lead author of the paper, said research began about a year before the E.P.A. proposed the carbon reduction plan. It was a coincidence that one of the researchers' models so closely resembled the federal proposal.

The model with the deepest cuts in emissions was based on the use of a carbon tax, but because energy efficiency was not part of that version, it prevented fewer premature deaths, researchers found. The third version, which assumed that plants would be revamped and modernized, an effort that some industry representatives favor, produced almost no change in air quality or health benefits.

“The idea is to inform the federal and state governments that your state and federal policy matters,” Dr. Driscoll said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This summer, President Obama plans to unveil a final set of climate change regulations to curb planet-warming emissions from power plants in the United States. The climate rule, as proposed in draft form last year by the E.P.A., would cut carbon emissions from power plants 30 percent from 2005 levels by 2030.

The rule will chiefly target coal-fired power plants, the nation's largest source of carbon emissions. They would require every state to submit a plan to shift their energy systems from heavily carbon polluting sources of power, such as coal plants, to cleaner power sources.

In making the case for the rule, the Obama administration has highlighted its indirect health benefits. Mr. Obama's political advisers have made the bet that a policy presented as a move to reduce childhood asthma and other diseases will gain more public traction than a complex new energy policy designed to reduce global warming in the long term.

Critics say the rule would increase the cost of energy, an outcome that would harm lower-income Americans.

Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, an energy industry association, said it was an overstatement to claim that the rule would prevent so many premature deaths, because the reductions would bring emissions levels well below what the E.P.A. has previously said could harm health. He said the administration had already claimed the same benefits justify other rules, which amounted to double counting.

"It's like Enron-style accounting," he said, referring to the energy company that collapsed after revelations about flawed accounting standards.

Dr. Leonard Bielory, a researcher at Rutgers University who was not involved in the study, said that it did manage to show that the rule would bring positive health effects, but that the extent was far from clear. "Are these the real numbers you'll save?" he said. "That's really a gray zone."

Dr. Driscoll acknowledged the hazards of precision in a modeling exercise, but said the paper tried to quantify the uncertainty. For example, the projection of 3,500 deaths prevented was an average of a much broader range of 780 deaths to 6,100 deaths.

U.S. Trade Gap Widens on Surging Imports // WSJ// Eric Morath – May 5, 2015

WASHINGTON—A stronger dollar and an influx of pent-up imports into West Coast ports are pointing the U.S. economy toward its third quarterly contraction in its six-year-long expansion, reflecting choppy conditions that appear set to restrain growth throughout the year.

The nation's trade deficit expanded by 43.1% in March from February, the largest monthly widening since 1996, the Commerce Department said Tuesday. A record level of non-petroleum imports flowed into the U.S. after a labor dispute at West Coast ports ended, causing the seasonally adjusted trade gap to widen to $51.37 billion.

That was significantly larger than economists had forecast, even with pressure from a strong dollar and weak global growth. As a result, revisions could push the official reading for first-quarter gross domestic product into negative territory from the paltry 0.2% annualized gain initially reported last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The underlying story remains the same: Growth faltered at the start of the year with very few signs of momentum,” said Sterne Agee economist Lindsey Piegza.

After the trade report, economists at J.P. Morgan Chase and Deutsche Bank cut their first-quarter GDP growth estimates to show a 0.5% contraction. Forecasting firm Macroeconomic Advisers lowered its reading by six-tenths of a percent to a 0.4% contraction. All three had previously estimated a tiny expansion for the quarter.

The figures represent a setback for the U.S. economy, but it overcame a similar one that surfaced last year.

Following a contraction in the first quarter of 2014, the economy grew at an almost 4% pace for the rest of the year. And employers added jobs last year at the best rate since the mid-1990s, raising hopes that the long-awaited breakout had arrived.

Instead, the U.S. appears to have again hit the brakes at the start of the year. That exposes a host of concerns, including the drag on growth from a stronger dollar, persistent weakness among key trading partners in China and Europe and the reliance on U.S. consumers to drive the world’s economy.

“It’s really a global challenge right now,” said Marc Skalla, president of Atlanta-based SASCO Chemical Group Inc., which makes chemicals for tires and other industries. The firm expects sales to grow by 20% this year, but the stronger dollar is squeezing export profits.

A stronger dollar has “taken contracts that we worked on last year and completely changed them,” Mr. Skalla said. “We’ll feel it on the margins.”

From mid-2014 through the end of March, the dollar appreciated by more than 20% against a weighted index of major currencies tracked by the Federal Reserve. The Fed index shows the dollar’s value has fallen somewhat since early April, a move that could cushion exporters from some of the fallout.

The latest economic setback comes with plenty of caveats. Upcoming data on inventories and services could again recast the view of the first quarter. The domestic economy also appears to be relatively firm. Consumer confidence is rising, household spending picked up since the winter and lower oil prices are likely to boost many consumers and businesses this year.

March’s trade gap was the largest of the expansion, driven by a rebound after ports on the West Coast returned to normal following a monthslong labor dispute. That helped imports post a record 7.7% improvement on the month. Goods imports from China were up 32% compared with March 2014. Meanwhile, exports only inched up 0.9%.

The trade gap in February, when the labor dispute ended, was the smallest since late 2009. The three-month moving average for the trade gap, a measure that evens out swings, shows it expanded modestly from a year earlier.

Imports at the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, which together handle around 40% of the U.S. imported container traffic, reached near-record levels in March, which is typically one of the slowest months of the year at the ports.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Port of Los Angeles, the country's busiest container port, said import volume grew 70% in March from February. Export volume, which typically makes up only about half the business at Los Angeles, wasn't as strong, growing 10% month to month and falling 23% from a year earlier.

The Maritime Exchange of Southern California said the backlog of ships anchored at sea waiting for a port berth reached a peak of 36 ships the week of Feb. 26. The logjam had all but disappeared by late last week.

Norfolk Southern Corp. 's business in the first quarter reflected unusual activity related to the West Coast port issues, Chief Executive Charles "Wick" Moorman said, adding that unusually cold weather and the strong dollar are also factors in the import surge.

By mid-March, the railway operator's business started to return to normal, Mr. Moorman said. That repeats a pattern seen last year, when economic output turned negative in the first quarter and then snapped back quickly.

"It feels a lot like it did last year," he said.

JACO Machine Works LLC, a Santa Cruz, Calif., firm that produces parts for medical equipment, scientific instruments and other applications saw a slowdown in orders from a German customer.

"They tell me that European market is soft for them," President Andy Smith said. In contrast, JACO has seen increased demand from California firms building medical devices and robots. "The first quarter wasn't great, but I still see a strong domestic economy."

Despite the widening of the overall trade gap, the petroleum deficit continued to narrow in the U.S. Over the past several years, the amount of petroleum shipped to the U.S. declined while domestic production increased.

The trade deficit for petroleum products fell to $7.67 billion in March, the lowest since June 2002. After climbing above $100 a barrel last June, benchmark oil prices plunged through the second half of 2014 and have stayed near $50 a barrel most of this year.

From a year earlier, U.S. imports are up 1% and exports are down 3%. The more subtle change suggests the appreciation of the dollar hampers exports. In addition, slowing economies in parts of Europe and Asia have reduced demand for U.S. goods and services.

How a turbulent global economy will shape the U.S. expansion is high on the minds of Federal Reserve officials. In a statement following last month's policy meeting, central bankers acknowledged that economic growth slowed in the winter months.

If central bankers see global developments holding back U.S. growth, they could wait longer to raise short-term interest rates from near zero.

—Jeffrey Sparshott and Paul Page contributed to this article.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERNATIONAL

Germany, Too, Is Accused of Spying on Friends // NYT // Alison Smalemay – May 5, 2015

BERLIN — About 18 months ago, Chancellor Angela Merkel was the wronged American ally whose cellphone number was among data sucked up by American intelligence as it kept watch on Europeans.

“Spying among friends — that is simply not done,” she said after the discovery in autumn 2013, to a sympathetic domestic audience.

Within the past two weeks, the tide has turned. Ms. Merkel is back in the spotlight over spying. This time it is Germany’s foreign intelligence service, known here as the B.N.D., that is being accused of monitoring European companies and perhaps individuals. Further, the reports said the spying was done at the behest of the National Security Agency, the United States intelligence organization.

Critics have seized on the spying allegations, sensing a whiff of hypocrisy emanating from Berlin, given the German outrage over the American program. On Tuesday, Austria was the offended party, filing a legal complaint against the German and American intelligence agencies over suspicions that it was being spied on, Reuters reported.

Ms. Merkel’s maxim about not spying on friends means “she must be measured by it,” said Stefan Kornelius, author of a biography of the chancellor and the foreign editor of the Süddeutsche Zeitung.

Government officials are also scrambling to head off accusations by some German news outlets and opposition figures that Ms. Merkel’s government and some of her allies failed their constitutional duty to supervise the intelligence services and inform Parliament of the services’ activities.

Gregor Gysi, the vocal leader of the former Communists and other far-leftists in the opposition Left party, accused Ms. Merkel of “treason.”

The accusation was angrily rebutted on Monday by Gerhard Schindler, head of the B.N.D. He dismissed as “absolutely absurd” any suggestion that his agency was “a compliant tool” of the Americans.

The details of what the German government did or did not do in collusion with the American government remain murky, caught up in the secrecy inherent in security matters. But the federal prosecutor is examining whether to begin a formal investigation.

The regular parliamentary committee that oversees all intelligence services and a special parliamentary inquiry into the National Security Agency are also seeking more details and questioning key officials.

The matter raises anew the questions that flared in 2013 with the release of American government documents by Edward J. Snowden, a former N.S.A. contractor, revealing the extent of American spying operations domestically and abroad. In the United States, Congress is now poised to reel in some of the surveillance measures that were adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But Germans reacted with revulsion when the extent of American spying on Europeans was revealed. Germany’s memory of the Nazi and Communist regimes that spied on their citizens gave the revelations a special edge. Mr. Snowden is more of a popular hero here than elsewhere in Europe, and anti-N.S.A. sentiment remains high.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Continue reading the main story

At the same time, attacks by Islamist militants and the threat of homegrown extremists have challenged the intelligence equation in Europe. The French government is expanding its intelligence services' powers to combat terrorism.

Ms. Merkel, asked on Monday whether her maxim about spying among friends still applied, said this was an "important" question and added, "I think the answer should be that it should not occur."

But she recalled that she had noted in 2013 that it was necessary to strike a balance between liberty and security, and that this "will continue to be my job."

"There is an innate tension," she added. "We must improve what needs to be improved through reports to the parliamentary control bodies. But on the other hand, even if it is not so popular right now, it is part of their job for our intelligence services, especially the B.N.D., that they must and will cooperate internationally to protect the bodies and lives of 80 million Germans as best they can."

"First and foremost," she said, that means cooperation with the National Security Agency.

In 2013, Ms. Merkel — facing re-election, which she handily won for a third term — succeeded in tamping down what is known here as the N.S.A. scandal.

But it never went away. Since starting work last year, the special parliamentary inquiry into the N.S.A. affair has summoned witnesses, including former United States intelligence officials, who painted what many Germans see as a damning picture of American surveillance practices.

The current flare-up started on April 23 when Der Spiegel reported that since at least 2008, a division of the B.N.D. had helped the National Security Agency to spy on European and German interests, including the French-German enterprise European Aeronautic Defense and Space, now known as the Airbus Group.

Besides raising eyebrows about the scope of the spying operation, and the targets, the report questioned whether the German intelligence service had failed to fully inform the Chancellery or Parliament about it.

The government spokesman, Steffen Seibert, acknowledged, without providing details, that the government had been working for weeks with the foreign intelligence service to assure that the agency was in compliance with the reporting rules.

"Technological and organizational deficiencies at the B.N.D." were identified, he said, and the government gave "immediate orders that they be rectified."

In a statement, he said the government would continue to keep parliamentary committees informed about intelligence activities, including the accuracy of the emerging allegations. The government will also examine whether information given to Parliament in the past continues "to be accurate beyond any reasonable doubt," the statement said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The statement said there was no sign of current or past “massive spying on German and European citizens.” But it omitted any mention of businesses or individuals, and whether they had been targeted.

The most concrete indication that espionage might have occurred has come from Airbus, which filed a legal complaint last week against unnamed persons on suspicion of economic espionage and asked the German government for more information.

Continue reading the main story

Rainer Ohler, an Airbus Group spokesman, would confirm only that “we are in contact” with Berlin. Members of the German Parliament have suggested that Washington may influence how much the German government can reveal to Airbus.

Thomas de Maizière, a close Merkel ally who ran her Chancellery from 2005 to 2009 and was thus responsible for the intelligence services, has dismissed the spying allegations. Mr. de Maizière, now the interior minister, said on Monday that he had been involved in decisions against deepening certain ties with the National Security Agency in 2008, in order to protect German interests.

Mr. de Maizière is to testify this week before the parliamentary inquiry. Committee members have demanded that the government release a list of the data the B.N.D. gave to the National Security Agency.

In the meantime, pressure mounts on Ms. Merkel. On Monday, her No. 2, Vice Chancellor Sigmar Gabriel, leader of the center-left Social Democrats who govern with her conservatives in a coalition, took the unusual step of describing two conversations with her to reporters. Mr. Gabriel had asked, he said, whether there was anything to the swirling allegations, and believed her when she said there was not.

But, he noted, “what we are witnessing now is an affair, a secret service scandal, which could set off a very grave tremor.”

Obama Administration Approves First Ferry Service to Cuba // The Associated Press // May 5, 2015

HAVANA — The Obama administration approved the first ferry service in decades between the United States and Cuba on Tuesday, potentially opening a new path for the hundreds of thousands of people and hundreds of millions of dollars in goods that travel between Florida and Havana each year.

Baja Ferries, which operates passenger service in Mexico, said it received a license from the U.S. Treasury Department. Robert Muse, a lawyer for Baja Ferries, said he believed other ferry service petitions had also been approved. The Treasury Department said it could not immediately confirm that, but the Sun-Sentinel newspaper in Florida said approvals also were received by Havana Ferry Partners of Fort Lauderdale, United Caribbean Lines Florida in the Orlando area and Airline Brokers Co. of Miami.

Muse said Baja had yet to request approval from Cuba, but added that he was optimistic the service would allow a significant increase in trade and travel between the two countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Cuban government made no immediate comment on the news and it is far from clear that it is willing or able to allow a major new channel for the movement of goods and people between the two countries.

"I think it's a further indication of the seriousness of the Obama administration in normalizing relations with Cuba," said Muse, an expert on U.S. law on Cuba. "We're now going from the theoretical to the very specific."

Before Cuba's 1959 revolution, ferries ran daily between Florida and Cuba, bringing American tourists to Havana's hotels and casinos and allowing Cubans to take overnight shopping trips to the United States.

That ended with the revolution, and the more than 600,000 people who travel between the U.S. and Cuba each year depend on expensive charter flights. About 80 percent of U.S .travelers to Cuba are Cuban-Americans visiting relatives, and a large number travel with huge amounts of consumer goods unavailable in communist Cuba, from baby clothes to flat-screen TV sets. That cargo has become increasingly expensive and difficult to bring in recent years due to the high prices charged by charters and tightened Cuban customs rules.

Muse said he believed ferries would allow lower-priced passenger and cargo service and provide a potential conduit for new forms of trade allowed by Obama when he announced a series of loopholes in the trade embargo on Cuba late last year. Among other measures, Obama allowed the import of some goods produced by Cuba's new private sector and allowed the virtually unlimited export of products to entrepreneurs.

Ferries also provide a new route for U.S. travelers to Cuba, who also depend on the charter services. Travel from the U.S. has been rising since Obama's Dec. 17 announcement, and new pressure groups are pushing for Congress to end all travel restrictions and allow pure tourism, currently prohibited by law.

Andrea Rodriguez contributed to this report.

40 Migrants Reported Dead After Dinghy Burst at Sea // WSJ // Liam Moloney - May 5, 2015

ROME—About 40 migrants drowned during a sea crossing from Libya to southern Italy over the weekend when one of the dinghies they were traveling in exploded or burst from the heat of the sun, according to other migrants who were traveling with them.

Rescued migrants—sub-Saharans from countries such as Mali, Senegal, Ghana and Gambia—told the Save the Children aid group that they were making the crossing in two rubber boats. One carried about 100 migrants, while the other had around 137 on board.

“There is still a lot of confusion about what happened, and it all has to be verified by the authorities but some migrants are telling us that around 40 drowned when one of the dinghies exploded or burst from the heat of the sun,” Save the Children spokeswoman Giovanna di Benedetto said over the phone from the Sicilian port of Catania.

Migrants wait to disembark from a Malta-based Migrant Offshore Aid Station in Pozzallo, Italy, on Tuesday. A charity said that 40 migrants were feared drowned after their dinghy sank.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Migrants wait to disembark from a Malta-based Migrant Offshore Aid Station in Pozzallo, Italy, on Tuesday. A charity said that 40 migrants were feared drowned after their dinghy sank. Photo: Associated Press

At least 10 unaccompanied minors were among those rescued and put ashore in Catania on Tuesday, Ms. Di Benedetto said. She didn't say if any minors were among those reported dead. The incident is believed to have taken place on Sunday.

A spokeswoman for the Italian coast guard said that the authorities had no knowledge of the drownings reported to Save the Children.

More than 8,000 migrants have been saved since Saturday and 10 have died, according to officials. The coast guard said that five dead bodies were found when rescuers on a merchant ship reached the rubber boats. Three bodies were found on a vessel in a different rescue. Two migrants drowned after going overboard in a third incident.

Italy's interior ministry expects to see as many as 200,000 migrants reach its shores this year, an increase from the more than 170,000 who came in 2014.

The migrants are heading to Europe to avoid conflicts in Africa and the Middle East. Human traffickers use a lawless Libya as a base to send overcrowded boats on perilous journeys.

More than 1,600 people are believed to have drowned in the Mediterranean this year as they attempted to reach Europe, the majority of them in April, according to Amnesty International. That's a more than 50-fold annual increase over the same period.

Calmer weather, typical in the Mediterranean in the spring and summer months, usually signals a surge in departures of vessels packed with migrants.

Children disembark from the Italian Navy vessel 'Bettica' in the harbor of Salerno, Italy, on Tuesday. ENLARGE

Children disembark from the Italian Navy vessel 'Bettica' in the harbor of Salerno, Italy, on Tuesday. Photo: Associated Press

Calmer weather, typical in the Mediterranean in the spring and summer months, usually signals a surge in departures of vessels packed with migrants.

The Italian Navy said on Monday that among the more than 2,000 migrants that it rescued over the weekend was a pregnant woman who gave birth to a girl on board its ship Bettica. The navy added that mother and daughter, named Francesca Marina, were doing well. Marina is a common Italian first name and it also means "navy."

Rescued migrants are also being put ashore in the southern Italian regions of Calabria and Campania to ease the pressure off Sicily which takes almost all those arriving.

'Some migrants are telling us that around 40 drowned when one of the dinghies exploded or burst from the heat of the sun.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

—Save the Children spokeswoman Giovanna di Benedetto

About half of migrants reaching Italy end up in reception centers in the poorer south of the peninsula—something that irks the central government as it feels the affluent northern Italy isn't doing its part in helping out.

After some 800 migrants died on a boat off Libya, European Union leaders agreed last month on a more robust response to the migration problem, including tripling the budget for EU patrols of Italy's border.

Rome is pleased with the extra cash, but political leaders in Italy have expressed disappointment over the modest help they are getting from other EU countries with the migrants once they arrive on Italian soil, and an unwillingness to distribute them among member states.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

What the Clintons Can Learn From Ben Franklin's Foreign Money Scandal // Daily Beast // Zephyr Teachout - May 5, 2015

More than 200 years ago, we included in our Constitution a provision that forbids federal officers from accepting a gift of any kind whatever from foreign interests without first getting permission from Congress (Article I, Section 9, the so-called Emoluments Clause). We borrowed the provision from the Netherlands, where it was ridiculed for being overly fussy about corruption. But we put it in both our Constitution and in that document's forerunner, the Articles of Confederation, as a defense against emulating the corrupt culture of Europe.

The unlikely source of the provision was a snuff box. A few years before the constitutional convention, the King of France gave Benjamin Franklin a diamond encrusted snuff box after his diplomatic tour. Franklin did not appear to offer anything in return, but the gift nonetheless led to concerns that Franklin might be quietly corrupted by French interests—perhaps even without his knowing it.

The Americans, rigidly rejecting European custom, believed that acceptance of a luxurious gift by someone in power was itself a threat. Perhaps Franklin would be more generous toward French commercial interests simply by the operation of normal human sympathies, which to tend to be more charitable toward those who give us gifts. The framers tried to put a check on those sympathies, or at least put a block in the relationship, by requiring that Congress approve any gifts to federal officials.

Ironically, at the constitutional convention, Franklin was among the most outspoken in favor of anti-corruption provisions. His own lifelong experience with governments around the world had made him wary of the many ways in which officials could be tempted. James Madison, Thomas Jefferson, George Mason, and Franklin weren't wrong to be concerned about foreign powers attempting to use money to buy influence and favorable treatment.

According to The New York Times, Bill Clinton received a $500,000 personal payment from a Russian bank as payment for a speech in 2010. (In some cases, Bill Clinton directs his speaking fees to the Clinton Foundation, though there's no evidence that happened in this case.) This payment happened around the same time that Hillary Clinton's State Department was participating in the decision-making process on the legitimacy of Russian takeover of American uranium interests (the decision was made by an inter-agency body on which State was represented, but was chaired by Treasury). Many people have raised concerns that this fee, like Benjamin Franklin's snuff box, might have swayed Bill Clinton's—and Hillary's—general thinking toward Russian interests at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In effect, the troubling morality ofCitizens Unitedhas become the official morality of Clinton's defenders.

Over the past several years, Bill Clinton has been given millions of dollars for foreign and domestic speeches, with the greatest number of sponsors coming from the financial industry. At the same time, he solicited and received millions of dollars from foreign and domestic interests, including. Many of the donors and sponsors had interests that were affected by State Department policies, and all of the donors, past and current, have interests that would be affected by a Hillary Clinton presidency.

Hillary Clinton has not addressed the issue publicly, but some of her defenders have argued that without a smoking gun, or evidence of quid pro quo, there's nothing to be concerned about.

As the framers knew, we don't need that in order to be concerned.

It's not surprising that the Clintons do not want to answer questions about foreign donations. So far, they have not addressed questions about the apparent conflict of interest, leaving the Clinton Foundation to respond. (They had company: Thomas Jefferson was so annoyed by the Emoluments Clause that he hid his own later gift from the King of France, a diamond-encrusted portrait; he had his aide take out the diamonds and sell them to pay down his debt. He was not, he wrote, going to humiliate himself by going before "the gridiron of Congress.") But as citizens we must ask these questions. Some Democrats want to ignore the issue, but love of party, as well as love of country, requires us to demand more.

I am a Democrat. I will vote Democratic in the general election. But I refuse to allow my party to be silent in the face of serious accusations of conflict of interest. There are two reasons for this. I expect that the GOP candidate will use this in 2016 to make explicit that Bill Clinton's $500,000 went into his personal account, the one he shares with Hillary Clinton. Silence now doesn't change the structure of the argument.

Second, I care deeply about my party, but I believe the health of a party depends upon the openness of internal debate. I do not believe accusations of outside influence are fatal, but I believe refusing to talk about them might be.

We do not have a snuff box clause for the spouses of public officials—they were not contemplated in the founding document. Instead, we have an election—a "gridiron" of sorts. Hillary Clinton cannot undo the past, but she can help explain it.

First, she can answer any questions about how she and her husband talk about foreign policy and domestic policy in light of the need to protect against donors using access to influence. They are not naive and must be aware of the political motives of donors: how did they, and do they, address these conflicts? Unlike campaign donations, which Hillary Clinton has to pursue under our current system of privately financed campaigns, these were avoidable situations. How did the Clintons think about, and manage, the efforts of donors and sponsors to influence them?

Hillary Clinton has called for a constitutional amendment to overturn Citizens United. But, ironically, her defenders are effectively using a Citizens Uniteddefense—if there's no quid pro quo, there's no problem. Access and influence are not corrupting. In effect, the troubling morality of Citizens United has become the official morality of Clinton's defenders.

She can also act now to limit the threat of future corruption. She has indicated the Clinton Foundation will limit foreign donations. But to be fair to her constituents, the Clintons should separate themselves entirely from the Foundation, and immediately stop raising money. As a spouse and daughter seeking major donations, former President Clinton and Chelsea Clinton are rich targets for anyone seeking influence and access to Hillary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, whether the donor is foreign or domestic. Hillary Clinton should also refuse to allow donations to her family members from people with interests before her: not because all donations are corrupt, but because the temptation is too great to use the channel for influence.

After the snuff box incident, Benjamin Franklin went on to become a leader in framing key anti-corruption provisions in the Constitution, one of the most radical of its time in demanding that we protect against appearances of corruption, because appearances can too often lead to reality.

Hillary Clinton can do the same thing by coming forward with a full press conference, severing all familial ties to the Clinton Foundation, and proposing real, concrete solutions to the modern crisis of corruption. I'm glad she is opposed to Citizens United, but a constitutional amendment reversing that decision wouldn't address the core problem of privately financed campaigns, and the ongoing conflicts the private financing system creates.

'House of Cards' star wants a Bill Clinton cameo // The Hill // Judy Kurtz - May 5, 2015

"House of Cards" star Michael Kelly has his pick for who he'd like to see make a cameo on the Netflix hit.

"Probably Bill Clinton," Kelly recently told ITK when asked who he'd love to see appear on the political thriller.

So what role could the 42nd president — who has admitted he's a major "House of Cards" fan and counts the series' fictional president, actor Kevin Spacey, among his friends — possibly play?

"I think Bill Clinton's probably a pretty good actor. I think he could probably do anything," Kelly said, before reconsidering. "I mean, it would be kind of hard, the whole willing suspension of disbelief, to not see him as Bill Clinton. But maybe he could come on and be Bill Clinton. That'd be pretty cool."

Kelly, who plays aide Doug Stamper on the show, also offered some other options for real-life political co-stars: "Either the Clintons, either the Obamas, I would love. I love [MSNBC 'Hardball' host] Chris Matthews, but I already did something with Chris Matthews on 'The Good Wife.'"

But Kelly says of his top choices, "I would love the Obamas or the Clintons, either one of those. I'd be thrilled."

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"David Sandretti" <david_sandretti@lcv.org>
To:	"Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date:	5/12/2008 9:31:45 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] LCV Reaction to McCain Speech on Global Warming
Attachments:	Questions for McCain.pdf

NEWS RELEASE

For Immediate Release
May 12, 2008
Contact: David Sandretti
david_sandretti@lcv.org
202-365-6979

LCV Reaction to Senator McCain's Speech on Global Warming

Washington, DC – LCV President Gene Karpinski issued the following statement in reaction to Senator John McCain's global warming speech today.

"To his credit, Senator McCain wants to do something serious about global warming, but his proposal falls far short of what the science says we need to do today.

"He has not substantively improved his plan over the bill he introduced years ago -- legislation that the science now shows is out of date.

"He is right to call for investments in new alternative forms of energy but it is troubling that he continues to support taxpayer subsidies for a mature industry like nuclear which has yet to resolve its waste disposal problem. It would be far more cost-effective to invest in renewable energy like the wind energy plant he is visiting today. Better still would be a call for a renewable electricity standard, something he has voted against time and time again."

# #

Last week, LCV released six questions to Senator McCain on his record. The attached questions can also be found at http://www.lcv.org/mccainquestions.pdf

For more information on Senator McCain's voting record, visit www.lcv.org/scorecard. The non-partisan LCV Scorecard is the nationally accepted yardstick used to rate Member of Congress on conservation and clean energy issues. Based on key conservation votes in the House and Senate, it is often used by the media to quickly describe a Member's position.

###

Paid for by the League of Conservation Voters, www.lcv.org, and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee

------ End of Forwarded Message

------ End of Forwarded Message

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Eryn Sepp" <esepp@hillaryclinton.com>
"Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/30/2015 11:51:35 AM
Subject: Re: Michael Werz: German Public TV re: Russia / Uranium Deal

He should not do this. Don't see why he is but adding Adrienne to send points.

Sent from my iPhone

> On Apr 30, 2015, at 5:59 PM, Eryn Sepp <esepp@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
>
> Hi John and Jen--
>
> Michael Werz was approached about doing German Public TV next Tuesday re: Russia and the Uranium deal. They would have asked for you John, but you're not going to be in DC for quite some time during their filming schedule.
>
> He's asking what we can give him in the way of surrogate TPs on CF as well as on the deal, if the campaign comes up, and he imagines it will.
>
> He knows about the piece from the Daily Caller on Podesta Group, so is also asking if we want him to take any particular angle on that as well.
>
> If we can share anything to help him, I wanted to make sure I had 1) the most updated version and 2) approval to do so.
>
> (Also, I imagine he's going on the show in his CAP capacity. Do we need to be careful about that? He reached out via personal channels to keep things separate.)
>
> Thank you,
> Eryn

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nelson W. Cunningham" <ncunningham@maglobal.com>
To:	"Nelson W. Cunningham" <ncunningham@maglobal.com>
Date:	7/15/2014 12:18:19 PM
Subject:	Reception for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (N.H.) -- Tuesday, July 22nd
Attachments:	07.22.14 Cunningham Reception.pdf

Friends:

This is a reminder that one week from today, we will host Senator Jeanne Shaheen for an evening reception at my home in Georgetown. I know you will enjoy the opportunity to get to know a terrific candidate who very much deserves to continue her impressive leadership on behalf of the people of New Hampshire for a second term.

Bain & Paige Ennis, Paige Reffe, Damon Wilson, and I look forward to welcoming you next Tuesday, July 22 at 6:00 PM at 3417 P Street NW.

Nelson

From: Nelson W. Cunningham
Sent: Wednesday, June 25, 2014 3:20 PM
To: Nelson W. Cunningham
Cc: Peter Brigham
Subject: Reception for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (N.H.) -- Tuesday July 22d

Friends:

My cohosts and I hope that you can join us for one more reception featuring not only a marquee Senate race but a terrific woman candidate – this time, U.S. Senator Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire.

I've had the opportunity to get to know Senator Shaheen since she arrived in Washington in 2009, and have been impressed by her exceptional leadership and her commitment to getting results for her constituents—the same dedication that she displayed during her three terms as Governor of New Hampshire.

She faces a challenge from former [Massachusetts] Senator Scott Brown. Though I suspect the good people of New Hampshire are not easily taken in, Scott Brown will have considerable funding from outside conservative groups bent on portraying him as a genuine New Hampshire article. It is incumbent on us to help her gather the resources to withstand the GOP attacks. Sen. Shaheen is the first Democratic Senator from New Hampshire elected since 1980 – and she deserves a second term.

She serves on the Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Small Business Committees.

The reception will be held on Tuesday, July 22nd from 6:00-7:30 PM at my home in Georgetown, at 3417 P Street NW.

Further background on Senator Shaheen can be found below, and event details are below and in the attached invitation.

Bain & Paige Ennis, Paige Reffe, and Damon Wilson and I hope you can join us on July 22nd.

All the best,

Nelson

Please join

Nelson Cunningham, Bain & Paige Ennis

Paige Reffe, and Damon Wilson

for a reception honoring

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Jeanne Shaheen (D-NH)

Tuesday July 22, 2014
6:00 PM – 7:30 PM

The Home of Nelson Cunningham
3417 P. St NW
Washington, DC 20007

Host: $2,600
Sponsor: $1000
Individual: $500

To RSVP, contact Tony Yost at 202-547-5797 or Tony@bhstrategiesllc.com
Paid for by Shaheen for Senate

About Jeanne Shaheen

The only woman in U.S. history to be elected both a Governor and a United States Senator, Jeanne Shaheen has been committed to serving the citizens of New Hampshire and is known for her common-sense leadership, hard work and dedication to improving the lives of the middle class. She has served in the United States Senate since 2009 and is a member of the Senate Committees on Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Small Business and Entrepreneurship.

As a former small business owner, Senator Shaheen has worked to keep the U.S. economy competitive in the global marketplace through her efforts on the Small Business Committee and through legislation such as the Small Business Jobs Act and the Small Business Innovation Research program. The first New Hampshire Governor to lead trade missions outside North America, Senator Shaheen has also co-sponsored legislation to help small businesses sell their products overseas. Her annual "Experience New Hampshire" event in Washington, D.C., gives New Hampshire businesses a forum to showcase their products and services.

Senator Shaheen has become a champion for families facing hardship during the recession. She led Senate efforts to pass a critical extension of unemployment benefits to help struggling families. Her state staff has made it a priority to help out-of-work families navigate the federal bureaucracy, including thousands of families facing foreclosure.

To strengthen the economy in the long term, Senator Shaheen is committed to addressing the federal government's long-term deficits. In the Senate, energy efficiency has remained a priority for Shaheen and she has introduced a bipartisan debt-reduction plan, and has introduced bills to reform our budget process, and to phase out unnecessary subsidies for U.S.sugar growers and for gold and silver mining. She cosponsored measures to cut government spending on vehicles by 20 percent and to eliminate unneeded tax breaks for major oil companies and ethanol production.

As a long-standing advocate for energy efficiency, Shaheen created programs while Governor that saved New Hampshire families and businesses over $1 billion through energy efficiency. In the Senate, Shaheen introduced bipartisan legislation that would create a national energy efficiency strategy to foster job creation, save businesses and consumers money and reduce pollution. She was successful in passing several provisions of her energy efficiency plan that will help businesses create jobs and consumers reduce energy costs. According to a study by the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy (ACEEE) Shaheen-Portman is estimated to create more than 190,000 jobs, save consumers $16.2 billion a year, and cut CO2 emissions and other air pollutants by the equivalent of taking 22 million cars off the road – all by 2030.

As the former chair of the Foreign Relations Subcommittee on European Affairs, Senator Shaheen was an outspoken proponent of the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (New START). She helped to secure its ratification, enabling the U.S. to resume critical inspections of Russia's nuclear arsenal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, Shaheen has also continued the work she began as Governor to protect jobs at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, Pease International Tradeport and New Hampshire's defense-related companies. She has worked to ensure that policies supporting our active-duty troops are accessible to our National Guard forces and their families as well. Shaheen is the Chair of the Subcommittee on Readiness and Management Support, a position that puts her in a strong position to advocate for military families and programs that are important to New Hampshire and the nation – including the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard and Pease Air National Guard Base.

Shaheen also serves on the Senate Appropriations Committee, where she chairs the Subcommittee on the Legislative Branch. After balancing a budget as a mother, small business owner, and governor, Senator Shaheen understands that every dollar we spend must deliver results. She is committed to fiscal responsibility and knows that public officials have a fundamental duty to make sure taxpayer money is used effectively and efficiently.

Shaheen served as Governor of New Hampshire from 1997 to 2003. During her time in the statehouse, she helped create nearly 67,000 new jobs while keeping New Hampshire's tax burden the lowest in the country. (Learn more about Jeanne Shaheen's three terms as Governor.)

Between her time as Governor and election to the U.S. Senate, Shaheen served as the Director of Harvard University's Institute of Politics at the Kennedy School of Government.

Shaheen was born in Saint Charles, Missouri. Her father worked his way up to a management position in a shoe company and her mother worked as a secretary in their local church. After attending public schools, Shaheen received a bachelor's degree from Shippensburg University in Pennsylvania and a master's degree from the University of Mississippi. She and her husband, Bill, live in Madbury and have three daughters, Stefany, Stacey and Molly, and seven grandchildren.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 9:00:59 AM
Subject: Re: Ben Gemen policy background

Yep, you're all good to call him at 5:00 or even later if it takes you longer to get here or home. His best number is his desk line: 202-266-7429

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:56 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
> Yep I have a number and I will call him now to ask. Will circle back.
>
> On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:54 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> wrote:
> > Can you call Ben and see if I can cal him at 5:00
> > Get a number.
> >
> > On Jun 29, 2015 3:19 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
> > > Trevor just followed up with the below. His cell is 917-755-5446 just in case you want to call.
> > >
> > > _____
> > >
> > > We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:
> > >
> > > - investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future
> > >
> > > - protecting families from pollution
> > >
> > > - safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence
> > >
> > > - preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.
> > >
> > > On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:14 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:
> > > > Hi John-
> > > >
> > > > Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.
> > > >
> > > > Thanks,
> > > > Milia
> > > >
> > > > Note From Trevor Houser:
> > > >
> > > > "Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:
> > > >
> > > > 1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
> > > > 2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and > > > > 3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.
> > > >
> > > > The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."
> > > >
> > > > Secretary of State Record
> > > >
> > > > As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)
> > > >
> > > > She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing
> > > >
> > > > Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting
> > > >
> > > > She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

To: John Podesta, Jake Sullivan, Maya Harris and Dan Schwerin

From: Energy and Climate Team

Date: June 29, 2015

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 7/30/2014 1:58:53 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday July 30, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday July 30, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Slate: "Ready for Anything"

[Subtitle:] "David Brock's super PAC network is fending off every attack on Hillary Clinton. The book tour is barely the end of Round 1."

MSNBC: "Clinton welcomes 'healthy' Democratic primary contest"

"Hillary Clinton may be the prohibitive, if undeclared, frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, but she still thinks it'd be 'healthy' for the party to have a contested primary, she said Tuesday."

Blue Nation Review: Hillary's a Flip Flopper? Nah, That's Just GOP Drivel

"And see, that's the beauty of rancid political institutions like the RNC. They're in the business of tearing people down, people like former First Lady and Senator and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, private citizens like Hillary Clinton. That's what the RNC is really really good at: tearing people down."

Media Matters for America: "Right-Wing Media Distort Hillary Clinton's Comments To Falsely Claim She Endorsed Hamas"

"Right-wing media selectively edited comments made by Hillary Clinton to falsely accuse her of endorsing Hamas' extremist tactics. But Clinton made clear that Israel has a right to defend itself and credited its measures to decrease civilian casualties."

Fusion: "Hillary Clinton thinks the Cuban embargo has been a failure"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton told Fusion's Jorge Ramos that the she thinks the Cuban embargo has been a failure."

Tampa Bay Times (F.L.) blog: The Buzz: "Hillary Clinton: End the Cuban embargo"

"Hillary Clinton, in an interview with Fusion airing tonight, repeats her call to end the Cuban embargo."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton: Redskins name 'insensitive'"

"Hillary Clinton says the Washington Redskins need a name change."

RIGHT WING ATTACK DU JOUR: RECORD WILL BE CORRECTED

Washington Examiner: "State Department approved 215 Bill Clinton speeches, controversial consulting deal worth $48m; Hillary Clinton's COS copied on all decisions"

"A joint investigation by the Washington Examiner and the nonprofit watchdog group Judicial Watch found that former President Clinton gave 215 speeches and earned $48 million while his wife presided over U.S. foreign policy"

Mother Jones: "Quote of the Day: 'The Press Loves to Cover Her Hard'"

"The press has never liked Hillary, and she's never liked them, and that's that. If she decides to run for president, this is going to be one of her biggest problems—or maybe her biggest, period."

Facebook post: Sen. Ted Cruz

"Hillary Clinton seems to fundamentally misunderstand the problem. Hamas doesn't put rockets in schools, mosques, hospitals, and homes because 'Gaza is pretty small.'"

Articles:

Slate: "Ready for Anything"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By David Weigel

July 29, 2014, 4:26 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] David Brock's super PAC network is fending off every attack on Hillary Clinton. The book tour is barely the end of Round 1.

Hillary Clinton's face looms over the offices of Correct the Record—in a friendly way. The young PR operation's 18 workers do their typing and designing and debunking next to a blown-up version of that 2011 photo in which the former secretary of state is checking her BlackBerry on a flight from Malta to Tripoli, behind dark sunglasses. That photo inspired the Texts From Hillary Tumblr, and was painted on the Ready for Hillary PAC's bus before it started schlepping around the country.

It's kitsch from Clinton's finest hour, from the postelection, pre-Benghazi period when a pundit could call her "a great secretary of state" and hear no coughing or guffawing. A few steps away, past the shelves full of David Brock's books—his 2002 memoir of the conservative movement he left, and the much less heretical 2012 The Fox Effect—sits American Bridge's president, Brad Woodhouse.

American Bridge is the permanent campaign that's currently trying to save the election for Democrats. Correct the Record, launched in November 2013, is a subsidiary focused on the next election. Both organizations live to fight Republicans, just as Media Matters—the Brock project from which all of this grew—lives to rebut "conservative misinformation" in the press.

But Media Matters and American Bridge respond to everything. Correct the Record has only one mission. In an interview with David Freedlander, Brock said he dreamed up the project after Republicans held hearing after hearing on Benghazi. "There was no, or limited, capacity for her to deal with the range of attacks," he said, referring to Clinton. In October, Brock co-authored a book titled The Benghazi Hoax, and within weeks Correct the Record was there to insist that "Hillary Clinton was the 'most on top of the situation' on the night of the attack."

I dropped by the Brock-verse a few weeks after the release of Clinton's memoir Hard Choices. The conventional wisdom is that the tour could have gone better—more book sales, fewer verbal somersaults about her wealth and gay marriage stance.

Correct the Record wants everyone to know that the media blew it. It had been sending out weekly updates of Clinton book sales, because there was a story out there that she was flopping. The first memo, from July 2, ran to more than 4,000 words, and insisted, "Critics have praised the authenticity and insight of the former Secretary of State's new memoir" and that "Hard Choices sold more in its third week than Rand Paul and Jeb Bush's books did total, combined!" (Exclamation point in the original.)

Woodhouse wants me to appreciate the long game that CTR is playing. They don't just do rapid response, though of course they're "very good" at it.

"You can hand people a list of 100 Hillary Clinton accomplishments, or 30, or whatever, from the State Department or her life, and nobody's even reporting on them," says Woodhouse, sitting behind his two computer screens and a TV tuned to MSNBC. "They're reporting on whether she had a gaffe. But one thing Correct the Record is doing is citing and placing a lot of op-eds, putting surrogates out on TV, to talk about her accomplishments. And all that stuff is going to be somewhere for someone to use later on."

Right. It's not like CTR can force the media to use this material. It can only politely inform the press that it's falling for right-wing spin. CTR's own spin has described an attack on the Clintons' wealth as an attack on the "profoundly American success and philanthropy of Bill and Hillary Clinton," and criticism of her speaking fees as "relentlessly attacking Hillary Clinton for raising money for universities."

If this came from an actual campaign, reporters would choke on the chutzpah. But it doesn't. It comes from a small group led by Burns Strider, who happened to be a senior adviser to the 2008 Clinton campaign, and who argues that Clinton's book tour was an unqualified win.

"The great thing about the book tour, from my vantage point, as a guy from Mississippi who's worked all over the country, is that Secretary Clinton hasn't gone out with a giant stash of canned answers," says Strider. "She doesn't go out with a tested message. She's talking from answering and reacting to questions. You look at her town hall on CNN, on Charlie Rose, she's had an incredibly successful couple of months chatting with the American people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If you gaze too deeply at Correct the Record, you start to wonder if you've been too critical of the Clintons. That is by design. The outfit has studiously avoided intrigue and invited plenty of reporters into the inner sanctum. (This piece is at least the third that begins with a tour of the CTR bunker, though each reporter got a different estimate of the total staff—from 16 to 18 to 20.) Strider will even discuss how the organization might fend off attacks if Clinton draws a challenge from the left. "If Clinton chooses to run," he says, "she's gonna articulate her record for the future and I'd be very surprised to find it not much in line with her friends from the left."

And Brock is happy to describe what he learned in his wild days as a right-wing hack, and why the facts brought him to liberalism and the defense of the Clintons. In Blinded by the Right, he describes in detail how the right first turned on him when his reporting for a Hillary bio turned out nuanced instead of vitriol.

"Back when I wrote The Seduction of Hillary Rodham, I wrote something to the effect that I thought her potential as a political leader was such that she might end up being a more historic figure than her husband," remembers Brock. "I think the potential is still there. I try to make sure, through our work, that she gets a fair hearing, and that the media environment isn't clogged with misinformation."

Brock goes through all of the hits on Clinton, and explains why they fizzled—why they were predestined to fizzle. What about the Benghazi attack, the one that led to Correct the Record's very existence?

"The Benghazi issue is almost like birtherism at this point," says Brock. "I don't think it's doing real damage. If it's a question of where Benghazi sits in the mainstream discourse, it's largely been contained. I think we had a fair amount to do with that."

How about the Washington Free Beacon's report that dredged up—with fresh audio—the story of a young Hillary Clinton defending a child rapist?

"It was very misleading in the way it was presented, and wrong," says Brock. "So again, I don't think … " He pauses. "It got some attention and broke through to some extent, but when real reporters looked at it, it fizzled."

And what about the current wave of Clinton books? Correct the Record tears through them, but has discovered that they need little rebutting. No one in the mainstream media (excluding Fox News and the New York Post) did much with Ed Klein's Blood Feud and its mysteriously sourced quasi-scoops. Daniel Halper's Clinton, Inc., released a month after Hard Choices, was the sort of book a young Brock might have written, with named sources backing up some of the best stories. But it was no real threat to Hillary.

"I don't believe it's going to succeed as well as other conservative books in the marketplace," says Brock. "The basic approach he seems to take is that he will give you a page or two of essentially rumor or speculation, that a lot of us who are plugged into the world have heard. Then he backs out of it with various caveats. I think he doesn't deliver the kind of red meat that an Ed Klein has delivered. The conservative audience—it doesn't do caveats. And as far as its reach into mainstream conversation, there hasn't been much pickup. Reporters don't feel like any new ground has been plowed there at all."

I ping Halper and tell him what Brock thinks of his book. In no time at all, Halper points me to the rules of Clinton PR that he identified in his reporting, and identifies this as No. 3: "make any allegation unfavorable to the Clintons" into "old news."

MSNBC: "Clinton welcomes 'healthy' Democratic primary contest"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

July 29, 2014, 2:54 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton may be the prohibitive, if undeclared, frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, but she still thinks it'd be "healthy" for the party to have a contested primary, she said Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think there will probably be many candidates," she told Fusion's Jorge Ramos in an interview. "I'm not sure I'm going to run, but if I do, I think competition is healthy and if people want to get in and want to be in a primary, more power to them."

Clinton added one note of caution, however: "Now, if they come in and they say crazy things, that's not healthy, but if they say sensible things, of course that's healthy." It's unclear if she had any specific possible challengers in mind.

A majority of Democratic voters think Clinton should face a primary challenge in 2016, according to a recent Washington Post/ABC News poll, while just 28% think the former secretary of state should make it to the convention unopposed, if she decides to run.

Clinton is touring the country while promoting her new memoir, "Hard Choices," about her time at the State Department.

In the Ramos interview, Clinton also joined fellow Democrats like Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and President Obama in calling on the Washington Redskins football team to change their name. "I think it's insensitive," Clinton said, "And I think that there's no reason for it to continue as the name of a team in our nation's capital."

She declined, however, to propose alternative names.

Blue Nation Review: Hillary's a Flip Flopper? Nah, That's Just GOP Drivel

By Jimmy Williams

July 29, 2014

I'll bet you already knew the Republican National Committee is on a jihad against Hillary Clinton. You're not shocked by this. If anything, you're comforted by this because they'll just re-litigate her husband's presidency and scream "Benghazi" from now until the Second Coming. But why are you OK with all of this, with "this-gate" and "that-gate" and "their-gate" and "Benghazi-gate?" So many gates that lead to nowhere?

The reason you're OK with all of this is because the more they tear her down, the stronger she becomes. The more they overreach, the more rational she looks. The more delusion the GOP vomits forth, the healthier she actually becomes.

And see, that's the beauty of rancid political institutions like the RNC. They're in the business of tearing people down, people like former First Lady and Senator and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, private citizens like Hillary Clinton. That's what the RNC is really really good at: tearing people down.

Their latest salvo came yesterday from RNC spokeswoman Izzy Santa, who accused the former Secretary of State of flip flopping on the issue of immigration. Santa said

"Hillary Clinton wins today's flip-flopper award in her latest attempt to hispander. It's disingenuous for her to change her tune on the 2008 immigration law, within 24 hours, especially when speaking to a Hispanic journalist who serves a large Hispanic viewership. Hillary Clinton's book tour is revealing she will say just about anything to connect with the American people but her pandering will continue to take its toll on her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GayPandaI just love the word “hispandering.” It’s so, oh I don’t know, pandering–to the GOP base. It’s a hate-based word. Frankly, if I were the GOP I’d be doing a hell of a lot more pandering. Like maybe to Latinos. And women. And the LGBT community. And the black community. And the Asian community. They could even come up with words for those groups. I personally like Homopandering. While I’ve never met a gay panda, it sure does sound fun right? Or maybe Blackpandering. I remember those Black Panthers from that Forrest Gump movie but hey, maybe they’d be receptive. I don’t know. And then you could have Asianpandering but that seems a bit redundant doesn’t it? Pandas are Asian bears right? Or what about Blatinopandering? No no no, that’s just too many things for Republicans to think about in a collective manner.

But enough about Asian bears.

In all seriousness, I’m sort of the school of thought that politicians evolve on issues. Take Mittens Romney as the penultimate example of this. Back when he was running for governor of Massachusetts, Romney was adamantly pro-everybody and everything. He liked the gays and he was for a woman’s right to privacy. Then he ran for president and he “evolved” on those issues. Wait, I mean devolved. Sorry, but he went from being for people to against them. That’s called devolution folks.

Cue the Republicans. They’ve now accused Mrs. Clinton of changing her position on whether or not to deport the children crossing the Mexican/US border. In the above video interview, Clinton was asked about her position and she was damn clear: children who aren’t refugees should be given shelter while they’re here, a safe place to live and then adjudicated back to their countries. Children who are refugees and fleeing violence and murder in their home countries should be granted a safe and healthy asylum here in the US. This, by the way, is current US law.

I’m not sure what part of that isn’t a) clear and b) consistent with what she’s been saying for years.

The good news is this folks: if Mittens Romney runs again in 2016, he’s already assured the American people all these “illegals” will just self-deport. Remember that brilliant policy statement from the 2012 campaign? I sure as hell do. And since we’ve known all along what Mrs. Clinton’s views were, it looks like the immigration debate between Romney and Clinton will be a choice between a bunch of “Mexicans” running back across the border or maybe something a bit more, well, erudite.

Media Matters for America: “Right-Wing Media Distort Hillary Clinton's Comments To Falsely Claim She Endorsed Hamas”

By Thomas Bishop

July 29, 2014, 8:11 p.m. EDT

Right-wing media selectively edited comments made by Hillary Clinton to falsely accuse her of endorsing Hamas' extremist tactics. But Clinton made clear that Israel has a right to defend itself and credited its measures to decrease civilian casualties.

In an interview with Fusion TV's Jorge Ramos, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton renewed her support for a cease-fire to end the current Israeli/Hamas conflict.

Right-wing media outlets co-opted Clinton's interview to dishonestly claim that Clinton was justifying Hamas' tactics and endorsing the extremist group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On July 29, the Washington Free Beacon distorted Clinton's comments, portraying them as justification of Hamas' tactics in an article headlined "Hillary: Hamas Uses Human Shields Because 'Gaza is Pretty Small.'"

On Fox News' The Five, co-host Andrea Tantaros accused Clinton of "trying to make an excuse for Hamas" and defending Hamas "for hiding rockets in places like schools."

But the full context of the interview shows that Clinton credited Israel's attempts to prevent civilian casualties by sending warnings before airstrikes and said that "obviously Israel has a right to self-defense." Clinton noted that "any kind of conflict" has civilian casualties, but Gaza's small size and Hamas' tactics make them more acute (emphasis added):

CLINTON: I'm not a military planner, but Hamas puts its missiles -- its rockets in civilian areas. Part of it is that Gaza's pretty small and it's very densely populated. They put their command and control of Hamas military leaders in those civilian areas. Israel, I know, has sent warnings and tried to get people to move, but in any kind of conflict there are going to be civilian casualties, and we need to try to get to a cease-fire as soon as possible.

Fusion: "Hillary Clinton thinks the Cuban embargo has been a failure"

By America With Jorge Ramos

July 29, 2014, 6:29 p.m. EDT

Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton told Fusion's Jorge Ramos that the she thinks the Cuban embargo has been a failure. In an interview last friday, the possible presidential candidate was blunt in her assessment. "I think it has propped up the Castro's because they can blame everything on the embargo...everything is blamed on the embargo," she said. When Ramos asked Clinton if she would consider visiting the island for a "Nixon goes to China" moment, she responded in the affirmative. "You know, some day I'd like to go to Cuba. I would someday, yes," she said.

Tampa Bay Times (F.L.) blog: The Buzz: "Hillary Clinton: End the Cuban embargo"

By Alex Leary

July 29, 2014, 5:57 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton, in an interview with Fusion airing tonight, repeats her call to end the Cuban embargo.

"I think it has propped up the Castro's because they can blame everything on the embargo," she told host Jorge Ramos. "You don't have freedom of speech, you don't have freedom of expression, you know, you're still having political prisoners, everything is blamed on the embargo.

"I would like to see us move toward normalizing relations eventually and therefore more Americans back and forth. That's something president Obama did and I supported the first term. We do have our own political prisoner in Cuba, Alan Gross, a man who's been, you know, thrown into prison and not being given a chance to come home to his family so I'd like to see that resolved. And I would like to see us move toward ending the embargo and trying to, by our example, by commerce, by all kinds of visits, you know, help the Cuban people have a different future"

Ramos: "Are you interested in a Nixon moment going to Cuba?" Clinton: "You know, some day I'd like to go to Cuba. I would someday, yes"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton: Redskins name 'insensitive'"

By Jonathan Topaz

July 30, 2014, 6:12 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton says the Washington Redskins need a name change.

"I think it's insensitive and I think that there's no reason for it to continue as the name of a team in our nation's capital," Clinton said during an interview on Tuesday with Jorge Ramos, who asked her if she thought the name was a "racial slur."

"I would love to see the owners think hard about what they could substitute," she added.

Last month, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office on Wednesday canceled six federal trademarks of the team name because it was found to be "disparaging" to Native Americans. The decision has put more pressure on team owner Daniel Snyder — who has vowed he won't change the name — to move on the issue.

Clinton is the latest political figure to suggest the D.C.-area team change its name. In May, 50 senators — 48 Democrats and two independents — wrote NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell to urge the league to change the name. "The N.F.L. can no longer ignore this and perpetuate the use of this name as anything but what it is: a racial slur," the letter read. The letter was not circulated among Republicans.

The NFL shot down the letter later that day, saying the team wants to portray a "strong, positive and respectful image" with the name.

Last October, President Barack Obama said the nickname offends "a sizable group of people" and that if he were the owner, he would "think about changing it." And earlier this month, Attorney General Eric Holder said he thought the name should be dropped, calling it "offensive."

When Ramos asked Clinton if she had any suggestions for a new name, the potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidate laughed and said she hadn't thought of any alternatives.

Washington Examiner: "State Department approved 215 Bill Clinton speeches, controversial consulting deal worth $48m; Hillary Clinton's COS copied on all decisions"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 30, 2014, 1:00 a.m. EDT

A joint investigation by the Washington Examiner and the nonprofit watchdog group Judicial Watch found that former President Clinton gave 215 speeches and earned $48 million while his wife presided over U.S. foreign policy, raising questions about whether the Clintons fulfilled ethics agreements related to the Clinton Foundation during Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to documents obtained by Judicial Watch and released Wednesday in an ongoing Freedom of Information Act case, State Department officials charged with reviewing Bill Clinton's proposed speeches did not object to a single one.

Some of the speeches were delivered in global hotspots and were paid for by entities with business or policy interests in the U.S.

The documents also show that in June 2011, the State Department approved a consulting agreement between Bill Clinton and a controversial Clinton Foundation adviser, Doug Band.

The consultancy with Band's Teneo Strategies ended eight months later following an uproar over Teneo's ties to the failed investment firm MF Global.

State Department legal advisers, serving as "designated agency ethics officials," approved Bill Clinton's speeches in China, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, the United Arab Emirates, Panama, Turkey, Taiwan, India, the Cayman Islands and other countries.

The memos approving Mr. Clinton's speeches were routinely copied to Cheryl Mills, Hillary Clinton's senior counsel and chief of staff.

Mills is a longtime Clinton troubleshooter who defended the president during his impeachment. In the Benghazi affair, Mills reportedly berated a high-ranking official at the U.S. embassy in Libya for talking to a Republican congressman.

Under State Department protocols, a "designated agency ethics official" is assigned to advise the secretary of state about "potential or actual conflicts of interest."

In a December 2008 memorandum of understanding, the protocols were expanded to Bill Clinton, the Clinton Foundation and related initiatives — specifically, to reviewing Bill Clinton's proposed speeches and consulting deals.

In an accompanying letter to the State Department legal adviser, Clinton lawyer David Kendall noted that Bill Clinton would disclose proposed consulting deals and, for speeches, provide "the identities of the host(s) (the entity that pay the speaker's fee)" so that the State Department "in consultation with the White House as appropriate, may conduct a review for any real or apparent conflicts of interest with the duties of the Secretary of State."

But an inspection by the Examiner and Judicial Watch of donations to the Clinton Foundation, Hillary Clinton's personal financial disclosure forms, and the State Department conflict-of-interest reviews shows that at least $48 million flowed to the Clintons' personal coffers and foundation from many entities that clearly had interests in influencing the Obama administration — and perhaps currying favor with a future president as well.

Saudi Arabia, for example, was a key Clinton benefactor. The oil-producing giant has had a relationship with the Clintons dating back to Bill Clinton's time as governor of Arkansas.

In 1992, while running for president, then-Gov. Clinton secured a $3.5 million Saudi donation for a Middle East studies program at the University of Arkansas.

A few weeks after Clinton was inaugurated president, the Saudis kicked in another $20 million. Both deals were brokered by a close Clinton friend, David Edwards.

Overall, the Clinton Foundation has received staggering sums from Saudi benefactors — between $18 million and $50 million. (The foundation's donations are reported in ranges, not specific numbers.)

While Hillary Clinton served as secretary of state, Bill Clinton gave two speeches in Saudi Arabia, earning a total of $600,000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In January 2011, for example, Bill Clinton spoke at a global business forum in Riyadh founded by the Saudi Investment Authority and sponsored by the Dabbagh Group, a commercial colossus with close ties to the Saudi royal family.

His fee for the speech: $300,000.

During Hillary Clinton's time at the State Department, Bill Clinton also gave four speeches in the United Arab Emirates, earning $1.1 million. For two speeches in Egypt, he earned $425,000.

UAE-linked entities also have donated at least $2.7 to $11.5 million to the Clinton Foundation, and Egyptian entities have donated at least $250,000 to $750,000.

While the State Department did not object to Bill Clinton's speeches in the Arab world — or anywhere else — it did turn down a proposed consultancy with a longtime Clinton friend and supporter, the Israeli-American media mogul Haim Saban.

In turning down the consultancy, a February 2009 State Department memo noted that Saban "is actively involved in foreign affairs issues, particularly with regards to the Middle East, which is a priority area for the secretary."

The consultancy with Teneo and Band, the longtime Clinton adviser, was outlined in a June 2011 memo from Band himself, writing "on behalf of President Clinton," to a State Department legal adviser. Bill Clinton would advise Teneo on "geopolitical, economic and social trends."

Band requested a response within 10 business days. He got it in seven. "Please be advised that we have no objection," the State Department wrote.

Bill Clinton also was active in China, as was Hillary Clinton, who championed the notion of a "pivot" toward Asia during her time as secretary of state.

In the period after Hillary Clinton signed the ethics agreement, Bill Clinton gave four speeches in China or to Chinese-sponsored entities in the U.S., earning $1.7 million.

By comparison, between 2001 through 2007 — just after he left office, when a former president is normally most in demand — he gave seven speeches in China, earning $1.4 million.

Groups with interests in China also donated between $750,000 and $1.75 million, at a minimum, to the Clinton Foundation.

Taiwan took an interest in Bill Clinton as well. In November 2010, he spoke on global warming and social inequality at a Taipei event sponsored by Singapore-based UNI Strategic. His fee? $400,000.

The Taiwan Economic and Cultural Office donated close to $1 million to the Clinton Foundation, and the Taiwan Mobile Foundation and a semiconductor manufacturer also contributed.

Turkish sponsors paid Bill Clinton $1 million for three speeches, including one to an Arab stock exchange.

In Russia, Bill Clinton gave two speeches for $625,000. One was to the Russian investment bank, Renaissance Capital, at a 2010 event titled "Russian and the Commonwealth of Independent States: Going Global."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The State Department background memo described the bank as "focused on the emerging markets of Russia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Sub-Saharan Africa."

The Russian Standard Bank also donated to the foundation.

In India, Bill Clinton collected $300,000 for two speeches. He also gave speeches to Indian companies and the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce in Toronto, New Jersey and Disney World.

At one, a "conference on business process outsourcing/off-shoring," hosted by an outsourcing firm, the discussion centered around "the benefits and disadvantages of outsourcing IT," according to a State Department document.

In Panama, Bill Clinton earned $325,000 for one speech. And in the Cayman Islands — a notorious offshore money haven — $225,000 for a speech, noted a State Department document, "at a ticketed event that will target the business community in Grand Cayman."

Mother Jones: "Quote of the Day: 'The Press Loves to Cover Her Hard'"

By Kevin Drum

July 29, 2014, 2:49 p.m. EDT

Dave Weigel notes that the media is still obsessed with Hillary Clinton's comment about being "dead broke" when she and Bill left the White House:

"They've got to be sick of this by now. Maggie Haberman had it nailed three weeks ago: Hillary Clinton was 'still raw over the partisan wars that hindered her husband's legacy and left the couple with millions of dollars in legal debt.' Her answer, as she told Ramos, was accurate, and it's baffling to her that this became a 'gaffe.' As she continued her tour, HarperCollins was printing up copies of Clinton, Inc., a tell-all by the Weekly Standard's Daniel Halper. On Page 18, Halper recalls that in 2001 'the Clintons were broke, owing a fortune in legal fees from the many investigations into their personal lives,' and that they had to be loaned $1.3 by Terry McAuliffe. Until just a month ago, that was how even conservatives remembered the Clintons' departure from the White House."

"She has a lot of positive attributes that are currently just being overwhelmed by all this negative coverage. And it's going to keep going. The momentum—there's, there's— The press loves to cover her hard."

This comes courtesy of Bob Somerby, who's been following this ever since the initial flood-the-zone coverage of Hillary's 'gaffe' in the Washington Post. Somerby tells the rest of the story:

"Multimillionaire TV stars asked if voters would support a person as wealthy as Clinton. In response to Clinton's answers, some of the nation's most famous pundits launched their famous 'gaffe culture.'

"The Washington Post even launched a front-page jihad concerning the size of Clinton's speaking fees. In the New York Times, Maureen Dowd assailed Clinton for her 'rapacious' behavior and her 'wanton acquisitiveness,' which she was said to be passing along to her daughter.

"....Halperin made a starting suggestion—he suggested the press corps' coverage of a major candidate could determine the outcome of our next White House campaign.

"Plainly, that's what happened in Campaign 2000, when a twenty-month war against Candidate Gore let George Bush reach the White House. In the main, that war was conducted by the mainstream press corps, not by the RNC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The press corps’ poisonous war against Gore let Bush reach the White House. But it’s a basic law of the guild: Major journalists never suggest that the behavior of their own guild could have such startling effects.”

The media's preoccupation with the Clintons' wealth won't last forever. Even for the Washington press corps, it's too transparently silly to pretend that it's somehow surprising that a presidential candidate is wealthy. But Somerby and Halperin are right: it's a sign of things to come. The press has never liked Hillary, and she's never liked them, and that's that. If she decides to run for president, this is going to be one of her biggest problems—or maybe her biggest, period. She's just never going to catch a break.

Facebook post: Sen. Ted Cruz

By Sen. Ted Cruz

July 29, 2014, 2:22 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton seems to fundamentally misunderstand the problem. Hamas doesn't put rockets in schools, mosques, hospitals, and homes because "Gaza is pretty small."

Hamas does so--and tells civilians to stay there, when the rockets are about to be taken out--because they want to use the citizens of Gaza as human shields. The entire objective, for Hamas, is to have heart-wrenching pictures of dead Palestinian women and children emblazoned across the evening news, for the UN and the media to use to demonize Israel. Using civilians as human shields is a war crime, and Secretary Clinton should not be excusing it merely as a consequence of the small size of Gaza.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 9 – Water Mill, NY: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the Clinton Foundation at the home of George and Joan Hornig (WSJ)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta’s OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· ~ October 13-16 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ruth Greenspan Bell" <Ruth.Bell@wilsoncenter.org>
To: ruthgreenspanbell@gmail.com
Date: 11/17/2014 9:51:01 AM
Subject: another view on the President's climate deal with China

In this OpEd published at CNN, Barry Blechman and I argue that the President's climate deal with China can be read as part of a smart strategy of taking on smaller targets and building progress (and mutual trust) toward even more solid, incremental progress on the overarching goal of greenhouse gas emission reduction. This approach has precedent in the substantial incremental progress that has been made to contain nuclear weapons. Taking this approach does not mean giving up on the UNFCCC process, but it does mean trying more than that. Please read it at http://www.cnn.com/2014/11/14/opinion/bell-blechman-climate-obama/index.html and give us your thoughts (FYI, one of the embedded links wasn't accurately matched to the particular point made, but please ignore that -- we are working to fix it).

Best,
Ruth

Ruth Greenspan Bell
Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars
Research Associate, Center for Decision Sciences, Columbia Business School Visiting Scholar, Environmental Law Institute
Phone: WWC: 202-691 4097
U.S. Mobile: +1 202 361 2409

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 2/22/2015 8:22:04 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Sunday February 22, 2015 Roundup

Correct The Record Sunday February 22, 2015 Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton established Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to address cyber security #HRC365 correctrecord.org/11-things-you-… [2/22/15, 12:11 a.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton is "a fighter for the marginalized, a voice for the struggling, & a comforter for the overburdened." http://www.hpenews.com/opinion/x1707095788/Guest-Column-Clinton-s-message-resonates-with-millennials … [2/21/15, 2:51 p.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@ATBarnhill : "Clinton's message resonates with millennials" hpenews.com/opinion/x17070…via @hpenterprise [2/21/15, 12:39 p.m. EST]

Headlines:

Washington Post: McAuliffe: 'No need' for Clinton to start 2016 bid right away

"Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe, a longtime Clinton family friend and political supporter, said that he sees 'no need' for Hillary Rodham Clinton to begin her 2016 presidential campaign right away and that she benefits by avoiding a bruising Democratic primary challenge."

Huffington Post: Hillary Clinton And The Not Too Bitter, Not Too Smooth, Just Right Primary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“At this point, it sure looks like Hillary Clinton can grab the nomination without too much trouble. Trouble is, some trouble might be a nice thing to have.”

ABC News: One Thing That Might Surprise You About Hillary Clinton

"5] Covering Clinton, what is one thing that has surprised you about her?

Amy Chozick: Hmm. She likes to drink. We were on the campaign trail in 2008 and the press thought she was just taking shots to pander to voters in Pennsylvania. Um, no."

Politico: Bernie Sanders not eager to ‘tilt at windmills’ in 2016

“Sanders didn’t mention the presumed Democratic frontrunner, Hillary Clinton, by name in an interview that aired Sunday on ABC’s ‘This Week,’ but said, if he decides to seek the White House, he isn’t sure he would run as a Democrat.”

Bloomberg: John Kasich Swats at Rand Paul, Hillary Clinton as He Considers 2016

“Asked about Clinton, Kasich said, ‘You know, I like Hillary, but I'm not ever going to be for her for president.’"

NBC News opinion: Giuliani's Comments Don't Hurt the GOP, They Help Hillary

“If Republicans can't get over their Obama derangement syndrome it just makes it that much easier for Hillary to say ‘Obama isn't on the ballot!’ and define herself. It's already going to be hard to tag her with the Obama administration because everyone knows she disagrees with the President a lot.”

New York Times opinion: Hillary, Jeb and $$$$$$

“And in the income-inequality era, how does a candidate crowned with this many dollar signs put herself forward persuasively as a woman of the people and a champion of the underdog?”

Washington Post: The making of Hillary 5.0: Marketing wizards help re-imagine Clinton brand

'"I just want America to know the Hillary Clinton I know,' said Jerry Crawford, a friend and the Iowa chairman of Clinton’s 2008 campaign. 'I want as many people as possible to get to know the woman I’ve seen behind closed doors. She’s bright, disciplined, quick to throw her head back and laugh — just a very, very attractive person.'"

Associated Press: For Clinton, her family foundation may pose campaign risks

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The foundation launched by former President Bill Clinton more than a decade ago has battled HIV and AIDS in Africa, educated millions of children and fed the poor and hungry around the globe. It also has the potential to become a political risk for Hillary Rodham Clinton as she moves toward a second presidential campaign.”

Articles:

Washington Post: McAuliffe: ‘No need’ for Clinton to start 2016 bid right away

By Philip Rucker

February 22, 2015 10:10 a.m. EST

Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe, a longtime Clinton family friend and political supporter, said that he sees "no need" for Hillary Rodham Clinton to begin her 2016 presidential campaign right away and that she benefits by avoiding a bruising Democratic primary challenge.

"Listen, I'm very happy with the situation," McAuliffe said Saturday in an interview with The Washington Post. "She doesn't have to get in right away. It's saving a lot of time, effort and money. Let the Republicans all get in."

McAuliffe, who served as national co-chairman of Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign and as the Democratic National Committee chairman during the 2004 presidential primaries, said he knows from experience that launching a campaign early can be draining. He pointed out that in the 1992 campaign, Bill Clinton did not announce his candidacy until October 1991.

"Having done this for many years, the second you get in and open up a campaign account, let me tell you, that money just goes out the door," McAuliffe said. "There’s no need at this point. We’re in a very good position, so she can take her time on her timetable, which is spectacular."

McAuliffe, who once sat on the board of the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, defended the charitable foundation's decision to accept donations from foreign governments.

“If the biggest attack on Hillary’s going to be that she raised too much money for her charity, okay, I’ll take that," he said. "No one’s alleging anything beyond that she raised money and people gave her money and foreign governments gave her money. At the end of the day, that’s fine. It went to a charity. It helped a lot of people."

McAuliffe's comments come amid much discussion in Democratic circles about Clinton's timetable for what her allies think is a certain 2016 White House run. Clinton's team has signaled that she is likely to begin raising money as early as April but may delay aggressive campaigning until the summer. Some Democrats believe she is wise to hang back and wait, while others want to see her fighting now to erase any impressions that she may be taking the Democratic nomination for granted.

At this stage in the 2008 campaign, the Democratic field already had taken shape, with announced candidacies of Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards, among others. But this time, Clinton does not face a serious primary threat.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) has insisted that she is not running, despite an effort by some liberal activists to draft her into the race, while Vice President Biden is not actively preparing for a candidacy, although he has not shut the door on a run. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former senator Jim Webb (Va.) have been making waves and visiting early primary states, but none has launched a campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"People are going to make their decision," McAuliffe said. "If they run, they run. If they don't, they don't."

McAuliffe said he disagreed with the view of some Democrats that a competitive primary campaign would be good for Clinton and would help prepare her for the rigors of the general election.

"What's going to go on on the Republican side is going to be intense and tough," McAuliffe said. "I wouldn't want to see that on the Democratic side — of course not, if we can avoid it. It's going to be a long, tough slog for them."

McAuliffe was asked to assess the early moves of former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who has locked up many of the Republican Party's prominent donors and policy thinkers in the two months since he formed a leadership PAC to explore a bid.

"None of that surprised me," McAuliffe said. "At the end of the day, it's still hard because of, obviously, the negative issues around his brother, the issues of the war in Iraq and all that. That's still going to linger out there. You've got to remember, when President Obama took office, you think of the job losses that occurred under President [George W.] Bush's term and contrast that to the millions of jobs created under President Obama. I'll take that contrast."

McAuliffe continued, "Jeb Bush, who wants to pretend he can distance himself, cannot distance himself from that failed economic record and failed foreign policy record. All of the issues that we had before will come back to [the] fore."

As for what role McAuliffe may play in a Clinton 2016 campaign, he said he would be her loudest cheerleader in Richmond.

"I have the job I've always dreamed of," McAuliffe said. "I love being governor, as you probably can tell." In 2007 and 2008, he said, "I spent 500 days on the road. I can't do that again. I've got a job here."

"You know what?" he continued, "to be honest with you, I'm personal friends with them. They want me to be successful. Honestly, [the] president calls all the time. I talk to Hillary all the time. They want me to be successful as a governor. I think that's the best thing I can do."

He said that Virginia is poised once more to be a top general election battleground and that he would focus on helping Clinton win his home state. McAuliffe is preparing for state legislative races this year and is trying to help Democrats regain control of the state Senate.

"I'm laying the groundwork and putting all the pieces in place for '15 to get my Senate back," McAuliffe said. "But that same team I'm putting in place and operations will be a set-up to make sure that [in 2016] Virginia's blue."

Huffington Post: Hillary Clinton And The Not Too Bitter, Not Too Smooth, Just Right Primary

By Jason Linkins

February 22, 2015 7:30 a.m. EST

Every election cycle can be considered, first and foremost, a monument to hype. With every passing week, the political world is a blizzard of brash predictions, bold pronouncements and bad advice. This year, your Speculatroners shall attempt to decode and defang this world with a regular dispatch that we're calling "This Week In Coulda Shoulda Maybe." We hope this helps, but as always, we make no guarantees!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It shouldn't be controversial to say that at this point in the 2016 race, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton enjoys virtually every possible advantage in the Democratic primary field. She's the best-known candidate with the highest level of name recognition and visibility. She has a long-nurtured campaign apparatus and the ability to call campaign infrastructure into being on the fly. Against the rest of the Democratic field, she's the overwhelming favorite in every poll that's ever been conducted.

Of course, anytime we talk about a "Democratic field," we should really say, "insofar as one exists." Her competition -- so far a dimly lit constellation of long shots (and perhaps the current vice president) -- isn't shaping up as a particularly robust challenge. Clinton plays a role in that simply by looming on the landscape. As has been discussed previously, Clinton has the power to "freeze the field" -- meaning that her dominance is such that Democratic party elites and mega-donors are loath to invest in a competitor, creating a sort of vicious cycle in which no viable competitors can truly present themselves.

There is a very real possibility that Clinton could face only a nominal challenge in a Democratic primary, and potentially none at all. And that's produced an interesting phenomenon among the members of the political media who, expecting a competitive primary to generate monetizable content and grist for "The Narrative," find themselves somewhere in the middle of a story that doesn't seem to have started. This is how you can understand the constant attention given to Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren -- a woman who is not running for president -- as a "foil" for Clinton. Every great protagonist needs an antagonist, and the political press would dearly love, if possible, to will one into being.

Elsewhere, there are the Hot Takes, suffused by the media's drug of choice, counter-intuition. Are all the advantages that Clinton secretly holds actually disadvantages in disguise? Is Clinton's ability to quelch all viable contenders for the Democratic nomination actually the Achilles heel that will lead to her undoing? A better question might be: Are all the people offering that opinion simply planting a flag for a future "Told ya so" story down the line?

I think it's fair to say that most of us, if we wanted something important (like, say, a job), wouldn't spend much time regretting the news that we were the only person in the running. Just about everyone would prefer to win in a blowout. At the same time, there is something that we all understand instinctually about the nature of competition: It tests mettle. And the old eyeball test informs us of the virtues of tested mettle. When we look at the 27-1 Gonzaga University men's basketball team alongside the other basketball teams in the top four of the NCAA's national rankings, many of us downgrade the Bulldogs because we know that they didn't play against the same level of competition as Kentucky, Virginia and Duke did. So, in the back of our mind, Gonzaga looms as a paper tiger.

That said, eventually Gonzaga is going to have ample opportunity to show that they're superior to their competition -- just like Clinton will, even if she runs in an uncontested primary.

Of course, the fact that there isn't already vigorous competition for Clinton to face tells us a few potentially ominous things. First and foremost, it shows that the Democratic Party's bench is not terribly deep right now. Elections are, at bottom, a competition of ideas -- one in which a losing candidate's vision may persist beyond the candidate's own electoral hopes. That's a good thing for any political party. Furthermore, a quickly decided primary could negatively impact state-level political organizing, which in turn would impact the vitality of down-ticket campaigns.

But let's stick with the question: Is Hillary running virtually unopposed a bad thing? As Vox's Matt Yglesias points out, having a competitive primary means "real debates, real media strategy, real policy rollouts, and all the other accompaniments of a presidential nominating congress." He goes on to note that "competition" in this instance goes well beyond simply having other credible opponents:

A vigorous primary campaign is a means through which, among other things, the key potential vulnerabilities in a candidate's biography get aired. Was Clinton lying about her opposition to gay marriage the way David Axelrod says Obama was? Have too many years at the pinnacle of American politics left her out of touch with middle class struggles? Can she distance herself from Obama administration foreign policy initiatives that didn't work out (settlement freeze? Russia reset?) without sounding disloyal or ineffectual? Can she answer questions about the complicated finances underlying her husband's foundation?

As long as she's "not running," we just don't know. And the closer she gets to obtaining the nomination without answering the questions, the more vulnerable the position she leaves herself in for the general election.

Here's the thing: All of that is smart-sounding stuff. It's thoughtful argument that appeals to our instincts. You can take that to a Beltway soiree or the set of a Sunday morning talk show, and with a little charm, you'll hold up. And yet, it's still really just gut feelings. It's still that instinct that pushes you to take an at-large team from the ACC deeper in the tourney than the one-loss Western Conference champions -- a good enough gamble that could, nonetheless, leave your bracket in tatters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it's worth pointing out that over on the GOP side, Republican elites are making their own set of gambles with their primary. The Republican National Committee's interpretation of their 2012 cycle woes has led them to believe that the long primary cost them dearly. The RNC believes that their primary afforded too many fleeting also-rans too much media coverage, that the length of the competition provided too many opportunities for their party to be shown in a bad light, and that ultimately, everything conspired to force their nominee into a bunch of positions from which the extrication was too difficult. They have, subsequently, undertaken a number of moves to "fix" this problem, and while they've not created a situation in which one candidate has a massive advantage over everyone else, it's still a drive toward limiting the competition, all based on some gut feelings.

Can we get closer to the truth of how, if at all, a competitive primary brings benefits -- or pitfalls -- to candidates? Well, if we turn to political science, there seems to be one constant notion: A competitive primary is very good for candidates, right up to where the competitive primary becomes a divisive primary, at which point the benefits of competition tend to fade.

The virtues of competitive primaries are hotly debated, as it turns out. Back in February of 2008, The Monkey Cage's John Sides embarked on an exploration of the topic, noting that the most relevant research at the time pointed to other factors as being far more determinative of success in a general election. From a gambler's point of view, the health of the economy and the popular regard for the presidential incumbent matter a lot more than what happens during a primary.

But Josh Putnam, proprietor of Frontloading HQ, nevertheless saw something interesting in the notion that a competitive primary could take a dark, blowback-producing turn. Just as the RNC concluded after the 2012 cycle, the factor that fascinated Putnam in 2008 was timing -- the notion that on a long enough timeline, a competitive primary eventually, maybe inevitably, turns divisive. Per Putnam:

At what point does the positive competitiveness of the race for delegates turn into the negative, party-splitting divisiveness? Should Clinton do well in Ohio and Texas on Tuesday, then 2008 may have reached that point for the Democrats. But in the Super Tuesday era (1988/1992-2004), no challenger has been afforded such an opportunity. That era was marked by frontrunners who were able to snuff out insurgencies before competitiveness turned to divisiveness. ... [Walter] Mondale quelled Gary Hart before a movement started (No, this isn't within the era I defined above but it is a good example.). George W. Bush kept [John] McCain at bay. And [John] Kerry silenced John Edwards. Competitiveness yielded to reality in all three cases before divisiveness took hold or could attempt to take hold.

It's almost as if there's a sort of "uncanny valley" phenomenon happening, in which competition elevates everyone until it gets too hot or turns too personal. There's a sweet spot: Ideally, you want your level of competition to be challenging, but not bedeviling. You want the primary race to look like a collegial bit of tire-kicking, not a campaign in which you're sending arsonists out to torch the rival dealership. So maybe all of the people who continually pen that "Elizabeth Warren versus Hillary Clinton" fan fiction are onto something, instinctually: They have a sense that the Jim Webbs and Martin O'Malleys of the world might not make it out of Iowa and that Clinton needs someone who can stay in the game long enough to make it to Super Tuesday. But not much further than that.

In the end, that data-driven conclusion about competitive primaries that we really want remains elusive -- or at the very least, not strong enough to talk us out of our horse-sense feelings on the matter. But let's return to one last study, cited by The Monkey Cage's Jonathan Robinson, about that 2008 competition between Clinton and Barack Obama:

Using a survey that tracked individual voters from the primary to the general election, Michael Henderson, D. Sunshine Hillygus, and Trevor Thompson ... examine whether and why Clinton supporters did or did not support Obama in the general election. They find that 71% of Clinton supporters ended up voting for Obama. Moreover, supporters of Clinton and the other Democratic candidates were no more likely to stay home on Election Day. The most important factors that predicted a vote for McCain among supporters of the other Democratic candidates were not frustration with the primary election’s outcome but ideology and political issues, especially the Iraq War.

All of that suggests that even though the 2008 Democratic primary got fiercely competitive, it still stoked an energy that lasted throughout the election cycle, ensuring that Democratic voters stayed engaged over the long haul. Perhaps what a political party, ideally, wants out of a primary is a contest where the competitiveness fosters some amount of voter engagement without tipping into a grotesque spectacle that leaves those who had engaged with it feeling nauseous, discouraged and just plain done with politics for the year.

Handled the right way, a contested primary creates a number of "products" organically that would need to be manufactured by other means in a non-contested primary. Competition helps to present those Big Ideas to the electorate, a vision of the future for which to fight. It breeds passion and gets voters to start using those muscles of commitment, which eventually get them out of the house and to the polls on Election Day. Perhaps most importantly, it allows the candidates to make connections with those activist members of the electorate, who'll use their muscles to make sure those committed voters know how to get to those polls on time.

At this point, it sure looks like Hillary Clinton can grab the nomination without too much trouble. Trouble is, some trouble might be a nice thing to have.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ABC News: One Thing That Might Surprise You About Hillary Clinton

By Benjamin Bell

February 21, 2015 3:08 p.m. EST

This week, we asked Amy Chozick, national political reporter for the The New York Times, who covers Hillary Clinton, about when the former secretary of state might announce her 2016 intentions, her possible competition and one thing that surprised Chozick about Clinton.

Read our conversation below before Chozick appears on the “This Week” roundtable Sunday.

1] Hillary Clinton has not said she is running for president, although obviously many people assume she will. If she does, what do we know about when she might announce?

Amy Chozick: The conventional wisdom is that she would establish some sort of exploratory committee to begin raising money in April. She could then do a splashy public rollout of an official campaign later in the spring or early summer. But the exploratory committee would give Clinton the legal apparatus to begin to raise and spend money for a political campaign.

2] Clinton’s Twitter account has been closely watched since she started tweeting. Do we know who is in control of that account and the strategy behind it?

Amy Chozick: I think we might be overanalyzing. Clinton, apparently, handles her own Twitter account and enjoys the medium. Just look what it did for her with the “Texts from Hillary” meme. Tweeting allows her to comment (albeit in 140 characters) on events of the day in a very controlled, but heavily disseminated way. That beats the unpredictability of a press conference, at least for now.

3] The New York Times reported Clinton met with Sen. Elizabeth Warren in December. Do they [team Clinton] perceive her as a threat to a possible Clinton candidacy for president? And if so, how large? Also, is there a specific Republican that team Clinton perceives would pose the biggest challenge to Clinton should she decide to run and secure the nomination?

Amy Chozick: Sen. Warren says she is not running for president, but she has had a significant impact on the national conversation, especially about Wall Street and inequality and how Clinton and the Democratic Party writ large address those issues. On the Republican side, Jeb Bush is currently perceived as the biggest threat. He has name recognition, appeals to Latinos, and has deep coffers and some centrist appeal.

4] At this point, who are Clinton’s closest advisers? Should Clinton decide to run for president, who might be at the top of the power structure? Who might run her campaign?

Amy Chozick: Many of the same loyal aides who have been with Clinton since the White House (when her team was known as Hillaryland) continue to serve as her closest advisers, but a lot of newcomers will come on board for a 2016 campaign. John Podesta, who worked in former President Bill Clinton and President Obama’s administrations, is expected to serve as a campaign chairman.

5] Covering Clinton, what is one thing that has surprised you about her?

Amy Chozick: Hmm. She likes to drink. We were on the campaign trail in 2008 and the press thought she was just taking shots to pander to voters in Pennsylvania. Um, no.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: Bernie Sanders not eager to 'tilt at windmills' in 2016

By Caitlin Emma

February 22, 2015 11:53 a.m. EST

Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders has been in Iowa again, railing against the Koch brothers, calling for economic justice and trying to gauge whether there's enough grassroots support for a presidential run.

Sanders didn't mention the presumed Democratic frontrunner, Hillary Clinton, by name in an interview that aired Sunday on ABC's "This Week," but said, if he decides to seek the White House, he isn't sure he would run as a Democrat.

"The fact that I'm in Iowa, which is a caucus state, maybe speaks for itself," he said. "But I haven't made that final decision. And I got to tell you that a lot of my strong supporters say Bernie, 'Stay out of the damn Democratic Party. Run as an Independent.'"

Sanders is the longest serving Independent member of Congress at 24 years. In Iowa, he told supporters that he was ready to take on the "billionaire class," railing against the corrupting influence of money in politics.

"The United States government has got to start working for the middle class and families of this country and not just millionaires and billionaires," he said. "It is likely that within a very short period of time, the Koch brothers themselves will have a stronger political presence than either the Democratic or Republican Party."

Asked whether he could win a presidential race, Sanders said it was a "fair question." He doesn't want to "tilt at windmills," he said, or attack imaginary enemies like the famous literary character Don Quixote.

"I've got so much to do," the senator said. "But I just think that out there, there are so many people who are hurting, so many people who are disillusioned, so many people who are viscerally upset that they work long hours for low wages and the billionaires are getting richer. They need a voice."

Bloomberg: John Kasich Swats at Rand Paul, Hillary Clinton as He Considers 2016

By Ali Elkin

February 22, 2015 12:28 p.m. EST

[Subtitle] The Ohio governor says all his "options are on the table" when it comes to running for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ohio Governor John Kasich is offering a preview of how he would tangle with potential rivals Rand Paul and Hillary Clinton if he runs for president.

In an interview airing Sunday on CNN's State of the Union, Kasich defended his decision take Medicaid expansion money under Obamacare, which fellow Republican Paul has called a move by governors who think money grows on trees.

"You know, Matthew 25 says that it's about how you treat the widowed, how you treat the poor, how you treat the hungry," Kasich said. "How do you clothe those who have no clothes? That is a conservative position to help them get on their feet so they then can assume their rightful place in our society."

In Kentucky, he added, "maybe everybody's fine, maybe there aren't people who are suffering these problems." The state had the seventh-highest poverty rate in the U.S. (including the District of Columbia) in a 2011-2013 average, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

Asked about Clinton, Kasich said, "You know, I like Hillary, but I'm not ever going to be for her for president."

He suggested that he'd continue to speak out on foreign policy, in which Clinton was involved as President Barack Obama's secretary of state from 2009 to 2013. "Hopefully whether I do this or not, I can have somewhat of a voice when it comes to the fact that America, you know, it just seems to be in retreat," he said.

Whether Kasich will meet Paul in the presidential primary is unclear.

"All my options are on the table, and it's a process that I, you know, have really not spent an enormous amount of time studying internally," said Kasich, who has been traveling to campaign for a balanced-budget amendment to the U.S. constitution. "But look, I'm not saying I won't, I'm not saying I will, I'm leaving my options out there and we'll just see how things develop."

NBC News opinion: Giuliani's Comments Don't Hurt the GOP, They Help Hillary

By Jason Johnson

February 22, 2015 12:34 p.m. EST

This week former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani said that President Obama doesn't love you, me or America.

He said that the President has been under the influence of communists since he was 9 years old, and that Obama is likely a socialist or an anti-communist. And despite the handwringing on the right and left, his words don't really harm anyone.

Not the Republican brand, not his own reputation or even any of the Republicans who have backed his statements. However he did just HELP Hillary Clinton, and if the GOPis serious about 2016 they should be worried about any statements actions or thoughts that get her closer to the White House.

This all started last week when Giuliani was giving a speech at a posh Manhattan Dinner party for likely Presidential candidate Scott Walker last Wednesday, when Rudy said: "I do not believe — and I know this is a horrible thing to say — but I do not believe that this President loves America."

Apparently that didn't bring the point home enough because the former mayor of New York city kept going in on Obama, with any media outlet that'd let him talk.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Fox & Friends: "What I'm saying is, in his rhetoric I very rarely hear the things that I used to hear Ronald Reagan say, the things that I used to hear Bill Clinton say about how much he loves America. I do hear him criticize America much more often than other American Presidents. And when it's not in the context of an overwhelming number of statements about the exceptionalism of America, it sounds like he's more of a critic than he is a supporter."

He added, "You can be a patriotic American and be a critic, but then you're not expressing that kind of love that we're used to from a President."

Basically by the end of the week Giuliani was doing everything short of asking for another copy of Obama's birth certificate and asking for his whereabouts on the morning of 9-11. Many in the press and some Republican commentators have said Giuliani's comments are harmful to the Republican brand, and slowly but surely Rand Paul, Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush have come to not quite critique Giuliani but claim that their disagreement with Obama has always been more about policy than whether he loves America.

Governor Bobby Jindal and former Congresswoman Michele Bachmann have come out in support of Giuliani's statements and have earned praise and scorn for their courage or cowardice depending on how you lean politically. Ultimately none of this matters, and this entire tempest in a teapot is probably giving the Clinton campaign goosebumps.

First, Rudy Giuliani is not saying anything new, not for him, and not for many people in the Republican party base. From conservative commentators like Mark Levin to rank-and-file Republicans, the belief that Obama doesn't love America is not new, and it didn't take us losing the war against ISIS for many conservatives to question his patriotism, faith and love of country. It's just a very common belief system among the base of the modern Republican party.

The best way to tag the party nominee of a two term president is to claim they'll essentially be that president's third term. The more the GOP makes this race about Obama, the easier it'll be for Hillary Clinton to draw contrasts between herself and his administration.

Remember the whole 'flag pin' incident? Yes we all know from a moral and statesmanship perspective that this kind of language is racist and counter-productive for the United States but when in the last 7 years have we seen anyone in American campaign politics benefit from trying to be the adult in the room? Obama's "Dad-in-Chief" routine hasn't helped against the Republican Congress, or during campaigns.

Giuliani's comments are no different than Steve Scalise hanging out with Klan members. The GOP knows who their base is, but for some reason we're all supposed to feign shock and disgust when we're reminded. While most Republicans don't hold beliefs this far to the racist right the fact is the last guy who tried to split the needle with the GOP base by saying "Obama is a good man with bad ideas" ended up losing.

And speaking of losing, that's what this is really all about, the Republicans should be worried about losing to Hillary Clinton in 2016, and this kind of rhetoric is exactly what would lead to her and Bill Clinton marching back into the White House. Yes, there's the obvious problem, that this kind of language from a prominent Republican is alienating to young voters, minority voters and independents, but it actually goes a bit deeper than that.

The best way to tag the party nominee of a two term president is to claim they'll essentially be that president's third term. The more the GOP makes this race about Obama, the easier it'll be for Hillary Clinton to draw contrasts between herself and his administration.

Does anyone other than the far right believe Hillary doesn't love America? Does anyone other than the far right believe Hillary was influenced by communists? Or doesn't want to stop ISIS?

If Republicans can't get over their Obama derangement syndrome it just makes it that much easier for Hillary to say "Obama isn't on the ballot!" and define herself. It's already going to be hard to tag her with the Obama administration because everyone knows she disagrees with the President a lot.

If Republicans respond to every attack on the president like it's a leaked audio tape, Hillary will be waltzing right back into the White House, whether she loves America or not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times opinion: Hillary, Jeb and $$$$$$

By Frank Bruni

February 21, 2015

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton, Jeb Bush and Fund-Raising for the 2016 Presidential Race

There are firm and necessary laws against American candidates accepting foreign donations. There's no such prohibition for a philanthropy like the Clinton Foundation, which undeniably does much essential, heroic work around the globe.

But it's a philanthropy headed by a woman who's most likely running for president and by her husband and daughter. Their requests and their gratitude cannot be separated entirely from politics. There's inevitable overlap and blending.

As The Washington Post wrote, the foundation "has given contributors entree, outside the traditional political arena, to a possible president. Foreign donors and countries that are likely to have interests before a potential Clinton administration — and yet are ineligible to give to U.S. political campaigns — have affirmed their support for the family's work through the charitable giving."

And this isn't some minor wrinkle of the foundation's structure and workings. "A third of foundation donors who have given more than $1 million are foreign governments or other entities based outside the United States, and foreign donors make up more than half of those who have given more than $5 million," according to The Post's analysis.

That analysis also showed that "donations from the financial services sector" represented the "largest share of corporate donors." In other words, the foundation is cozy with Wall Street, which has also funneled Clinton some of her enormous speaking fees.

The Journal noted that "at least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during her tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation."

A few prominent Democrats with whom I spoke were spooked, not because they believed that Clinton would feel a pressing need to repay these kindnesses, but because the eventual Republican nominee had just been handed a potent weapon against her.

And in the income-inequality era, how does a candidate crowned with this many dollar signs put herself forward persuasively as a woman of the people and a champion of the underdog?

THE answer — and her salvation — may be that we've all become so accustomed to the tide of money washing through politics that we just assume all candidates to be equally (and thoroughly) wet. We give in. And we stop acknowledging frequently or urgently enough that American elections, which should be contests of ideas and character, are as much (if not more) contests of cold, hard cash.

Certainly those of us in the news media are somewhat guilty of this, because something that's no longer new is no longer news.

Sure, we publish stories about the dizzying, obscene heights of spending by major donors, like one written in The Times last month by Nicholas Confessore. He noted that the Koch brothers had drawn up a budget of $889 million for the 2016 election cycle.

But we discuss the damage being done to Chris Christie's presidential dreams by the defection of potential donors without digressing to underscore the perversity of a small circle of people having so much consequence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We report, as we did in January, on how well or poorly Rand Paul, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz performed when they spoke at a gathering put together by the Kochs in Southern California. But we don't flag the oddity of these auditions, the chilling bizarreness of the way the road to the White House winds not only through the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary but also through plutocrats' posh retreats.

An astonishing bounty of the comments and developments that make headlines emanate from the arena of fund-raising. We learned that Mitt Romney might enter the 2016 race because he was telling donors as much, and we learned that he had decided otherwise because he was letting donors know. In neither instance did we take sufficient note of that.

We articulate misgivings about how much of Clinton's or Bush's thinking may be rooted in the past. But the bigger issue, given the scope of not just their own political histories but also their relatives', is how heavy a duffel of i.o.u.s each of them would carry into office.

Their prominence is commensurate with their debts. And only so many of those can be forgotten.

Washington Post: The making of Hillary 5.0: Marketing wizards help re-imagine Clinton brand

By Philip Rucker and Anne Gearan

February 21, 2015 6:18 p.m. EST

Is Hillary Rodham Clinton a McDonald's Big Mac or a Chipotle burrito bowl? A can of Bud or a bottle of Blue Moon? JCPenney or J. Crew?

As she readies her second presidential campaign, Clinton has recruited consumer marketing specialists onto her team of trusted political advisers. Their job is to help imagine Hillary 5.0 — the rebranding of a first lady turned senator turned failed presidential candidate turned secretary of state turned likely 2016 Democratic presidential nominee.

Clinton and her image-makers are sketching ways to refresh the well-established brand for tomorrow's marketplace. In their mission to present voters with a winning picture of the likely candidate, no detail is too big or too small — from her economic opportunity agenda to the design of the "H" in her future campaign logo.

"It's exactly the same as selling an iPhone or a soft drink or a cereal," said Peter Sealey, a longtime corporate marketing strategist. "She needs to use everything a brand has: a dominant color, a logo, a symbol. … The symbol of a Mercedes is a three-pointed star. The symbol of Coca-Cola is the contour bottle. The symbol of McDonald's is the golden arches. What is Clinton's symbol?"

Clinton's challenge is unique. Unlike potential Republican challengers of relatively middling fame who are introducing themselves to a national audience for the first time, Clinton is almost universally recognized. Love her or loathe her, potential voters know who she is after more than two decades in public life.

Or they think they know.

As Clinton and her advisers conceptualize her 2016 image, her own history shows the potential for peril.

In politics, authenticity can be a powerful trait, and it is one that sometimes has escaped Clinton. In her 2008 presidential campaign, despite some raw displays of emotion, she often came across as overly programmed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2016, a challenge for Clinton will be adapting to the political moment with a fresh image while remaining true to her settled identity. “Look at Budweiser,” said a former campaign adviser to President Obama, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk candidly. “That’s what Hillary Clinton is. She’s not a microbrew. She’s one of the biggest, most powerful brands ever in the country, and recognizing that is important.”

Ahead of her campaign launch, Clinton has tapped some of the Democratic Party’s star strategists as well as two of corporate America’s branding wizards: Wendy Clark, who specializes in marketing age-old brands such as Coca-Cola to younger and more diverse customers; and Roy Spence, a decades-long Clinton friend who dreamed up the “Don’t Mess With Texas” anti-littering slogan as well as flashy ad campaigns for Southwest Airlines and Wal-Mart.

Clark took an unpaid leave in January from Coca-Cola, where she ispresident of brands and strategic marketing for carbonated beverages in North America, to help Clinton in what Clark called “a passion project.” Spence is co-founder and chairman of GSD&M, an Austin-based corporate ad firm, and has experience in politics, including with Clinton’s 2008 campaign.

Clinton’s words suggest that her 2016 campaign will stress economic fairness — the level playing field for the middle class implied by her Twitter message last month praising Obama’s State of the Union address. “Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class. #FairShot #FairShare,” Clinton wrote.

But the plans for Clinton’s rebranding are not yet clear, nor are the influences of the Madison Avenue sensibility Clark and Spence bring to her operation.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill declined to comment on the branding strategy or the specific work of Clark and Spence.

People familiar with Clinton’s preparations said Clark and Spence are focused on developing imaginative ways to “let Hillary be Hillary,” as one person said, and help her make emotional connections with voters.

“I just want America to know the Hillary Clinton I know,” said Jerry Crawford, a friend and the Iowa chairman of Clinton’s 2008 campaign. “I want as many people as possible to get to know the woman I’ve seen behind closed doors. She’s bright, disciplined, quick to throw her head back and laugh — just a very, very attractive person.”

Spence, who got to know Bill and Hillary Clinton when they worked in Texas on George McGovern’s 1972 presidential campaign, tried to steer Clinton out of a rough patch in 2008 after her early losses to Obama. He is credited with her provocative “3 a.m. phone call” ad but also with soft-focus initiatives to reveal what he called “Hillary’s heart.”

Mark McKinnon, a friend and competitor of Spence and a media strategist with George W. Bush’s presidential campaigns, said: “Spence and Clark have a lot of experience refreshing established, well-known brands like AT&T, Coca-Cola and Wal-Mart. Should come in handy.”

Spence and Clark have been credited with creating three-dimensional personalities around otherwise dull consumer brands. At Coca-Cola, Clark spearheaded the “Share a Coke” campaign to put names such as Brittany and Zach on soda cans, a marketing move that boosted sales among millennials. Spence helped DoubleTree Hotels make the freshly baked chocolate chip cookies the chain serves guests upon check-in an icon for its sales pitch of warm comfort for beleaguered travelers.

But Fred Davis, a Republican advertising guru, said that if Clinton’s rebranding “seems like a craven attempt to try to put fresh paint on an old house, then it will backfire.”

“I think most voters are actually pretty intelligent, and they’ll see through any blatant attempt to change,” Davis said. “Her only hope, to me, is not a rebranding, but it’s actual policy positions and ideas that are fresh and new — and because those are fresh and new, voters might think, ‘Wait a minute, I’m going to give her another chance.’”

Some Clinton allies agreed. They dismissed the suggestion that refreshing her brand alone will make the candidate seem current. They said Clinton’s paramount challenge is to answer two questions: why she is the right person to step into the Oval Office, and what she would do when she's there. If she does that, they said, her image will take care of itself.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't think people are looking for someone who's being reinvented or rebranded," said Steve Elmendorf, a top Democratic lobbyist who was a strategist for Clinton's 2008 bid and other presidential campaigns. "This is somebody they know, whom they have confidence in, and the question is, can she lead us to a better place over the next four years? That's her biggest challenge. What are the new ideas? … It can't be yesterday's program."

Sealey, who is credited with the successful "Always Coca-Cola" campaign in the 1990s, said that Clinton, like Coke, "has incredible top-of-mind awareness, and it's a huge asset."

"The issue is: What is her promise?" he said. "With Mercedes, it's quality. With Volvo, it's safety. With Coca-Cola, it's refreshment. If you can get her promise down to one word, that's the key."

Spence's business partner, Haley Rushing, said their approach to all clients, corporate and political, "starts with them at the center," rather than market trends. "We always start from the inside out, not the outside in," she said.

Rushing and Spence co-founded the Purpose Institute, where Rushing's title is "chief purposeologist" and the staffers act as "organizational therapists" uncovering the central purposes of their client organizations. Rushing said she is not working on the Clinton effort but that she envisions a Clinton brand built around years of experience. She said, "Everything emanates from, 'What is Hillary's purpose in the world?'"

Clinton has faced that question before, with mixed results.

After a complicated tenure as first lady, Clinton reinvented herself as a potholes-and-pork senator from her adopted state of New York. Then she ran for president as a tough woman in the mold of Margaret Thatcher. Failing that, she had a careful run as the country's top diplomat under Obama that allies believe raised her stature.

Perhaps her most significant rebranding came in 2000, when she became a popular elected official in her own right after her husband's Monica Lewinsky scandal and after a controversial tenure as first lady. Clinton was ridiculed as a dilettante and a carpetbagger, but she won over critics, even some Republicans, with a dogged commitment to local issues.

In 2008, however, Clinton's rebranding went badly, starting with a misreading of the zeitgeist that had her stressing her commander-in-chief qualifications when the public preferred Obama's promise of hope and change.

Clinton's advisers were divided then about how to bust the caricature of Clinton as remote and brittle. Some begged Clinton to reprise a campaign feature that had charmed New York voters, in which she stayed in ordinary people's homes while traveling around the state. But Clinton insisted that doing so in Iowa or New Hampshire would come across as forced.

Similarly, an online compilation of testimonials meant to showcase Clinton's humanity and relatability fell flat. Too cheesy, some advisers said; at odds with her strength-and-competence message, others said.

A rebranding that stuck: Clinton's workmanlike turn as secretary of state, during which she visited more countries than most of her predecessors — and used her celebrity to draw attention to women's empowerment and human rights issues.

Now, Clinton will try to refresh her image once more so that voters see her as a champion for the middle class amid deep concerns about income inequality. Rohit Deshpande, a marketing professor at Harvard Business School, offered a fast-food giant as a case study.

"Refresh with the times is the issue McDonald's is facing right now," he said. "It's considered tired, and the marketplace has moved on. "

Fabian Geyrhalter, a corporate branding consultant, also drew a parallel between McDonald's and Clinton: "There has been a brand value proposition over so many years, and suddenly she needs to shift that legacy into Clinton 2016: 'This is what I stand for now.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press: For Clinton, her family foundation may pose campaign risks

By Ken Thomas

February 22, 2015 12:10 p.m. EST

The foundation launched by former President Bill Clinton more than a decade ago has battled HIV and AIDS in Africa, educated millions of children and fed the poor and hungry around the globe. It also has the potential to become a political risk for Hillary Rodham Clinton as she moves toward a second presidential campaign.

The former secretary of state has struggled with some recent bad headlines over large donations given to the foundation by foreign governments in the past two years, and the $200 million-plus the organization has raised since 2013, ahead of her anticipated White House campaign.

Republicans contend that foreign governments donating to a foundation led by a potential U.S. president creates unacceptable conflicts of interests. Also, the involvement of big money reinforces a long-standing narrative pushed by the GOP of the Clintons as a couple who frequently mix business and politics.

"Unless Hillary Clinton immediately reinstates the ban on foreign countries giving to her foundation and returns the millions of dollars these governments have already donated, she's setting an incredibly dangerous precedent," said the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Reince Priebus. "The American people are not about to elect a president in Hillary Clinton who could expose them to the demands of foreign governments because they dumped massive sums of cash into her foundation."

The foundation, which is scheduled to hold events in Morocco and Greece this spring, defended its financial support and addressed how it might function if Clinton runs for president. If she seeks office again, something taken as a given by most, the foundation said it would ensure its policies and practices are "appropriate, just as we did when she served as secretary of state."

In 2009, when Clinton became President Barack Obama's chief diplomat, the foundation stopped raising money from foreign governments. The fundraising involving non-U.S. entities resumed in 2013, after she left the his administration.

The Wall Street Journal last week reported the foundation had received money in 2014 from the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Oman and others. The Washington Post reported the charity has raised nearly $2 billion since the former president started it in 2001. About one-third of its donations of $1 million or more come from foreign governments or non-U.S. entities, the newspaper found.

Democrats say the Clintons can defend their work at the foundation because of its track record and history of tackling some of the world's biggest problems, from AIDS and clean water to hunger, educational opportunities and the protection of endangered wildlife.

They also note that the foundation voluntarily discloses its donors — nonprofits are not required to do — and say there is no evidence the Clintons have used it to enrich themselves. Nearly 90 percent of the foundation's money goes toward its programming.

"The foundation has done amazing work," said Connecticut Gov. Dan Malloy, a Democrat who campaigned with Bill Clinton last year. "It has been a unifying force in our national affairs and in our international affairs."

Yet the influx of corporate and foreign money just before a potential Hillary Clinton campaign has caused some anxiety within her party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There was a reason they stopped taking foreign government donations when Hillary was secretary of state," said Mike Carberry, a Johnson County, Iowa, supervisor and former county Democratic chairman. He said the foundation should reinstate the policies used from 2009 to 2013. "It doesn't seem right."

The foundation has strong ties with several corporations and other large foundations. Last September's annual meeting in New York was sponsored by an array of companies that regularly lobby the federal government, including financial firms HSBC Bank USA, Barclays and Deutsche Bank, as well as Fortune 500 companies such as Coca-Cola, Microsoft, Monsanto, Procter & Gamble and ExxonMobil.

Goldman Sachs, whose corporate officers have played leading roles in the Treasury Department in recent years, has worked with the Clinton Foundation on the 10,000 Women Initiative aimed at helping female entrepreneurs around the globe access capital.

Many of the same donors to the Clintons' political campaigns have given money to the foundation. Dennis Cheng, a former Hillary Clinton campaign fundraiser, recently left the foundation as its chief development officer and is expected to be a top fundraiser for her expected campaign.

The examination of the foundation's finances come as many Democrats want Clinton to take on a more populist economic agenda that would demand more oversight of Wall Street firms. It also follows efforts by Democrats to scrutinize Republican Mitt Romney's business practices in 2012 and tie Republican candidates to millions of dollars provided by the Koch Brothers and their business interests.

Beyond the headlines, many Democrats say it shows the need for Clinton to begin actively campaigning and build an apparatus better suited to rapidly respond to these types of critiques.

"There's a vacuum," said Tom Henderson, the chairman of the Polk County, Iowa, Democrats, who noted potential candidates such as former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb are visiting soon. "She isn't doing anything" in Iowa, he said.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 3 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton honored by EMILY's List (AP)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 10 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton addresses United Nations Women's Conference (Bloomberg)

· March 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to keynote Irish American Hall of Fame (NYT)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Leslie Garvey, Project On Government Oversight" <leslie@pogo.org>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 8/22/2015 1:00:18 AM
Subject: Weekly Reader: Congressional Boot Camp

POGO
PROJECT ON GOVERNMENT OVERSIGHT

Bipartisan Boot Camp Helps Congressional Staff Sharpen Oversight Skills

Current Hill staffers honed investigative skills by working in bipartisan groups at the Congressional Oversight Boot Camp, as reported by National Journal. Read more

Database Provides Transparency on Foreign Aid

The Center for International Policy launched the Security Monitor Assistance Program, providing transparency on U.S. foreign and security aid.

Read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Design for the Mission, Not the Gadgets: Interview with A-10 Designer Pierre Sprey

With today's out-of-control weapon procurement system, it is important to understand the conditions that allowed the A-10 to become the plane our troops rely upon today.

Read more

Animas River Release: 143 Years in the Making

The Animas River release in Colorado highlights the damage caused by archaic hard rock mining laws that allow corporations to mine freely without any responsibility for clean-up.

Read more

Former CRS Researcher Calls for Public Access

Concerns about making Congressional Research Service reports public are unfounded according to former CRS employee.

Read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Will Modernizing the Nuclear Weapons Complex Cost?

A new report from the Government Accountability Office on the nuclear weapons complex reveals incomplete cost estimates for major projects, large fluctuations in the budget, inadequate funding for overdue maintenance, and poor data on critical facilities.

Read more

donate

CHARITY NAVIGATOR ★★★★ Four Star Charity

2014 TOP-RATED NONPROFIT

POGO :: 1100 G Street, NW, Suite 500 :: Washington, DC 20005 :: (202) 347-1122

View this email online | Unsubscribe

POWERED BY blackbaud nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/4/2015 2:01:28 AM
Subject: H4A News Clips 7.4.15

H4A News Clips

July 4, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton Warns That a Republican President Would Repeat the Health Law // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 3, 2015..... 4

Clinton says she hopes Iran talks yield a deal // Reuters // Sandra Maler – July 3, 2015..... 6

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 7

Paul Steinhauser (7/3/15, 3:50 PM) – 2016 News: @HillaryClinton campaign says Dartmouth puts Hanover #NH rally crowd size at 850 people #nhpolitics #fitn..... 7

Amy Chozick (7/3/15, 6:25 PM) – Hillary responds to Bernie burn: "I always knew this was gonna be competitive." (Excellent pooling @rubycramer)..... 7

Zeke Miller (7/3/15, 6:35 PM) – Pool: @HillaryClinton after being served her ice cream. "is that for me?" she said. "Holy shamoley."..... 7

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 7

Clinton warns that a Republican president would repeal Obamacare // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015..... 7

Clinton: I hope Iran deal can be reached // Politico // Annie Karni – July 4, 2015..... 8

Bill and Hillary Clinton fight new demand for email server // Politico // Josh Gerstein – July 3, 2015 9

Hillary Clinton: 'I take a backseat to no one' on liberal record // Politico // Annie Karni – July 3, 2015 11

Hillary Clinton: I hope Iran deal can be reached // Politico // Annie Karni – July 3, 2015..... 13

Hillary steps up liberal rhetoric as Sanders surges in polls // AP // July 3, 2015..... 13

Hillary: "I Take A Backseat To No One" At "Fighting For Progressive Values" // Buzzfeed // Katherine Miller – July 3, 2015..... 16

Hillary Clinton Hopeful For Iran Nuclear Deal Next Week // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 3, 2015 17

Hillary Clinton: Electing Republican President Would Mean Repeal of Obamacare // NBC // Phil Helsel – July 3, 2015..... 18

Hillary Clinton Not Fazed by Bernie Sanders' Crowds // ABC // Liz Kreutz – July 3, 2015..... 19

Richard Nixon Biographer: Hillary Clinton Has 'Nixonian Attributes' // ABC // Rick Klein – July 3, 2015 20

Dems have to take White House to keep Obamacare, Clinton warns // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – July 3, 2015..... 21

In House, liberals side with Clinton over Sanders // The Hill // Mike Lillis – July 3, 2015..... 21

Hillary Clinton to head back to Iowa // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015..... 24

Inside Hillary Clinton's evolution from Girl Scout to presidential frontrunner // Business Insider // Melia Robinson – July 3, 2015..... 25

Judicial Watch: Obama and Hillary Clinton Concocted Benghazi Video Lie with Jihadist Help // Breitbart // Edwin Mora – July 3, 2015..... 27

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why was Cherie so keen to open doors for a billionaire sheikh's wife? // Daily Mail // Guy Adams – July 3, 2015 29

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 33

DECLARED..... 33

O'MALLEY..... 33

O'Malley jabs at GOP-led Congress in Newton // Des Moines Register // Grant Rodgers – July 3, 2015 33

SANDERS..... 34

Bernie Sanders's Revolutionary Roots Were Nurtured in '60s Vermont // NYT // Sarah Lyall – July 3, 2015 35

Bernie Sanders seen as a 'protest candidate,' says Democratic rival Martin O'Malley // WaPo // John Wagner – July 3, 2015..... 38

Bernie who? // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – July 3, 2015..... 39

AFL-CIO leader tries to quell pro-Sanders revolt // Politico // Brian Mahoney – July 3, 2015.... 41

Is Bernie Sanders Too Radical for America? // HuffPo /// Peter Dreier – July 3, 2015..... 43

The real reasons Bernie Sanders is transforming the election: Here's why he galvanizes the left // Salon // Sophia Tesfay e – July 3, 2015..... 48

Bernie Sanders out-greens Hillary Clinton: Will she be able to hold her own in a climate hawk runoff // Salon // Lindsay Abrams – July 3, 2015..... 51

'Grassroots movement working': Bernie Sanders gains on the Clinton machine // Guardian // Lauren Gambino and Ben Jacobs – July 3, 2015..... 53

A.B. Stoddard: Clinton's feeling the Bern // The Hill // A.B. Stoddard – July 3, 2015 56

Bernie Sanders raises $15 million. Chump change or a lot? // CS Monitor // Peter Grier – July 3, 2015 58

Sanders says he has a 'strong chance of winning Iowa' // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – July 3, 2015 59

WEBB..... 60

Jim Webb's Facebook engagement riv als Pataki's // CBS // July 3, 2015 60

Jim Webb tests the limits of a maverick's appeal // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 3, 2015.. 61

Jim Webb Throws His Hat in the Ring for the WH // Fox // Clint Henderson – July 3, 2015..... 64

Fifth Democrats elbows way into prez race // Boston Herald // Bob McGovern – July 3, 2015.. 65

CHAFEE..... 66

Democrats in New Hampshire find some of Chafee's ideas 'odd' // AP // Michelle R. Smith – July 3, 2015 66

UNDECLARED..... 68

BIDEN..... 68

Will Joe Biden run for president? Drumbeat picks up. // CS Monitor // Linda Feldmann – July 3, 2015 68

Will Joe Biden Run For President in 2016 After All? One Prominent Fundraiser Thinks So // Bustle // Chris Tognotti – July 3, 2015..... 70

OTHER..... 71

GOP..... 71

DECLARED..... 71

BUSH..... 71

Jeb Bush Needs Some New Economic Advice // NYT // Editorial Board – July 3, 2015..... 72

Jeb Bush to meet with Mitt Romney in Kennebunkport // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015 7 3

Jeb Bush raises questions about Obama's Iran negotiations // Reuters // Steve Holland – July 2, 2015 7 3

Don't Trust Iran // Town Hall // Jeb Bush – July 2, 2015..... 73

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RUBIO..... 75

Marco Rubio's Donor Obstacles: A Limited Base and Another Floridian // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters and Ashley Parker – July 3, 2015..... 75

Sen. Marco Rubio To Campaign In Nevada // CBS // July 3, 2015..... 78

Marco Rubio on Trump: 'Offensive' and 'Divisiv e' Comments Are Not Offering A Solution // Mediaite // Ken Meyer – July 3, 2015..... 78

PAUL..... 79

Ron Paul says Trump troubles him // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 3, 2015..... 79

CRUZ..... 80

Ted Cruz continues to defend Donald Trump on immigration // WaPo // Katie Zezima – July 3, 2015 80

Ted Cruz defends Donald Trump, slams 'Washington cartel' on immigration // Politico // Ali Breland – July 3, 2015..... 80

A Conserv ative Firebrand From The Start, Ted Cruz Always Had A Plan // NPR // Ailsa Change – July 3, 2015..... 81

Cruz: US should withdraw from UN Human Rights Commission // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015..... 83

Cruz owns mistakes, offers fresh insight // Houston Chronicle // Todd J. Gillman – July 3, 2015 84

CHRISTIE..... 86

Exclusive: Chris Christie hires presidential campaign manager and appoints senior staff // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015..... 86

For Chris Christie, the truth hurts // USA Today // Windsor Mann – July 3, 2015..... 90

Christie to spend the night at Romney's New Hampshire home // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015 91

PERRY..... 92

Rick Perry wants to reach out to black people. He'll have to do a lot better. // WaPo // Paul Waldman – July 3, 2015..... 92

Rick Perry made a big speech on states' rights and race. But his policies don't follow. // Vox // German Lopez – July 3, 2015..... 94

Rick Perry: Trump Made 'Huge Error,' Painted Mexicans with Broad Brush // Mediaite // Josh Feldman – July 3, 2015..... 95

Rick Perry: GOP Has Ignored Black Vote For Too Long // Breitbart // Sarah Rumpf – July 3, 2015 96

GRAHAM..... 101

Lindsey Graham tells Iowan: "I don't want you to vote for me" // CBS // Stephanie Condon – July 3, 2015 101

HUCKABEE..... 101

Presidential Candidate Mike Huckabee Uses Schizophrenia As A Slur, Gets It Wrong // Forbes // Emily Willingham – July 3, 2015..... 101

JINDAL..... 103

Bobby Jindal Really , Really, Really Hates Gay Marriage // Mother Jones // Kev in Drum – July 3, 2015 103

TRUMP..... 103

Donald Trump's Lousy Week (Except for the Polling) // NYT // Daniel Victor – July 2, 2015... 103

Hispanic leaders want GOP field to condemn Trump's 'idiocy ' // AP // Steve Peoples – July 3, 2015 105

Pataki's Trump card: Using The Donald to get noticed in crowded GOP field // CNN // Jeremy Diamond – July 3, 2015..... 107

Jon Stewart Slams Donald Trump Supporters For Defending 'Mexican Rapists' Comments // HuffPo // Julia Brucculieri – July 3, 2015..... 108

Bernie Sanders Will End the IMF's Economic Violence in Greece and Africa // HuffPo // Robert Naiman – July 3, 2015..... 109

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump again lambastes border security after a California woman is killed // LA Times // Ryan Parker – July 3, 2015..... 111

Donald Trump: Whose voters is he stealing // CS Monitor // Peter Grier – July 3, 2015..... 113

UNDECLARED..... 114

WALKER..... 114

In Scott Walker's Wisconsin, Obama urges Crowd to Flee to Democrat-Run paradise In Minnesota // Slate // Beth Ethier – July 3, 2015..... 114

New York Times Debunked: Scott Walker's 'I'm Not Going Nativist' Conversation Never Happened // Breitbart // Matthew Boyle – July 3, 2015..... 115

OTHER..... 118

Chris Christie and Marco Rubio Get Pajama Time at Matt Romney's House // NYT // Ashley Parker and Maggie Haberman – July 3, 2015..... 118

Romney to host the Christies, Rubios at the New Hampshire home // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015 120

Rubio, Christie planning sleepover with the Romneys // AP // Jill Colvin – July 3, 2015..... 120

Romney to host Christie, Rubio in New Hampshire // Politico // Jennifer Shutt – July 3, 2015 121

Rubio, Christie To Bunk At Mitt Romney's New Hampshire B&B // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp – July 3, 2015 121

Romney to Host Rubio, Christie for July 4th // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 3, 2015..... 123

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 123

The unexpected rise of Bernie Sanders and Donald Trump // WaPo // Kathleen Parker – July 3, 2015 123

What candidates really mean when they invoke the 'Founding Fathers' // WaPo // Andrew M. Shocket – July 3, 2015 125

Drawing voters in: Campaign logos bring artistic touch to politics // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 3, 2015 127

Early fundraising totals could shape 2016 GOP field // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 4, 2015 128

2016 Hopefuls Flood NH For July 4 // NBC // July 3, 2015..... 131

Chris Christie and Hillary Clinton's fake followers // Reuters // Lena Masri – July 2, 2015..... 132

Crowded field: Presidential hopefuls end up marching in the same Foruth of July parades // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – July 3, 2015..... 132

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 132

Clinton and Obama are on the wrong side of history // WaPo // Dana Milbank – July 3, 2015. 132

Her emails prove it, Hillary's just like us // Boston Herald // Howie Carr – July 3, 2015..... 134

Hillary Clinton's private messages reveal the banality of email // Independent // Alice Jones – July 3, 2015 135

If I were Hillary Clinton, I'd rather Cherie Blair just left me alone // Guardian // Deborah Orr – July 3, 2015 137

TOP NEWS..... 139

DOMESTIC..... 139

Obama Plans Broader Use of Clemency to Free Nonviolent Drug Offenders // NYT // Peter Baker – July 3, 2015 139

Despair and Anger as Puerto Ricans Cope With Debt Crisis // NYT // Lizette Alvarez – July 3, 2015 142

Obama to meet with leader of Vietnam's Communist Party at the White House // WaPo // David Nakamura – July 3, 2015..... 146

INTERNATIONAL..... 146

ISIS Destroys More Artificats in Syria and Iraq // NYT // Rick Gladstone and Maher Samaan – July 3,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015 146

A wave of recent attacks by Palestinians set Israelis on edge // WaPo // William Booth – July 3, 2015 148

Iran to US: Nuke deal could result in joint cooperation // AP // George Jahn and Matthew Lee – July 3, 2015 150

Iran's foreign minister: 'We have never been closer to a lasting outcome' // Politico // Jennifer Shutt and Nahal Toosi – July 3, 2015..... 152

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Warns That a Republican President Would Repeat the Health Law // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 3, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton warned on Friday that a Republican president would repeal President Obama's Affordable Care Act, and she denounced the administration of George W. Bush for "poor management" of the economy that led to the recession.

The harsh words from Mrs. Clinton came as she addressed a crowd estimated by her aides at more than 850 in Hanover, the leafy New Hampshire town that is home to Dartmouth College.

The state has long been hospitable to the Clinton family – her husband called himself "the comeback kid" after finishing second in the primary here in 1992, and she won the 2008 primary – but Mrs. Clinton's appearance here came as Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator, has been surging in polls.

"I will fight hard against what I see as the injustice and unfairness in our society," Mrs. Clinton said, discussing her record and seemingly mindful of Mr. Sanders as she did. "I take a back seat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values."

Mrs. Clinton's aides have struggled since before she announced her candidacy with the reality that her sky-high early poll numbers would be almost impossible to sustain. They have sought to diminish the expectations for her, and have sought to avoid chasing distractions.

The Vermont border is just across the Connecticut River from Hanover. Several attendees at Mrs. Clinton's event said they were either from Vermont and were curious, or were supporting Mr. Sanders.

Mrs. Clinton's speech demonstrated the challenge she faces: She must keep a wary eye on Mr. Sanders without attacking him, but she must also seem engaged and rouse her supporters, so attacks on the Republican field on issues like the Affordable Care Act have been her approach.

"I will defend it and I will do everything i can to improve it," Mrs. Clinton said of Mr. Obama's signature health care law, calling it an issue of "fairness and humanity, also of economics" and praising the Supreme Court for recently upholding it.

Republican calls for "repeal, repeal, repeal mean nothing – unless they elect a Republican president," Mrs. Clinton warned, saying ominously, "If the country elects a Republican president, then they will repeal the Affordable Care Act."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her voice rising at times, Mrs. Clinton called for new gun control laws as she spoke in a state where many residents own guns. And she sounded a note of muted praise for a potential nuclear deal with Iran, while vowing to defend her record on “progressive values” against anyone.

Holding a microphone as she spoke from the stage at The Bema, an amphitheater-style spot near the college campus – where, according to a Clinton aide, the high school graduation of Mrs. Clinton’s Vermont-bred campaign manager, Robby Mook, took place – she said that Republican policies had a history of failure.

“Then Democrats have to come in and fix what’s broken,” she said, noting that at the end of her husband’s two terms there was a “surplus that would have paid off the national debt had it not been rudely interrupted by the next administration.”

Republicans “just don’t know the theory of original sin, because we wouldn’t have had to have a recovery if we hadn’t had the kind of poor management and bad economic policies that put us into the ditch in the first place,” she said to applause.

Mr. Obama, she said, “deserves a lot more credit than he’s usually given” for pulling the economy back.

She also pledged to continue discussing gun control, saying, “We have to work very hard to muster the public opinion to convince Congress” to support universal background checks for gun buyers.

“I think it is the height of irresponsibility not to talk about it, so I will talk about it,” she said.

As for Iran, Mrs. Clinton walked a careful line. She said she supported the Obama administration in its efforts to get a deal to curtail Iran’s nuclear capabilities, calling it a “singular step in the right direction,” but warned that such a deal would not change the fact that Iran was an “existential threat to Israel.”

Clinton says she hopes Iran talks yield a deal // Reuters // Sandra Maler – July 3, 2015

U.S. Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton said on Friday she hoped that 18 months of nuclear talks between Iran and major powers would yield a deal to curb Iran's nuclear program.

"I so hope that we are able to get a deal in the next week that puts a lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program," the former secretary of state told a rally on the Dartmouth College campus in Hanover, New Hampshire, adding that even if a deal is reached, there will be more work to be done.

Iran is in talks with the United States and five other powers - Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia - on an agreement to curtail its nuclear program in exchange for relief from economic sanctions.

Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination for November 2016, has generally not commented publicly on the Iran talks since launching her White House bid in April.

Commenting on the preliminary nuclear deal that was reached just before she announced her candidacy, Clinton said, "Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton has been critical of some aspects of the Obama administration's foreign policy.

The former U.S. senator and first lady has a big lead in opinion polls over four Democratic challengers.

The winner of the Democratic nominating race will face the victor of the Republican contest, in which 14 candidates are competing.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Paul Steinhauser (7/3/15, 3:50 PM) – 2016 News: @HillaryClinton campaign says Dartmouth puts Hanover #NH rally crowd size at 850 people #nhpolitics #fitn

Amy Chozick (7/3/15, 6:25 PM) – Hillary responds to Bernie burn: "I always knew this was gonna be competitive." (Excellent pooling @rubycramer)

Zeke Miller (7/3/15, 6:35 PM) – Pool: @HillaryClinton after being served her ice cream. "is that for me?" she said. "Holy shamoley."

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Clinton warns that a Republican president would repeal Obamacare // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton sharpened her partisan rhetoric to appeal to Democratic primary voters here Friday by issuing a dire warning: President Obama's health care law would disappear if a Republican wins the White House in 2016.

Celebrating last month's Supreme Court decision to uphold a key provision of the Affordable Care Act, Clinton told a crowd of 850 supporters at Dartmouth College, "I'm so thrilled that we're at a point where all the calls about 'Repeal! Repeal! Repeal!' mean nothing -- unless they elect a Republican president."

"If the country elects a Republican president, they will repeal the Affordable Care Act. That is as certain as I can say it," she continued, noting the unlikelihood that Democrats take over the Senate and House next year.

Clinton's comments came during a festive, grass-roots rally in a wooded pocket of Dartmouth's picturesque campus, where students, professors and other community members enjoyed hamburgers, hot dogs and pie under a brilliant summer sun as they awaited Clinton's arrival.

Clinton arrived with little fanfare, casually stepping onto a granite amphitheater stage and waving hello as she opened a two-day campaign swing in this first-in-the-nation primary state. She told the crowd she had fond memories of being at Dartmouth decades ago when she was a student at Wellesley College in neighboring Massachusetts.

"I came for a blind date during what was then called Winter Carnival," she said, with a knowing smile. "So I have fond memories."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton portrayed herself as a fighter for progressive values, especially on the economy. She recalled that in 2008, after President Obama won the fall election, he invited her to ask her to be his secretary of state and told her the economy was much worse than anybody truly realized.

Her point was that the peace and prosperity seen under the presidency of her husband, Bill Clinton, was "rudely interrupted" by President George W. Bush's eight years in the White House and that it took another Democrat, Obama, for the economy to recover.

"There's just a pattern here where the other side keeps using the same old tired, failed policies," she said. "They don't work and then Democratic presidents have to come in and fix what was broken. So let's break that and have a Democratic president to continue the policies that actually work for the vast majority of Americans."

In her remarks here, Clinton touched on an array of liberal themes -- from expanding federal science and research funding to increased investments in public infrastructure.

"I take a back seat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values," Clinton said.

She made no mention of Democratic rival Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator who has drawn enthusiastic crowds around the country and has surged in the polls in New Hampshire especially.

But Clinton used the issue of gun control to draw a subtle distinction with her chief primary opponent, who has a more mixed voting record on guns. Like New Hampshire, Vermont is a largely rural, pro-gun state.

“We have to take on the gun lobby one more time" Clinton said, espousing her support for enhanced background checks. "This is a controversial issue. I am well aware of that. But I think it is the height of irresponsibility not to talk about it. So I will talk about it and I will look for ways that we can build that majority."

Clinton: I hope Iran deal can be reached // Politico // Annie Karni – July 4, 2015

The deadline for negotiations is Tuesday.

Hanover, N.H. — Hillary Clinton, speaking at a campaign rally near Dartmouth College, weighed in on the Iran nuclear talks taking place in Vienna this weekend, vowing to protect Israel if a deal is reached.

“I so hope we are able to get a deal next week that puts the lid on Iran’s nuclear weapons program,” she said. “Even if we do get such a deal, we will still have major problems from Iran. They are the world’s chief sponsor of terrorism. They use proxies like Hezbollah to sow discord and create insurgencies to destabilize governments. They are taking more and more control of a number of nations in the region and they pose an existential threat to Israel.”

Critics of the emerging deal have expressed concern that, if and when sanctions are lifted, Iran would plow its new windfall into efforts to destabilize Arab countries aligned with the West.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We still are going to have to turn our attention to working with our partners to try to reign in and prevent this continuing Iranian aggressiveness,” Clinton said.

The Iran talks were extended last week as negotiators sought to close the remaining gaps between the two sides; the new deadline for an agreement is Tuesday.

In a YouTube video posted online Friday, Iran’s Foreign Minister Javad Zarif indicated that a deal was in reach.

“At this eleventh hour, despite some differences that remain, we have never been closer to a lasting outcome,” Zarif said in the four-minute video. “But there is no guarantee.”

He also warned that further “military and economic coercion” cannot “ensure submission.”

“I sense that my negotiating partners have recognized that coercion and pressure never lead to lasting solutions, but to more conflict and further hostility,” Zarif said. “And now, they realize that the most indiscriminate and unjust economic sanctions against my country have achieved absolutely none of their declared objectives; but instead have harmed innocents and antagonized a peaceful and forgiving nation.”

Bill and Hillary Clinton fight new demand for email server // Politico // Josh Gerstein – July 3, 2015

Lawyers for former President Bill Clinton and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton have moved to block a conservative lawyer's effort to pry into emails stored on the Clintons' private server.

In a motion filed Thursday evening in federal court in West Palm Beach, Fla., the Clintons' attorneys ask that conservative gadfly Larry Klayman be temporarily barred from demanding information in connection with a racketeering lawsuit he filed in March against the couple and the Clinton Foundation. The suit alleges that the Clintons used the private email server to frustrate Freedom of Information Act requests Klayman filed for records about waivers of Iranian sanctions and about leaks relating to measures the U.S. and Israel took to deal with Iran's nuclear program.

During a telephone conference in the case Wednesday, federal magistrate Dave Brannon gave Klayman the go ahead to begin discovery — the process of demanding documents, evidence and testimony — relevant to the suit.

Within hours of the conference, an aide to Klayman sent the Clinton team demands for "private email servers and any documents or things" related to Iran sanctions waivers, the Stuxnet computer virus the U.S. and Israel reportedly deployed to disrupt Iran's nuclear efforts and releases of information about plans to strike Iranian nuclear facilities.

Now, the Clinton lawyers are asking to be relieved of any duty to comply with those requests until a pending motion to dismiss Klayman's suit is resolved. The Clintons' attorneys also warn that allowing access to their records under these circumstances would open the door to a flurry of similar efforts.

"To permit Plaintiff to obtain documents responsive to FOIA requests (to the extent any even exist) through civil 'discovery' in a meritless lawsuit against the former Secretary of State would set a dangerous precedent ripe for abuse," the Clinton legal team writes in its motion (posted here).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons' lawyers, headed by longtime attorney and friend David Kendall, also point to Klayman's long history of litigation against the former first couple — cases Kendall said have been unsuccessful.

"Plaintiff has sued former Secretary Clinton or President Clinton at least fifteen times. Almost all of those lawsuits have failed before or at the motion-to-dismiss stage, and Mr. Klayman has not prevailed on the merits on a single claim over his decades-long history of suing the Individual Defendants," Kendall wrote.

According to the new motion, Brannon said he couldn't entertain the Clintons' request to halt discovery because the issue hadn't been formally referred to him by the judge overseeing the case, Donald Middlebrooks — a Clinton appointee.

Klayman filed a 93-page amended complaint in the case Thursday night. The complaint (posted here) accuses the Clintons of running a "criminal enterprise" that involved accepting "bribes" in the form of donations to the Clinton Foundation and payments for speeches. The conservative lawyer says he was injured by the alleged conspiracy because he could have used the undisclosed FOIA documents to advance his livelihood and income as a public advocate.

Middlebrooks has set a trial date of January 25, if the Clintons don't succeed in knocking the case out before then.

Hillary Clinton: 'I take a backseat to no one' on liberal record // Politico // Annie Karni – July 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton arrived in this liberal New England enclave with a message for anyone thinking about voting for Sen. Bernie Sanders of next-door Vermont: "I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record in standing up and fighting for progressive values."

Sanders, according to the latest New Hampshire polls, is trailing Clinton by just eight points. And at the first stop of her two-day swing through the early-voting state, Clinton highlighted contrasts with her main Democratic rival without mentioning him by name.

"We have to take on the gun lobby one more time," said Clinton, speaking without notes or a teleprompter in front of a crowd of about 850 Dartmouth students and native Granite Staters. "The majority of gun owners support universal background checks, and we have to work very hard to muster the public opinion to convince Congress that's what they should vote for."

She said it was the "height of irresponsibility not to talk about it." Sanders, who represents a pro-gun constituency, has voted against the Brady Bill, which required federal background checks for gun purchasers, as well as other major bills supported by gun-control advocates.

She also signaled that she would have no problem defending President Barack Obama's domestic agenda.

"If the country elects a Republican president, then they will repeal the Affordable Care Act," she warned. "Let's elect a Democratic president who is committed to quality affordable health care."

She praised Obama's moves to help the country recover from the economic crisis and said Republicans who say the recovery is too slow "just don't know the theory of original sin," blaming "the kind of poor management and bad economic policies that put us into the ditch in the first place."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's cookout — hamburgers and apple pie, served on a sun-dappled green on the Dartmouth College campus — attracted a crowd with more questions than passion for the Democratic frontrunner. A few people in the crowd wore T-shirts supporting Sanders, and waved his campaign banners.

"I'm probably leaning more toward Bernie," admitted Roland Downey, 18, who attended the rally with his father, Glenn King, a nurse. "I like that he's being more modern," said Downey of the 73-year-old candidate. "I don't know enough about Hillary." King said he was also still undecided.

Dee Roberts, who works in human resources at Dartmouth College, said she came out to see Clinton but that she likes what she's heard from Sanders. "We're pretty liberal here," she said. "He's very straightforward and doesn't take PAC money." She said she was hoping to hear more specifics from Clinton on her economic policy.

That didn't happen Friday — Clinton said she plans to begin laying out "specific policies" on the economy starting in about 10 days.

Instead, she reiterated some of the issues she has been focused on so far: expanding voting rights, ending an era of mass incarceration, boosting the importance of early childhood education and treatment for those with mental health and substance abuse problems.

She also weighed in on the Iran nuclear talks taking place in Vienna this weekend, vowing to protect Israel if a deal is reached.

"I so hope we are able to get a deal next week that puts the lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program," she said. "Even if we do get such a deal, we will still have major problems from Iran. They are the world's chief sponsor of terrorism. They use proxies like Hezbollah to sow discord and create insurgencies to destabilize governments. They are taking more and more control of a number of nations in the region and they pose an existential threat to Israel."

"We still are going to have to turn our attention to working with our partners to try to reign in and prevent this continuing Iranian aggressiveness," she said.

Clinton's team has been lowering expectations in New Hampshire. And the local advantage for a candidate like Sanders has, historically, been a real factor: then Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kennedy won the primary here in 1960 and former Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis won it in 1988. New Hampshire made Bill Clinton "the comeback kid," but he didn't even win it — he finished second in New Hampshire in 1992, behind former Massachusetts Senator Paul Tsongas. Then Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry won the Granite State in 2004. In 2012, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney won the New Hampshire primary.

"It is easy for Sen. Sanders to travel here," said Terry Shumaker, a New Hampshire attorney who co-chaired both of Bill Clinton's presidential campaigns. He said was committed to a real fight in the Granite State. "I can't even remember canvassing in late June for a primary eight months away, but we were doing it last Saturday and Hillary is in New Hampshire today and tomorrow," he said.

Clinton supporters also said support for Sanders should not be interpreted as anti-Clinton sentiment — and that polling shows many of his supporters list Clinton as their second choice. "From talking to some," said Shumaker, "I think that a lot of these folks in the end will vote for her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton: I hope Iran deal can be reached // Politico // Annie Karni – July 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton, speaking at a campaign rally near Dartmouth College, weighed in on the Iran nuclear talks taking place in Vienna this weekend, vowing to protect Israel if a deal is reached.

"I so hope we are able to get a deal next week that puts the lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program," she said. "Even if we do get such a deal, we will still have major problems from Iran. They are the world's chief sponsor of terrorism. They use proxies like Hezbollah to sow discord and create insurgencies to destabilize governments. They are taking more and more control of a number of nations in the region and they pose an existential threat to Israel."

Critics of the emerging deal have expressed concern that, if and when sanctions are lifted, Iran would plow its new windfall into efforts to destabilize Arab countries aligned with the West.

"We still are going to have to turn our attention to working with our partners to try to reign in and prevent this continuing Iranian aggressiveness," Clinton said.

The Iran talks were extended last week as negotiators sought to close the remaining gaps between the two sides; the new deadline for an agreement is Tuesday.

In a YouTube video posted online Friday, Iran's Foreign Minister Javad Zarif indicated that a deal was in reach.

"At this eleventh hour, despite some differences that remain, we have never been closer to a lasting outcome," Zarif said in the four-minute video. "But there is no guarantee."

He also warned that further "military and economic coercion" cannot "ensure submission."

"I sense that my negotiating partners have recognized that coercion and pressure never lead to lasting solutions, but to more conflict and further hostility," Zarif said. "And now, they realize that the most indiscriminate and unjust economic sanctions against my country have achieved absolutely none of their declared objectives; but instead have harmed innocents and antagonized a peaceful and forgiving nation."

Hillary steps up liberal rhetoric as Sanders surges in polls // AP // July 3, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said Friday she takes a "backseat to no one" on championing liberal causes, presenting herself as a standard-bearer for Democrats as primary challenger Bernie Sanders generates large, energetic crowds.

Clinton addressed 850 people at an outdoor amphitheater at Dartmouth College, a last-minute venue change made to accommodate a larger audience. Days earlier, Sanders spoke before about 10,000 people in Madison, Wisconsin. The former secretary of state made no mention of Sanders but warned that Republicans would unravel President Barack Obama's policies if they recaptured the White House, including the repeal of his signature health care overhaul.

"I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values," Clinton said on a sun-dappled kickoff to the Fourth of July weekend in Hanover, New Hampshire, across the Connecticut River from Sanders' home state of Vermont.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democratic presidential front-runner presented herself as a candidate of continuity to Obama and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, praising the Supreme Court's recent ruling upholding health care subsidies under the overhaul. She said if the nation elected a Republican president, "they will repeal the Affordable Care Act. That is as certain as I can say."

She said Obama and her husband had both inherited a series of economic headaches when they entered office and urged voters to elect another Democrat "to continue the policies that actually work for the vast majority of Americans."

Clinton said at the end of her husband's two terms, the economy had generated 22 million jobs, a balanced budget and "a surplus that would have paid off our national debt if it had not been rudely interrupted by the next administration."

The former New York senator's team has been wary of presenting her as the equivalent of Obama's third term but her acclaim for the president's policies highlighted a string of recent victories by the White House in its defense of the health care law, the Supreme Court's ruling allowing gay marriage and steady economic numbers.

In a rare discussion of foreign policy, Clinton spoke supportively of Obama's efforts to reach an agreement with Iran to curb the country's nuclear program, talks that she helped set in motion as secretary of state. Previewing next week's deadline for negotiations, Clinton said she hoped the U.S. would "get a deal that puts a lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program" but said it was "too soon" to know if that was possible.

Seeking the Democratic nomination, Clinton's focus has been on economic issues, the driving force behind Sanders' recent rise in polls. The senator describes himself as a democratic socialist and has won elections in Vermont as an independent. He has drawn large crowds around the country and reported raising $15 million since late April, about one-third of the $45 million Clinton has brought in.

Sanders said on Friday in an email to supporters that he would release a series of policy proposals in the next few weeks "to address the major issues facing our nation." The campaign is seeking to ramp up its volunteer base and planning to hold organizing meetings across the nation on July 29.

Clinton's allies have sought to lower expectations despite her early command of the primary field. During a stop at an ice cream shop in Lebanon, New Hampshire, Clinton told reporters "I always knew this was going to be competitive" and said she was looking forward to a "great debate."

Some of the people who came to see Clinton at Dartmouth said Sanders could ultimately have a positive influence on her.

"I think he's pushing her to address some issues and I think that will be all for the good," said Sybil Buell, a Norwich, Vermont, resident who attended the Clinton event. Buell said she was "on the fence" over whether to support Clinton or Sanders in the early stages of the campaign.

"There's a little feeling of inevitability with her," said Chuck Manns, of Lebanon, New Hampshire, who backed Clinton in 2008. He said Sanders was a "curiosity right now," but predicted Clinton's electability would shine through.

Hillary Clinton to gay Humans of New York teen: 'Your future will be amazing' // Guardian // Jana Kasperkevic – July 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton took to Facebook on Friday to offer words of encouragement and advice to a gay teen.

The leading Democratic presidential candidate posted remarks in response to a photo posted by the page of Humans of New York, a project run by photographer Brandon Stanton.

“I’m a homosexual and I’m afraid about what my future will be and that people won’t like me,” Stanton quotes the young New Yorker captured in his photograph as saying.

An hour after Stanton posted the photo, the official Clinton campaign account left the following comment: “Prediction from a grown-up: Your future is going to be amazing. You will surprise yourself with what you’re capable of and the incredible things you go on to do. Find the people who love and believe in you – there will be lots of them.”

Clinton signed the comment with “-H”, which is used on social media to indicate that she is the author the post.

Kristina Schake, deputy communications director for the Hillary for America campaign, then shared the comment on Twitter:

Two hours after Stanton posted the photo, it had accrued more than 20,000 comments.

This is not the first time Clinton has offered her support to the LGBT community.

Last month, when she officially launched her campaign in New York, the former secretary of state criticized Republican opponents in the developing 2016 race for turning “their backs on gay people who love each other”.

On 26 June, when the US supreme court ruled to legalize same-sex marriage, she said she was celebrating the “landmark victory for marriage equality”.

“For too many LGBT Americans who are subjected to discriminatory laws, true equality is still just out of reach,” Clinton said. “While we celebrate today, our work won’t be finished until every American can not only marry, but live, work, pray, learn and raise a family free from discrimination and prejudice. We cannot settle for anything less.”

Hillary: “I Take A Backseat To No One” At “Fighting For Progressive Values” // Buzzfeed // Katherine Miller – July 3, 2015

Before a Friday afternoon crowd of Granite Staters, Hillary Clinton offered a new line:

“I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values.”

Clinton, since her campaign began, has often cast herself as a “fighter” — emphasizing the “four fights” of her campaign and framing her career, going back to her days as a lawyer, as “fighting” for the welfare of children and women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the "progressive values" part is new — and just how committed Clinton is to the current slate of progressive policy goals, particularly when it comes to economics, has been a source of speculation and critique over the last year.

Bill Clinton's presidency often emphasized centrism: He signed the repeal of the Glass-Steagall Act, the banking securities law that progressives like Elizabeth Warren want to see restored; he promised and implemented changes to the welfare system; he supported the tough-on-crime policies popular in the 1980s and '90s, that his wife also wrote in support of at the time.

And Hillary Clinton herself was slow to, for instance, endorse same-sex marriage; she did not offer her public support until 2013, and did not deem it a constitutional right until earlier this year.

Hillary Clinton has already campaigned against some of the policies of the 1990s — she's argued in favor of changes to the criminal justice system and in favor of significantly broadening legal status and citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

Where Clinton — often critiqued by liberal Democrats for her connections to Wall Street — will ultimately come down on the populist economic policies pushed by progressives has been less clear. While Clinton's talked often about "reshuffling" the deck of cards she says is "stacked against" middle-class and working-class Americans, she's been less forthcoming about her proposed economic policies. Meanwhile, Bernie Sanders, the socialist senator from Vermont, has managed to draw impressive crowds in liberal bastions like Madison, Wisconsin.

On Friday, though, Clinton said she would soon be outlining her economic agenda in specifics.

Hillary Clinton Hopeful For Iran Nuclear Deal Next Week // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 3, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Friday that she is hopeful that a nuclear agreement with Iran can be reached before next week's deadline, indicating support for the draft agreement that may or may not come into force.

Speaking to a crowd of about 850 largely college-aged supporters on the campus of Dartmouth College, Clinton addressed the latest deadline for the P5+1 nuclear talks in Vienna, July 9, saying "these things always come down to the wire."

"I so hope that we are able to get a deal in the next week that puts a lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program because that's going to be a singular step in the right direction," Clinton said. The previous June 30 deadline was extended to give negotiators more time to try to hammer out lingering disagreements between the Iranian government and the governments of China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany.

"But even if we do get such a deal, we will still have major problems from Iran," Clinton said. "They are the world's chief sponsor of terrorism, they use proxies like Hezbollah to sow discord and create insurgencies to destabilize governments. They are taking more and more control of a number of nations in the region and they pose an existential threat to Israel. So even if we are successful on the nuclear front, we still are going to have to turn our attention to working with our partners to try to rein in and prevent this continuing Iranian aggressiveness."

Critics of the ongoing negotiations and draft agreement contend that it does not go far enough in reducing Iran's stockpile of radioactive materials and enrichment program. Clinton had previously adopted a measured tone on the talks, expressing support, but raising questions about whether Iran would uphold its end of the agreement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In April, she said she would back a deal that “verifiably cuts off all of Iran’s paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations.”

“The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high,” she added at the time.

One way or another, Clinton is likely going to have to own the agreement, as the seeds of the current round of talks began under her tenure in the Obama administration. Her chief foreign policy advisor Jake Sullivan helped carry out the secret back-channel negotiations to lay the groundwork for the Joint Plan of Action announced in 2013.

Clinton also spoke about the Affordable Care Act, seeking to keep alive a potent Democratic turnout tactic a week after the Supreme Court decided against undermining the law.

“I am so thrilled that we are at a point where all calls about repeal, repeal, repeal mean nothing unless they elect a Republican president,” Clinton said, addressing the crowd from a concrete stage in front of a shady lawn on the college campus known as the “BEMA” — “big empty meeting area” — just across the river from Democratic rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders’, home state.

“If the country elects a Republican as president, then they will repeal the Affordable Care Act,” she warned. “That is as certain as I can say unless we take back the Senate and take back the House. I hope we can do both, but on the safe side, let’s elect a Democratic president who is committed to quality, affordable healthcare.”

All Republican presidential candidates have vowed to repeal the law, but privately many of their aides acknowledge that a complete repeal would be nearly impossible to pull off, given how entrenched it has already become in the American healthcare system five years after passage. Republicans on Capitol Hill, meanwhile, have largely abandoned serious efforts to upend the law, owing to Obama’s staunch veto threats.

“Let’s break that and have a Democratic president to continue the policies that actually work for the vast majority of Americans,” Clinton said.

Clinton promised that she would begin to unveil her proposals for the economy in “about 10 days.”

Hillary Clinton: Electing Republican President Would Mean Repeal of Obamacare // NBC // Phil Helsel – July 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Friday warned New Hampshire voters that a Republican president would mean the end of President Barack Obama's health care overhaul.

"If the country elects a Republican president, then they will repeal the Affordable Care Act," Clinton told a crowd of about 850 at Dartmouth University.

Clinton said she was "thrilled" with the recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling that rejected a challenge to the act, and she said she would defend the law. "Where there are glitches, we need to address those, but this is a fundamental issue of fairness and humanity," Clinton said.

On the economy, Clinton said the Republican Party "keeps using the same old tired failed policies." She said the country needs to increase investment in science and technology, including green energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As talks with Iran over its nuclear program continued this week, Clinton said she hopes the U.S. gets a deal that "puts the lid on Iran's nuclear weapons program" — but said that even if such a deal is reached, "we will still face major problems from Iran."

Clinton also weighed in on gun control. President Barack Obama raised the topic in comments he made in the aftermath of a deadly attack on a the historic black church Emanuel AME Church in Charleston, in which nine people killed nine people in what authorities have said was a hate crime.

"We have to take on the gun lobby one more time," Clinton said. "At the very least, we need to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, people with serious mental challenges, terrorists, all of whom now are perfectly free to go and find a gun somewhere," she said.

"This is a controversial issue, I am well aware of that," Clinton said. "But I think it is the height of irresponsibility not to talk about it. So I will talk about it."

Clinton's only Democratic rival, Bernie Sanders, drew a crowd of 10,000 in Madison, Wisconsin, earlier this week. Sanders said Friday in an email to supporters that he would release a series of policy proposals in the next few weeks "to address the major issues facing our nation."

"I think he's pushing her to address some issues and I think that will be all for the good," Sybil Buell, a Norwich, Vermont, resident who attended the Clinton event, told The Associated Press. Buell said she was "on the fence" over whether to support Clinton or Sanders in the early stages of the campaign.

Hillary Clinton Not Fazed by Bernie Sanders' Crowds // ABC // Liz Kreutz – July 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton does not yet seem fazed by Bernie-mentum.

During a campaign stop in New Hampshire on Friday, the Democratic presidential front-runner responded to a question from a reporter about the massive crowds her challenger, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, has seen at his own campaign events this week.

“We each run our own campaigns and I always knew this was going to be competitive,” Clinton said at Dairy Twirl ice cream shop in Lebanon, New Hampshire, when asked about the growing support behind Sanders and how he's seeing crowds even bigger than she is.

“I want to have a great debate in the primary and caucus around the country and that is what I am looking forward to," she added.

This past week Sanders drew the largest crowd yet of any presidential candidate this campaign cycle. An estimated 10,000 people filled an arena in Madison, Wisconsin, to hear him speak.

Clinton's comments today came just after she held an organizing event at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire. According to her campaign, the rally had a turnout of roughly 850 people – a measly number, perhaps, compared to what Sanders attracted this week. However, Clinton's campaign did have to move the afternoon event to a larger venue because of what they said was “increased local interest in attending.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During her remarks at the rally, Clinton also doubled down on her own record as a progressive candidate.

"I take a back seat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values," she said in a woodsy, outdoor arena on the Ivy League's campus.

Richard Nixon Biographer: Hillary Clinton Has 'Nixonian Attributes' // ABC // Rick Klein – July 3, 2015

It's become almost cliché in American politics to call a politician Nixonian or "like Nixon" -- and it's rarely a positive to compare an officeholder or candidate to the only U.S. president to resign from office.

Yet to Evan Thomas, the author of a new Nixon biography who also covered the Clinton White House, comparing Hillary Clinton to Nixon works -- to an extent.

"Mrs. Clinton does have some Nixonian attributes. She can be guarded and defensive, a little bit too tough on her enemies," Thomas said in ABC News' "Power Players" series. "I saw this firsthand. She needs to watch that."

"She's not involved in anything like Watergate. She's not Nixon," he continued. "If you think you can manipulate the press and stonewall forever, [when] you're running for president and you're president, I don't think that works."

Thomas' book, "Being Nixon: A Man Divided," captures the contradictions of the 37th president, a profane and often bitter man who was also an optimist (he always thought even bad movies would get better, Thomas writes) who won four elections on national tickets.

Thomas describes Nixon's habit of working out of the Executive Office Building on the White House conflict -- he didn't like the Oval Office -- in overnight hours, when he couldn't sleep.

"Here's the guy who's the most powerful political person in the universe at the time -- didn't like people. He was shy," Thomas said. "Mostly he wanted to be alone."

The Nixon that comes through on the famous Watergate tapes -- vindictive, racist, anti-Semitic, angry -- doesn't capture the full man, he said.

"He showed off. He was trying to be like [Lyndon Johnson]. LBJ was good at swearing, Nixon was bad at it," Thomas said. "It just wasn't natural to Nixon. He did a lot of it -- I'm not minimizing what's on those tapes, it's terrible. But you know if you listen to a lot of the tapes -- he talks about the world. He's a very intellectual, intelligent man, It's just that he would show off by yelling too much."

Hillary Clinton's representatives declined comment when reached by ABC News.

Dems have to take White House to keep Obamacare, Clinton warns // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – July 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton warned that if Democrats don't take the White House in 2016, Obamacare — despite being affirmed in a Supreme Court decision last week — could still be doomed.

"I'm so thrilled we are at a point where all the calls about 'repeal, repeal, 'repeal' mean nothing unless they elect a Republican president," Clinton said at an outdoor Dartmouth College rally this afternoon. "If the country elects a Republican president, they will appeal the Affordable Care Act. That's as certain as I can say, unless we take back the Senate and take back the House. I hope we can do both, but just to be on the safe side, let's elect a president who's committed to affordable health care."

Clinton also took a subtle jab at Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders who has been drawing crowds of thousands recently and closing the gap in polls to under 10 points, claiming she's the progressive candidate for president.

"I will fight against inequality," said Clinton. "I have a long history of doing that. I will fight hard against what I see as the injustice and unfairness in our society. I take a backseat to no one when you look at my record of standing up and fighting for progressive values."

Clinton repeated a familiar piece of her stump speech where she reminds Democrats of the economic failures left behind by both President George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush.

"There's just a pattern where the other side keeps using the same old tired failed policies, they don't work, and Democratic presidents have to come in and fix what was broken," Clinton said.

She will also hold a rally in Glen, then march in a parade in Gorham tomorrow as her two-day New Hampshire trip continues.

In House, liberals side with Clinton over Sanders // The Hill // Mike Lillis – July 3, 2015

Dozens of House liberals have endorsed Hillary Clinton's White House bid even as Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is gaining steam.

Sanders, a liberal icon, has emerged as a surprisingly strong candidate since launching his campaign two months ago, raising $15 million and making huge gains on Clinton recently among Democratic voters in Iowa, which will host the country's first presidential caucus.

Yet at least 26 Democrats representing the 69-member Congressional Progressive Caucus –– a bastion of liberal thinking that Sanders helped to launch –– have already endorsed Clinton, according to a tally being kept by The Hill.

The list includes liberal stalwarts like Reps. Rosa DeLaura (D-Conn.) and Debbie Dingell (D-Mich.) –– both forceful voices in the recent trade debate that Clinton was reluctant to enter –– and Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.), Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.) and Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), three vociferous critics of an Iraq War that Clinton, as a New York senator, supported.

A number of Democrats have cheered Sanders' entrance into the race, and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), another liberal favorite, hasn't ruled out the possibility of campaigning for him.

"I love what Bernie is talking about," she told the Boston Globe Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But no members of Congress have officially endorsed the Vermont senator.

Rep. Raúl Grijalva (D-Ariz.), head of the Progressive Caucus, said the decision to withhold endorsements this early in the primary process is a practical one. Many lawmakers simply want a longer opportunity to hear where candidates stand on the issues, he said.

“There will come a point when each person will make up his or her mind as to who to support, and allowing the primary to play out a bit gives everyone the chance to make that decision with as much information as possible,” Grijalva said in an email. “Endorsing now does a disservice to our candidates who are looking for time to make their case to the American people.”

A House Democratic aide echoed that message, suggesting that early endorsements risk undermining the opportunity for lawmakers to influence the debate. The greatest sway the Democrats will have, the aide argued, will be in proposing specific policy prescriptions surrounding the most prominent legislative fights to come –– including the looming debates over a highway bill, government spending and the Ex-Im bank –– and seeing how the candidates react.

“Coming out now doesn't really give you anything,” said the aide, whose boss has not yet endorsed a Democratic candidate. “The ideas coming from congressional Democrats will be more important.”

Licy DoCanto, head of The DoCanto Group, a public policy consulting firm, downplayed the influence of congressional endorsements, arguing that they're largely “immaterial” outside the Beltway. The real challenge facing Sanders and the others in the Democratic field –– including former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Sen. Jim Webb (Va.) –– is not in winning endorsements but in building a national profile to rival Clinton's.

The recent Iowa poll, he said, is indication that at least Sanders might be breaking through.

“The rest of the country is starting to realize there are other serious candidates, DoCanto said. “It's not just Hillary Clinton.”

Clinton remains by far the front-runner within a tiny Democratic field. The former secretary of state has, for years, been laying the operational ground work of her candidacy, and she hauled in a record of more than $45 million in the first quarter of the race.

But she's also raised concerns among liberals on and off Capitol Hill, who have criticized her silence on the trade debate, hammered her approach to national security issues and questioned her ties to Wall Street and other well-heeled donors.

Sanders long track record in Congress, many liberals contend, makes him the better voice for the middle class.

“Bernie has been there with us every time, fighting for fairness, for environmental justice, for voting rights and getting big money out of politics,” Larry Cohen, a leader of the Communication Workers of America, said this week in endorsing Sanders. “This is our chance to build a movement that will not answer to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.”

The debate arrives following a 2014 election cycle when Democrats were hammered at the polls, losing control of the Senate and ceding the largest GOP House majority since the Great Depression.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leaders of the Progressive Caucus and other liberals have blamed the losses on what they say is the reluctance of Democrats to embrace core principles like wage equality, universal healthcare and a robust safety-net system. Many are welcoming the notion of a well-contested Democratic primary –– in lieu of a landslide –– arguing that the ultimate nominee will be better poised to win the White House afterwards.

“President Obama and Secretary Clinton both benefitted from their hard-fought primary in 2008,” Grijalva said. “They tested each other, and as a result, they both became stronger leaders in the end.”

Democratic strategists say there are numerous factors fueling the timing and direction of lawmaker endorsements, including historic loyalties to candidates, public sentiment, gender considerations and regional concerns. But while those endorsements can help with fundraising, groundwork and momentum, the strategists add, it's ultimately up to the contenders themselves to win the trust of voters and get them to the polls.

“You have another surrogate in your army to go out there and spread the message,” said Doug Thornell, democratic strategist and managing director at SKDKnickerbocker, a public affairs firm. “But when it comes to winning the votes, it's up to the candidates.”

On the primary front, the Democrats think they have the advantage over the Republicans, who have a much larger field and face more pressure to distinguish themselves as top-tier candidates. Thornell predicted the GOP primary “is going to get bloody earlier than normal.”

“There are going to be a lot of desperate Republicans, doing whatever it takes to claw their way into the top ten,” Thornell said. “The Democrats don't really have that problem.”

Hillary Clinton to head back to Iowa // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015

Hillary Clinton will head back to the Hawkeye State for the fourth time since she jumped into the 2016 presidential race, her campaign announced on Friday.

She’ll speak at an organizing event at the Iowa City Public Library on July 7, followed by an event at a private home in Ottumwa, a southern city in Wapello County.

Back in 2008, 43 percent of the county’s 3,100 Democratic caucus-goers sided with former Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), while 32 percent backed Clinton and 24 chose then-Sen. Obama.

Clinton has spent most of her almost three months on the campaign in the early primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada. With this visit, she’ll have visited Iowa more than any other state during the campaign.

Both her main Democratic foes, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Gov. Martin O’Malley (Md.), are in Iowa for campaign events on Friday. She currently holds a strong lead in recent Hawkeye State polling, but that lead has slipped as of late.

A new Quinnipiac poll released Thursday showed Clinton with 52 percent and Sanders with 33 percent, a 19-point lead. That’s down from a 45-point lead in a Quinnipiac poll from May.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Inside Hillary Clinton's evolution from Girl Scout to presidential frontrunner // Business Insider // Melia Robinson – July 3, 2015

Before she became First Lady, New York's first female US senator, and a viral internet meme, Hillary Clinton was a city girl who dreamed of being an astronaut or a baseball player.

Clinton, for the second time, is seeking the Democratic nomination for president. She'll campaign in New Hampshire over the long holiday weekend.

With her presidential campaign officially in full gear, we decided to take a look back at how Clinton became one of the world's most powerful people.

Born October 26, 1947, Hillary Diane Rodham Clinton grew up in Park Ridge, Illinois, an upper-middle-class Chicago suburb with tree-lined streets, shopping centers, and church spires dotting the skyline.

The family lived in a two-story brick house on the corner of Wisner and Elm Streets, since named Rodham Corner by the city. It was a central hub for the neighborhood children.

Clinton's mother, Dorothy, cared for the family and taught Sunday School, and her father, Hugh, ran a small drapery business after serving in the Navy during World War II.

Not one for gender norms, Clinton wanted to be an astronaut or a baseball player when she grew up. She was an active participant in sports, her church, and Girl Scouts.

Dorothy encouraged her daughter to stand up for herself, even giving Clinton permission to punch a bully who tormented some of the neighborhood kids. When Clinton finally confronted her menace, she raced home to announce her victory, saying, "I can play with the boys now!"

She brought home good grades in junior high, but her father remained unimpressed and told her "school must have been too easy." His response pushed Clinton to study hard and prove him wrong.

While a student at Wellesley College, Clinton began to drift from her father's conservative values and lean to the left, causing them to fall out, according to some of Clinton's biographers. She majored in political science.

At commencement, she tossed aside much of her prepared speech and criticized the remarks of a US senator, who had spoken just moments before. TIME magazine profiled Clinton, and she arrived at Yale Law School with a reputation for audacity.

Soon after, she met a young man named Bill, "a wild card in her well-ordealed cerebral existence." There are numerous stories in circulation on how the classmates became an item.

In his memoir, Bill Clinton writes that Hillary caught his eye in a class on political and civil rights. "She had thick dark blond hair and wore eyeglasses and no makeup," he describes. "But she conveyed a sense of strength and self-possession I had rarely seen in anyone, man or woman."

"He was the first man I'd met," Hillary told one interviewer, "who wasn't afraid of me." When Bill returned to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Arkansas with lofty political ambitions, Hillary — who worked as a staff attorney for the Children's Defense Fund and then for an investigative committee advising the House on Watergate — followed. The pair married in 1975.

Clinton, who originally declined to take on her husband's last name, had ambitions of her own. In a new state, she taught college law, became the first woman to make partner at her firm, and gave birth to a girl, named Chelsea.

During her 12 years as Arkansas' First Lady, Clinton emerged as a champion-to-be-reckoned-with of children's legal rights. She "chaired the Arkansas Educational Standards Committee ... and co-founded the Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families."

She continued with that momentum as First Lady of the US. Clinton led the fight for healthcare reform, but that push ultimately failed.

In 1995, Clinton delivered a groundbreaking speech at the United Nation's Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, China, declaring that "human rights are women's rights, and women's rights are human rights once and for all."

Controversy rocked the White House when Bill Clinton, two years into his second term, admitted to having an affair with an intern. Hillary Clinton stuck by him, shocking some feminists and contributing to the survival of her husband's presidency.

The family later purchased this 100-year-old Dutch Colonial home outside Westchester, New York, for $1.7 million, so that Clinton could establish residency in the state. She set sights on a US Senate seat in 2001.

The first woman senator from New York, Clinton helped expand broadband across the state, expanded TRICARE, and secured $20 billion to rebuild New York after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

After being reelected to the US Senate and launching an unsuccessful campaign for the presidency, Clinton took on her most international role yet: Secretary of State under President Barack Obama, to whom she had just lost the Democratic presidential nomination.

Obama dispatched Clinton to broker a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas, paving the way for peace talks.

She gathered with senior officials in the Situation Room as US Special Forces carried out a raid in Pakistan resulting in the death of Osama bin Laden.

Clinton took the fall for the deadly attacks in Benghazi, Libya, that left a US ambassador and three other Americans dead. A House committee is still investigating her and the department's handling of the situation.

After traveling nearly 1 million miles and visiting more countries than any of her predecessors, Clinton stepped down from office and returned to the private sector.

Last year, Clinton stepped into a new role that she says "will affect my being, not just my thinking" — grandmother. Daughter Chelsea gave birth to a little girl named Charlotte.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The last few months kept Clinton's eyes on the prize: a second run at the US presidency in 2016. She announced her official bid on New York's Roosevelt Island in June.

Judicial Watch: Obama and Hillary Clinton Concocted Benghazi Video Lie with Jihadist Help // Breitbart // Edwin Mora – July 3, 2015

President Obama and Hillary Clinton likely made the decision to falsely tie an inflammatory anti-Islam Internet video to the fatal Sept. 11, 2012 terrorist attack that left four Americans dead in Benghazi, Libya, the chief of the conservative government watchdog group Judicial Watch (JW) told Breitbart News.

The president and then-Secretary of State Clinton sought the assistance from domestic and foreign jihadists in spreading the online video lie, added JW President Tom Fitton.

Breitbart News spoke to Fitton about newly released Benghazi attack-related documents pried out of the U.S. State Department under a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) lawsuit filed by JW last September.

One of the document shows that the Pentagon received a request for military assets in response to the attack, but the Obama administration seemingly refused.

An email from the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) to top White House and other administration officials states, “OSD has received queries asking if military assets are being sent to either location [Libya and Egypt]. Have responded ‘not to our knowledge.’”

The Obama administration’s initial response explaining the cause of the attack was “immediately determined by top Obama White House officials” contrary to the president’s claim that it was based on intelligence available at the time.

Obama officials and the president himself linked an anti-Islam Internet video to the attack, saying it incited the terrorists who carried out the assault.

The president said the video link was gleaned from the “best understanding of the intelligence that had been provided.”

However, Fitton told Breitbart News, “We haven’t found any records or any intelligence that the video had anything to do with the Benghazi attacks.”

“What you have is nothing other than Mrs. Clinton’s statement referencing a video, the White House approving it before it was released and then blessing it, saying, ‘this is our response,’” he added.

Fitton noted that President Obama spoke to Clinton during the night of the attack.

“I think you can fairly conclude that it was during that phone call that they decided to push the video lie,” he told Breitbart News.

“They started soliciting Islamists to promote the video lie — some of the Islamists responded by saying, ‘the video is terrible, the attacks are justified, we should outlaw all criticism of Islam.' Thank you Obama! This is what we get as a result of your engagement," he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Obama administration refuses to divulge the contents of the phone conversation.

"There's a document that tells us what was said between Obama and Clinton during the night of the attack," said the JW chief. "There's nothing prohibiting its release, it's purely discretionary."

The Clinton-led State Department deferred to the White House on the official response to the attack, according to an e-mail sent by a department spokesperson to the aide of a top State Department official and Clinton's personal aide the day of the tragedy.

A separate e-mail sent out later that day confirms that the White House decided to go with Clinton's statement tying the Benghazi terrorist attack to the Internet video as the accepted overall government response for the night.

The "[U.S. government] comment" ended up being "Clinton's notorious public statement, made hours after the initial terrorist attack, falsely suggesting that the Benghazi assault was a 'response to inflammatory material posted on the Internet," notes JW in a press release.

Obama administration officials stuck to that narrative until it was debunked. JW obtained documents in April 2014 revealing the president's public relations team intentionally portrayed the Benghazi attack being "rooted in an Internet video, and not a failure of policy."

Last month, JW released documents showing that the Obama administration was made aware that al-Qaeda was behind the attack immediately after it occurred.

"The new documents show that the Obama administration engaged domestic and foreign Islamist groups and foreign nationals to push the Internet video narrative," reports JW. "The day after the attack, Rashad Hussain, the Obama administration's special envoy to the Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC), sent an email to Ambassador Ufuk Gokcen, the OIC's ambassador to the United Nations, and Cenk Uraz, an official with the OIC, pushing the video as the cause of the Benghazi attack."

Hussain played a role in pushing the rhetoric that the video incited the terrorists attack and in fuelling efforts to criminalize criticism of Islam.

Another document detailed "how the Obama administration reached out to domestic groups, foreign groups and governments in a full-court press to tie the video to the Benghazi attack," reports JW.

U.S. Amb. J. Christopher Stevens, U.S. Foreign Service Information Management Officer Sean Smith, and CIA contractors, Tyrone S. Woods and Glen Doherty were killed in the attack.

Why was Cherie so keen to open doors for a billionaire sheikh's wife? // Daily Mail // Guy Adams – July 3, 2015

Though she has pointedly refused in the past to bow or curtsey to Her Majesty the Queen, Cherie Blair tends to adopt a very different policy when she meets stupendously rich royals from one particular, very wealthy corner of the Middle East.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Back in 2006, she was, for example, photographed dutifully nodding her head at an absolute monarch named Sheikh Hamad Bin Khalifa al-Thani and his wife, Sheikha Mozah Bint Nasser al Missned, on the steps of 10 Downing Street.

Sheikh Hamad is the former ruler of Qatar, a Sharia state where homosexuality is punishable by imprisonment or flogging, migrant workers are routinely abused, women's rights are severely curtailed, and the government, which allows the Afghan Taliban to run an office in its capital, Doha, has been widely accused of sponsoring terrorism.

Fortunately, he also happens to have a personal fortune of £1.5 billion, thanks to his country's vast reserves of oil and gas.

The Sheikh is rarely afraid to throw that money around, especially in Britain. Which may, or may not, have helped Mrs Blair reconcile the decision to make such a public gesture of subservience with her oft-repeated support for feminism, equality and other matters of Left-wing principle.

This week, almost a decade later, came a fascinating insight into another display of loyalty to Qatar on Cherie's part.

A tranche of private emails, released by the U.S. government, revealed that Cherie subsequently acted as a sort of informal fixer for the Qatari royals, successfully lobbying Hillary Clinton to agree to a private meeting with Sheikha Mozah.

It showed how, two years after leaving Downing Street, she asked Mrs Clinton, who was then the U.S. Secretary of State (America's version of a Foreign Secretary) to hold 'women to women' [sic] talks with the wealthy Arab royal, whom she dubbed 'my friend from Q' [Qatar].

Mrs Blair and Mrs Clinton exchanged 19 messages about the matter over a four-month period in 2009, in a correspondence that at times sees the former prime minister's wife sounding very like a pushy lobbyist for the Gulf dynasty.

'Sheikha Moser [sic] has approached me privately saying they are keen to get their relationship with the USA onto a more positive footing and she was hoping for a "women to women" one-to-one private meeting with you,' reads her opening email to Hillary Clinton, sent in May 2009.

Sheikha Mozah 'has real influence in Qatar', it continues, adding that she would like, in particular, to discuss disability issues, though: 'I am sure the conversation would not be confined to these issues, but would be about the U.S./Qatar relationship generally.'

Intriguingly, Cherie claims in that message to have been 'working with' the Arab country's royals since as far back as 2005, at a time when her husband, Tony, was prime minister.

Several emails later, with a meeting successfully set up, Britain's former 'first lady' sends a message showering Ms Clinton with effusive praise, saying: 'It's fantastic to see you doing so well, and when I see what a difference you are making it reminds me why politics is too important to be left to the bad people.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By ‘bad people’, Ms Blair presumably means anyone whose political outlook fails to dovetail with her own.

But we digress. Following further scheduling adjustments, the meeting finally took place in September 2009. Shortly afterwards, Hillary emailed Cherie to apologise for managing to ‘miss you’ on a recent trip to Europe, explaining only ‘a few minutes w (sic) Tony at the . . . mtg.’

Cherie replied cheerfully: ‘It was great to see Bill on such good form. My friend from Q really enjoyed your meeting and felt it had gone well. Hope you did, too.’

These informal, sometimes unctuous emails were sent via Mrs Blair’s HTC smartphone to Mrs Clinton’s private account.

They came to light this week thanks to U.S. freedom of information laws, which saw a court order that the messages be subject to the same public disclosure as ones sent to and from official White House email addresses.

Much of the correspondence surprised Middle East experts, many of whom were baffled as to why Sheikha Mozah needed Cherie Blair to introduce her to Hillary Clinton in the first place. ‘The Sheikha is a very high-powered woman and I seriously doubt she would have required an introduction,’ says Chris Doyle, of the Council for Arab-British understanding.

‘The U.S. has a military base in Qatar, and the countries have diplomatic relations. It’s possible Mrs Blair is attempting to connect them for her own reasons.’

Intriguingly, given her lofty career as a barrister, Cherie’s emails are riddled with sloppy spelling and grammatical errors.

She calls Hillary ‘Hilary’, frequently fails to use question marks, commas and full stops, and confuses the words ‘woman’ and ‘women’.

Throughout the correspondence, she also repeatedly mis-spells the Sheikha’s name as ‘Moser’ rather than ‘Mozah’. ‘It’s incredibly incompetent to mis-spell her name. If this is noticed by Her Highness and the people around her, they will not like it,’ says Chris Doyle.

‘These emails will be read and gossiped about throughout the Gulf and could be very damaging to Blair’s future interests.’

Of particular concern to Qatar will be any suggestion that Cherie or Hillary’s interest in the Sheikha was motivated by a desire for possible financial gain.

‘Any sense that the Qataris have been treated like that will be met with huge resentment,’ he says.

Recent years have, after all, seen the Blairs — Tony was Middle East peace envoy for eight years until he recently stood down — frequently criticised for using the contacts they gained in Downing Street to continue to wield power and influence behind the scenes, often seeming to enrich themselves in the process. His firm, Tony Blair Associates, is active in several Gulf states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To this end, it's interesting to note that Sheikh Hamad was one of the first foreign statesmen invited to visit the couple after they moved into Downing Street in 1997.

Over the ensuing years, Qatar embarked on an astonishing spending spree in Britain, buying such trophy assets as The Shard, Harrods, the 2012 Olympic Village, the former U.S. Embassy in Mayfair's Grosvenor Square and a quarter of supermarket Sainsbury's.

Sheikha Mozah, the second (and undoubted favourite) of Sheikh Hamad's three wives — and the mother of Qatar's monarch, Sheikh Tamin bin Hamad al-Thani — has also splashed the cash.

In 2013, she spent £120million buying London's most expensive private house, which takes up three adjacent properties in Cornwall Terrace by Regent's Park, and boasts a private beauty salon, gymnasium, servants' quarters, 'children's floor' and swimming pool built from Portland stone.

Given such ostentation, conspiracy theorists will seek to join the dots between Mrs Blair's assiduous networking on behalf of the free-spending Sheikha and some of the extremely lucrative work Qatar later bunged her family's way.

In 2012, for example, Tony Blair was paid an astonishing $1million simply for setting up a meeting between the al-Thanis and the commodities firm Glencore, which was seeking a £50billion merger with Qatari-controlled firm Xstrata.

The money, the equivalent of £640,000, was earned for just three hours of work.

In 2011, he acted as an 'honest broker' who attempted to 'smooth over' a failed effort by the Qataris to buy the London hotels Claridge's, the Berkeley and the Connaught.

The deal's existence was revealed in a later court case. Had it come off, Tony would have netted a rumoured seven-figure sum.

Cherie, meanwhile, has seen Qatari money funnelled to her personal charity, the Cherie Blair Foundation for Women.

In 2013, Sheikha Mozah spent £120million buying London's most expensive private house, which takes up three adjacent properties in Cornwall Terrace by Regent's Park, and boasts a private beauty salon, gymnasium, servants' quarters, 'children's floor' and swimming pool built from Portland stone Happily, after Hillary was put in touch with the Sheikha by Cherie, Hillary's Clinton Foundation charity also shared in the wealth.

It has received between $1million and $5million from the Qatari government, according to U.S. records. Included in that sum is a donation of between $250,000 and $500,000 from the Qatar 22 Supreme Committee, which controversially helped win the 2022 World Cup in circumstances that are widely believed to have been corrupt.

With regard to the emails, a spokesman for Mrs Blair said she was 'merely acting as a conduit' between two influential friends, as she had established a shared interest in disability issues with Sheikha Mozah.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is, of course, no suggestion of any wrongdoing on the Blairs' part. But the email messages, along with the strange esteem in which Cherie appears to hold these dynastic Arab royals, may offer further evidence of how extreme wealth, particularly in the hands of repressive foreign potentates, so often attracts the interest of the Blairs.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

O'Malley jabs at GOP-led Congress in Newton // Des Moines Register // Grant Rodgers – July 3, 2015

Presidential contender Martin O'Malley offered hopeful words Friday for Democrats tired of the country's Republican-led Congress.

"I have some good news for you," he said. "I think we all have to acknowledge that we will not be here forever, and I think we can applaud the fact that this Congress will not be in office forever."

The quip drew laughs and applause from the crowd of more than 60 at Uncle Nancy's Coffee House, a shop on the Newton square with quilts covering the walls. It was the answer to a question from the audience on how he'd handle partisan bickering in Congress if elected president.

O'Malley offered up — as he has often in Iowa — examples from his terms as Maryland's governor. Any good executive realizes nothing can get done without input from political opponents, he said.

"I'm going to call them, call them, call them," he said. "Many of the things that we got done, whether it was marriage equality or repealing the death penalty in Maryland, we only got done because of a few Republican legislators that voted with us."

Pella resident Cheryl Scherr, who asked the question, said she's quickly pivoted to support O'Malley after the grassroots campaign prodding Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run folded. Scherr was enthused by O'Malley after seeing him speak at the state's Democratic convention in 2014, she said.

"I like his ideas, especially emphasizing Main Street over Wall Street," she said.

The Newton stop was his second on Friday amid a three-day swing through Iowa.

Earlier in Ankeny, O'Malley said his proposal to power America's electrical grid solely through clean energy by 2050 is the best plan from any 2016 presidential candidate to combat climate change. The former governor likened his clean energy plan to putting a man on the moon during a tour of Des Moines Area Community College's wind turbine technology facility.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We had a deadline, and smart people rose to the challenge," he said. "It was an engineering challenge and it was a cause worthy of a great people, and so too is saving our planet from irreversible climate change."

Tenets of O'Malley's energy plan include:

Founding a Clean Energy Job Corps that would create jobs retro-fitting buildings across the country to be more energy efficient and restoring forest areas that absorb carbon from the atmosphere.

Passing federal legislation to put caps on carbon emissions on all sources, including factories and power plants. The federal government would issue carbon emissions permits and invest portions of the money brought in back into the job corps.

Rejecting applications for projects such as the controversial Keystone XL Pipeline and denying new permits for oil drilling off-shore and in Alaska. Royalties would be increased for companies currently drilling on federal land, and the money would be re-invested in job training programs.

That message of mixing job opportunities with clean energy resonated with Ellen Bridenstine, 54, a Des Moines Public Library employee who came to the Ankeny event. O'Malley, though lagging in the polls behind Sen. Bernie Sanders and Hillary Clinton, could be a "fresh face" for the party, she said.

"I'm very concerned about the status of the planet, which makes everything else seems sort of in the background," she said. "I sense his awareness and interest in that issue."

AT THE EVENT

SETTING: O'Malley toured DMAAC's wind turbine technology facility Friday before a stop at Uncle Nancy's Coffee House in Newton.

CROWDS: Around seven people, not counting journalists and campaign staff, came to see O'Malley at the Ankeny event. More than 60 people were waiting to see him in Newton.

REACTION: Emma Huston, 20, a Drake University biology student, said she was impressed by O'Malley's clean energy plan, but she's not ready to support a single candidate. Many of her friends are Bernie Sanders supporters.

WHAT'S NEXT: O'Malley is speaking at meet-and-greets in Waterloo and Manchester on Friday. He will finish a three-day tour of the state on Saturday. For details, visit data.desmoinesregister.com/iowa-caucus/candidate-tracker/index.php

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders's Revolutionary Roots Were Nurtured in '60s Vermont // NYT // Sarah Lyall – July 3, 2015

When he came to Vermont in the late 1960s to help plan the upending of the old social order, the future presidential candidate Bernie Sanders brought with him the belief that the United States was starkly divided into two groups: the establishment and the revolutionaries. He was a revolutionary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The Revolution Is Life Versus Death," in fact, was the title of an article he wrote for The Vermont Freeman, an alternative, authority-challenging newspaper published for a few years back then. The piece began with an apocalyptically alarmist account of the unbearable horror of having an office job in New York City, of being among "the mass of hot dazed humanity heading uptown for the 9-5," sentenced to endless days of "moron work, monotonous work."

"The years come and go," Mr. Sanders wrote, in all apparent seriousness. "Suicide, nervous breakdown, cancer, sexual deadness, heart attack, alcoholism, senility at 50. Slow death, fast death. DEATH."

Chalk some of this up to being young and unemployed. Mr. Sanders, now 73, has had a steady, nonrevolutionary job for quite some time now. His current workplace, the United States Senate, is not exactly known for its thrill-a-minute dynamism. But through his long evolution from outraged outsider to mainstream man in a suit, Mr. Sanders has remained true to his original message: sympathy for the downtrodden, the impoverished and the disenfranchised in the face of the rich and the powerful.

Back then, he was part of a crowd of like-minded young people who converged on Burlington at a time when America seemed to be rewriting its history on the spot. Students, hippies, labor organizers, trust fund kids, urban escapees, impoverished anti-Vietnam War campaigners and environmentalists yearning to be closer to the land — they came because they believed that change was coming and that they had found the right place for a revolution.

Mr. Sanders was barely 30, full of restless energy, with wild curly hair, a brash Brooklyn manner and a mind fizzing with plans to remake the world. Short on money but long on ideas, he found employment where he could, supporting himself through odd jobs like carpentry work.

"Freelance journalist" has always been on the list of things he did before he began running for statewide office, futilely, as a Liberty Union Party candidate in the 1970s. But the description is a bit of a stretch. A look through his journalistic output, such as it was, reveals that he had perhaps a dozen pieces published — interviews, essays, state-of-the-nation diatribes — most in The Freeman.

They provide a useful insight into the formative thinking of the man who would go on to become Burlington's first socialist mayor, then a senator and now a presidential candidate who is drawing crowds in the thousands with his unapologetic leftist message. The writings also reflect the particular mood in this one little spot in Vermont in an era of extraordinary turmoil in America, when the social fabric seemed in danger of ripping apart over issues like the Vietnam War, race and poverty.

Among Mr. Sanders's efforts was a 1972 essay on sexual politics, "Man — and Woman," which drew unflattering attention recently after Mother Jones magazine included it in an article about him. Its opening passage, which deals with men's sexual fantasies, is meant to be satirically provocative but comes across as crassly sexist. (Mr. Sanders's underlying point, expressed less feverishly further down in the article, is that men and women should rethink how they deal with each other.)

Another essay mocked what Mr. Sanders felt to be the soul-destroying nature of conventional education.

"If children of 5 are not taught to obey orders, sit still for 7 hours a day, respect their teacher, and raise their hands when they have to go to the bathroom, how will they learn (after 17 more years of education) to become the respectful clerks, technicians and soldiers who keep our society free, our economy strong, and such inspiring men as Richard Nixon and Deane Davis in political office," Mr. Sanders wrote, referring to the United States president and the Vermont governor at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People in Mr. Sanders's circle back then remember visiting the future senator at his small apartment in Burlington. "It was subsistence living," said Greg Guma, the author of "The People's Republic: Vermont and the Sanders Revolution."

Mr. Guma knew the young Mr. Sanders as a kitchen-table fulminator and political organizer, not as a writer. At their first meeting, he recalled, Mr. Sanders "kind of berated me" when Mr. Guma asked who he was.

"He said he was unimportant and it was all about the movement, and then it kind of escalated. 'If you don't support the movement, I don't want your vote,' " Mr. Guma said. "Obviously he's become more adept at cultivating voters."

Mr. Sanders's pieces in The Freeman were consistent with the newspaper's ethos. The paper, which had humble production values and cost $10 for a year's subscription in 1971, was founded in 1969 by Roger L. Albright, a former minister, as a place for like-minded leftists to opine in outraged tones about the issues of the day. Often, apparently, they did it for free.

"Pay? You gotta be kidding — I don't recall ever getting paid," said Marvin Fishman, now 77, who wrote about prison issues for the paper. (He had spent a year in prison on a marijuana charge.)

"We were broke, they were broke, everybody was broke," said Frank Kochman, who was recruited for the paper when Mr. Albright rescued his stranded Volkswagen bug from a snowbank, and who was its general manager and co-publisher from 1971 to 1973. "If we had a little money, we'd try to pay something."

Mr. Sanders contributed pieces only sporadically. He interviewed a "labor agitator" and an old-time farmer, and he wrote some articles about health, including one in which he cited studies claiming that cancer could be caused by psychological factors such as unresolved hostility toward one's mother, a tendency to bury aggression beneath a "facade of pleasantness" and having too few orgasms.

"Sexual adjustment seemed to be very poor in those with cancer of the cervix," he wrote, quoting a study in a journal called Psychosomatic Medicine.

One article, to observe the 10th anniversary of the Cuban revolution, argued that despite its many failings, Cuba had made great progress in health care and education. "The American press and mass media have been stepping up their usual distorted and inaccurate reporting," Mr. Sanders wrote.

In a piece titled "Reflections on a Dying Society," he declared that the United States was virtually going to hell in a handcart. Its food was laden with chemicals; its environment was being ruined; the threat of nuclear annihilation or "death by poison gas" was increasing; people were suffering from malaise and "psychosomatic disease"; citizens were being coerced and duped by the government and the advertising industry; and the economy was based on "useless" goods "designed to break down or used for the slaughter of people."

"The general social situation, to say the least," he wrote, "does not look good."

Later in the 1970s, Mr. Sanders took a steady job with a Liberty Union colleague making filmstrips about important events in American history, many from the colonial period, and selling them door-to-door to schools. (He also made a half-hour film about his hero, Eugene V. Debs, the labor organizer who ran unsuccessfully for president five times.) They worked on a shoestring out of Mr. Sanders's house, said the colleague, Ron MacNeil.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think our motivation was that we were interested in American history,” Mr. MacNeil said.

But that was after Mr. Sanders had run, and lost, various statewide races as a Liberty Union candidate. By 1972, when he ran as the party’s candidate for senator and governor (he lost both races by very wide margins), he had begun publishing The Movement, an occasional newsletter.

He put together the whole thing himself, said Doris Lake, another early Liberty Union candidate, and focused on the issues that were consuming him. One edition included a letter Ms. Lake had written to her supervisor, and had shown to Mr. Sanders, complaining about working conditions in the eyeglass-lens factory where she worked the night shift, Ms. Lake said.

But for Mr. Sanders, everything was about ideas to make the world better, both in real life and in The Movement.

“I believe there was a lot of editorializing on philosophy,” Ms. Lake said. “At the time, we were thinking that the important thing in politics was to educate people, to get them to understand what was happening in the world, rather than to get elected.”

Bernie Sanders seen as a ‘protest candidate,’ says Democratic rival Martin O’Malley // WaPo // John Wagner – July 3, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O’Malley, whose own poll numbers haven’t really budged since entering the race, says his rival Bernie Sanders is on the rise partly because voters see him as a “protest candidate.”

“I’m not running for protest candidate, I’m running for president of the United States,” the former Maryland governor said in an interview Thursday night following a campaign stop here that is part of a three-day swing through Iowa to highlight his proposals on climate change.

Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist who rails against the political influence of the “billionaire class,” has seen his crowds swell in recent weeks, and he is gaining ground on Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton in polls in both Iowa and New Hampshire.

Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont, has said repeatedly that he is running to win the Democratic nomination and the presidency.

On Wednesday, he drew about 10,000 people to a rally in Madison, Wis., the largest of the 2016 cycle by any presidential candidate. In a poll of likely Iowa caucusgoers released Thursday, Clinton was leading Sanders, 52 percent to 33 percent. O’Malley, who aides say is using the summer to become better known, was at 3 percent in the Quinnipiac poll.

Asked what he makes of Sanders’s appeal, O’Malley said: “I think it shows the widespread desire for an alternative to this year’s inevitable front-runner.”

“It doesn’t terribly surprise me,” O’Malley said. “People feel like big money has subsumed, taken over, their politics, and they’re frustrated by it. … People feel like their voices don’t matter. People feel like they’re not being heard, and right now, they want to protest about that.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked if he sees Sanders as a protest candidate, O'Malley said: "I think there's an element of it … yeah."

O'Malley said the popularity among Republicans of Donald Trump, the businessman turned presidential candidate, reflects a similar phenomenon.

On Thursday, Sanders's campaign said he had raised $15 million during the last quarter. That's about one-third of the amount Clinton's campaign said she raised for her committee during the same period, but Sanders's take is expected to far outpace what O'Malley and other Democrats in the field have raised.

Bernie who? // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – July 3, 2015

Bernie Sanders is winning a third of the vote in Iowa and New Hampshire, according to the latest polls. Nearly 10,000 people showed up at his Wisconsin rally this week. Roughly 250,000 small donors have contributed to his campaign.

At Hillary Clinton's Brooklyn HQ, it's as if they've never heard of him.

The Clinton campaign is reading straight from the front-runner's playbook when dealing with the socialist Vermont senator. Her staff insists it's taking Sanders' polling bump seriously while showing no signs of changing its long-charted course. There are no new plans to attack Sanders, no alterations of the forthcoming policy roll-outs that will dot the summer calendar, and no expected leftward sprints to match him policy-for-policy. She doesn't even mention his name on the campaign trail.

Instead, the former secretary of state's political operation is making a show of its organizational muscle and safeguarding its position beyond the early-voting states. Far from sweating over reports of standing-room-only crowds at the Vermonter's events, the Clinton campaign is breathing a quiet sigh of relief that it's Sanders — and not a potentially more viable primary opponent like Elizabeth Warren — nipping at its heels this summer. The senator's name pops up in conversations at Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters, but he's not the topic of the day, week, or month — not even in the candidate's chats with donors, who are keeping a close tab on the state of play.

"No one's hair is on fire about him," explained Maria Cardona, a national Democratic strategist who remains in close touch with the Clinton camp after working for Hillary's 2008 campaign. "Not even the nose hairs. Nothing."

Now that Clinton's sprint to fill her campaign coffers by the end of the fundraising quarter is finished, the former secretary of state will begin periodically unveiling detailed policy proposals throughout the summer, up to the first primary debate in the fall. Her team has indicated that she will increasingly go after her Republican opponents by name — as she has started doing over the last month — but that she will in all likelihood avoid granting Sanders or any of her other Democratic rivals the dose of attention that would come with a direct barb from the dominating favorite.

That's been the plan at least since Clinton set the date for her June New York City kickoff rally, long before a CNN/WMUR poll showed Sanders within eight points of her in New Hampshire last week and a Quinnipiac poll this week showed Sanders with by far his best showing yet in Iowa — 33 percent.

Clinton allies are quick to point out that they've expected a close primary since the start of the campaign — the team's first memo to its surrogates in April outlined how to project that very message — and accordingly there was a broad-strokes plan in place accounting for a rival's rise, even if many were surprised with its vigor or the challenger's identity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The explanation for the Sanders surge, Democrats aligned with Clinton and some who are unaffiliated say, is that he has largely captured the share of voters who had previously expressed a preference for Warren, who's not running. In that way, he's consolidated the anti-Clinton crowd.

"Everyone who's worked in Democratic politics knows there's a 30-to-40 percent vote that's the 'anybody but the frontrunner' share," explained Chris Lehane, a veteran of Bill Clinton's campaigns who is now helping Hillary raise money.

And because many Clinton allies inside and outside of Brooklyn dismiss Sanders' chances to mount a long-term challenge due to his liberal politics and troubles connecting with large portions of the Democratic base — like minority voters — they say they're relieved Warren's supporters have swung to him, rather than another candidate.

"The fact that it's Bernie is fantastic, because Bernie is perfectly wired for this role," said another national Democratic operative close to the campaign. "Everything about Bernie conveys the opportunity and limitations of his candidacy. It's perfect for him, it's perfect for the Clinton campaign, and it's good for the party. I don't think Democrats are wringing their hands saying, 'what if Bernie wins?'"

As such, Clinton has avoided actively antagonizing Sanders or the voters backing him — in fact, some allies were annoyed when Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill, a Clinton supporter, attacked Sanders for his left-wing views on MSNBC last week.

Among campaign fundraisers and surrogates, there is very little appetite for a direct fight with Sanders, whose supporters Clinton would need against a Republican opponent come November 2016.

"Hillary supporters that have run for election often like myself — I'm 12-2, if I was a pitcher I'd be worth about $15 million a year — we're saying, 'stay the course. Bernie Sanders is not going to be the nominee,'" said former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell.

Clinton, whose campaign even declined to publicly promote the endorsement of Sanders' home-state governor, Peter Shumlin, has shown no signs of deviating from its plan. At her first public appearance after the New Hampshire poll's release, for example, she refused to mention the Vermonter, instead railing against Donald Trump. Former bank executive Robert Wolf, a Democratic donor, said Sanders' name didn't come up once during a two-hour meeting he had with Clinton last week.

There is one insurance policy, however, that belies the idea that the Sanders' challenge is inconsequential: Last week the Clinton campaign hired Jeff Berman, the consultant who built Obama's delegate-winning strategy in 2008. It also held a weekend of grassroots actions across the country — from local meetings to canvasses — to demonstrate its reach in states that could matter if the primary were to stretch past the first four early-voting ones.

But as long as history repeats itself — the Clinton campaign's refrain is that no non-Iowan has broken 50 percent in that state's Democratic caucus — early-state supporters insist Clinton should be fine.

"I did this with John Kerry, I did this with Al Gore," said New Hampshire lawyer Billy Shaheen, the husband of Sen. Jeanne Shaheen and a close Clinton friend. "When I was running their campaigns in New Hampshire they both went from 20-point leads to 20-point deficits. Deficits! In December 2003, the whole press had written John Kerry off because he was in single digits, and the election was 35 days away."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bob Shrum, who played top roles in both of those campaigns, agreed: “This could be like Gore-Bradley, where Bradley in September ’99 looked like a real challenger. Gore then won Iowa overwhelmingly, New Hampshire closely, and then every other primary and caucus.”

And, he added, echoing the sentiments of Clinton-allied Democrats who refuse to acknowledge Sanders as a serious rival. “Kerry was written out before coming back in Iowa in part because Iowans got serious and said, ‘Who’s a plausible candidate against Bush?’ There’s something about Bernie’s personality that’s attractive to people, and I believe he’ll go to the convention with a reasonable number of delegates. But do I think that means Hillary Clinton should declare all-out war on him? No.”

AFL-CIO leader tries to quell pro-Sanders revolt // Politico // Brian Mahoney – July 3, 2015

Richard Trumka has a message for state and local AFL-CIO leaders tempted to endorse Bernie Sanders: Don’t.

In a memo this week to state, central and area divisions of the labor federation, and obtained by POLITICO, the AFL-CIO chief reminded the groups that its bylaws don’t permit them to “endorse a presidential candidate” or “introduce, consider, debate, or pass resolutions or statements that indicate a preference for one candidate over another.” Even “‘personal’ statements” of candidate preference are verboten, Trumka said.

The memo comes amid signs of a growing split between national union leaders — mindful of the fact that Clinton remains the undisputed favorite for the nomination — and local officials and rank and file, who are increasingly drawn to the Democratic Party’s growing progressive wing, for whom Sanders is the latest standard-bearer.

The South Carolina and Vermont AFL-CIOs have passed resolutions supporting Sanders, and some local AFL-CIO leaders in Iowa want to introduce a resolution at their August convention backing the independent senator from Vermont. More than a thousand labor supporters, including several local AFL-CIO-affiliated leaders, have signed on to “Labor for Bernie,” a group calling on national union leaders to give Sanders a shot at an endorsement.

The AFL-CIO’s constituent unions — as distinct from divisions of the federation itself — remain free to make endorsements however they wish. But they can’t make those endorsements acting through local and regional divisions of the AFL-CIO, as Trumka reminded everyone in the memo.

His message wasn’t anything new for the federation’s state leaders: They know that endorsement decisions belong to the national leadership. Still, it was unusual for Trumka to call them out in a memo. “I’m not sure I’ve ever seen one before like this,” said Jeff Johnson, the president of the AFL-CIO’s Washington state labor council.

Johnson agreed that it was important for the AFL-CIO to speak with a single voice. But “there’s a lot of anxiety out there in the labor movement,” he said, “and we’re desperately searching for a candidate that actually speaks to working-class values. The Elizabeth Warren/Bernie Sanders camp is very, very attractive to many of our members and to many of us as leaders, because they’re talking about the things that need to happen in this country.”

Similarly, Massachusetts AFL-CIO President Steven Tolman said he agreed that Trumka had to lay down the law. More tellingly, though, he added: “Bernie Sanders has spent his life actually fighting for working people. He’s made no secret of it, and he’s used it as his mantra. And that I respect very much.” When asked about Clinton’s candidacy, Tolman was less effusive: “Who? Who? Please. I mean with all respect, huh?”

Other state-level union leaders affiliated with the AFL-CIO didn’t bother to give Trumka and his memo lip service. “I was disappointed by it,” said UPTE-CWA Local 9119 organizing coordinator Lisa Kermish, of Berkeley, California. “I think that local unions and national unions, while it’s important to work together for strength, I think that this is in some ways truncating dialogue. And I find that very unfortunate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The memo surfaced a day before top staffers for Clinton and Sanders participated in a meet-and-greet with AFL-CIO political directors Thursday morning in Washington. A person who attended the meeting said those present included Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook, Clinton labor liaison Nikki Budzinski, Sanders campaign manager Jeff Weaver and top Sanders strategist Tad Devine.

Under AFL-CIO procedures governing endorsements, a political committee makes a recommendation to the executive council in Washington, which then submits it for ratification by leaders of its member unions. A two-thirds majority is required.

"Because in years past, and already this year, a number of questions have been raised," Trumka wrote in his memo, "I want to remind you all that the AFL-CIO endorsement for president and vice president belongs to the national AFL-CIO. State federations, central and area labor councils, and all other subordinate bodies must follow the national AFL-CIO endorsement regarding president and vice president."

The process is typically a cautious one. In the last presidential election, the federation endorsed President Barack Obama in March 2012, shortly before he locked up renomination. In 2008, it waited to endorse then-Sen. Obama until late June, after he'd accumulated the necessary delegates. In 2004, it endorsed John Kerry in February — before he locked up the nomination but at a time when Kerry was well ahead in the delegate count.

Sen. Bernie Sanders speaks with AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka while participating in a "Don't Trade Our Future" march in April. | Getty

"That's the formal process of the AFL-CIO," said Larry Cohen, former president of the Communication Workers of America. "But, of course, across the country there is a huge surge of union members and of working class people stepping up for Bernie."

Cohen announced his own endorsement of Sanders in a Huffington Post op-ed Wednesday. Cohen, CWA President Chris Shelton and American Postal Workers Union President Mark Dimondstein will host Sanders at APWU July 13, one day before national union leaders meet with Clinton at the home of her campaign chairman, John Podesta.

Sanders supporters hope they can convince the AFL-CIO to withhold a primary endorsement from Clinton, as it did in 2008. "Most people kind of assume there's an AFL-CIO endorsement in the primaries. Not so," said Steve Rosenthal, former political director of the AFL-CIO and president of the progressive Organizing Group.

Indeed, the Iowa AFL convention Aug. 5-8, which Trumka is set to attend, may become a major showdown between Sanders and Clinton for labor's support. Clinton and Obama both showed up there in 2007.

Trumka, meanwhile, said the AFL-CIO had sent questionnaires to Democrats and Republicans with a Friday deadline. The federation also plans to set aside time at its July executive council meeting to interview candidates, the memo said.

Is Bernie Sanders Too Radical for America? // HuffPo /// Peter Dreier – July 3, 2015

Now that Bernie Sanders is rapidly climbing in the polls and attracting huge audiences to his campaign events (including over 10,000 people at a Madison, Wisconsin rally the other day), his opponents are starting to attack him for being too radical. After all, Sanders describes himself as a democratic socialist.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, few Americans know what "socialist" means. Some mistakenly associate it with Communism. In fact, Sanders has often said that he supports the kind of policies favored by the Scandinavian democracies.

Asked about this in May by George Stephanopoulos, host of ABC News' This Week, Sanders said:

In countries in Scandinavia like Denmark, Norway, Sweden, they are very democratic countries. Voter turnout is a lot higher than it is in the United States. In those countries, health care is the right of all people; college education and graduate school is free; retirement benefits, child care are stronger than the United States of America. In those countries by and large government works for ordinary people and the middle class, rather than, as is the case right now in our country, for the billionaire class.

On the campaign trail in Iowa, New Hampshire, Wisconsin, and elsewhere, many voters appear to be willing to look past the labels and listen to what Sanders is actually saying about the issues and the role of government in society. The Vermont Senator with a New York accent has a straight-talking style that resonates with many voters who don't necessarily identify themselves as liberals or progressives, much less as socialists.

For example, at a recent Sanders rally in New Hampshire that attracted an unexpectedly large crowd, Sanders "railed against the 'billionaire class' and pledged to make large corporations pay their fair share of taxes if he becomes president. But much of his message focused on improving the lot of the lower and middle classes--by providing free college; guaranteeing workers vacation time, sick leave and family leave; and raising the minimum wage to $15 an hour," the Washington Post reported.

"I don't believe it is a terribly radical idea to say that someone who works 40 hours a week should not be living in poverty," Sanders told the standing-room-only audience.

The Gallup Poll has regularly asked Americans what types of candidates they would willingly elect. Gallup's question is quite simple: "If your party nominated a generally well-qualified person for president who happened to be _____, would you vote for that person?"

Over the years, Gallup found significant increases in the proportion of Americans who say "yes" to voting for a woman, an African American, a Jew, a Catholic, and a gay or lesbian candidate.

Although socialists have run for president, and been elected to various public offices from city council to Congress since the early 1900s, Gallup didn't add that category of candidate to the list until this June, no doubt in recognition of Sanders' campaign. It found that 47 percent of Americans say they would vote for a socialist for president and 50 percent say they would not. In the poll, 59 percent of Democrats, 49 percent of independents, and, perhaps surprisingly, 26 percent of Republicans report that they'd vote to put a socialist in the White House.

After more than half a century of Cold War hysteria and post-Cold War propaganda against socialism from the business and education establishments, the mainstream media, and both political parties, the fact that almost half of Americans are willing to vote for a socialist for president is quite remarkable.

Not surprisingly, those who came of age in the Cold War era are less likely to consider voting for a socialist candidate. Gallup found that 34 percent of those 65 and older, 37 percent of 50-64 year olds, and 50 percent of 30-49 year olds would vote for a socialist. In contrast, 69 percent of 18-29 year olds indicated that they'd vote for a socialist for the nation's highest office-holder. Chalk that up to either youthful idealism or to a profound shift in the young generation's political outlook that could have a lasting influence as they get older.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Political scientists, pollsters, journalists, and pundits like to identify voters and politicians with labels. But voters care less about labels -- conservative, moderate, liberal, progressive, socialist, or others. They are more interested in what politicians want government to do. Ideas that were once considered radical -- such as the vote for women, Social Security, and the minimum wage -- are today taken for granted as common sense.

So let's look instead at what Americans actually believe and care about.

Polls show that Americans are upset with widening inequality, the political influence of big business, and declining living standards. Public opinion is generally favorable toward greater government activism to address poverty, inequality, opportunity, and climate change.

Most Americans worry that government has been captured by the powerful and wealthy. They want a government that serves the common good. They also want to reform government to make it more responsive and accountable.

On those matters--both broad principles and specific policy prescriptions--Sanders is in sync with the vast majority of Americans.

Big Business

About three-quarters (74 percent) of Americans--including 84 percent of Democrats, 72 percent of independents, and 62 percent of Republicans--believe that corporations have too much influence on American life and politics today, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll. In contrast, only 37 percent think that labor unions exercise too much influence.

The Pew Research Center discovered that 60 percent of Americans--including 75 percent of Democrats--believe that "the economic system in this country unfairly favors the wealthy."

Fifty-eight percent of Americans say they would support breaking up "big banks like Citigroup," a key plank of Sanders' platform and the goal of a bill that Sanders sponsored in the Senate.

Seventy-three percent of Americans favor tougher rules for Wall Street financial companies, versus 17 percent who oppose stronger regulation.

Sixty-four percent of Americans strongly or somewhat favor regulating greenhouse gas emissions from power plants, factories and cars and requiring utilities to generate more power from "clean" low-carbon sources.

Progressive Taxation

More than three-quarters of Americans (79 percent) think that wealthy people don't pay their fair share of taxes, while 82 percent believe that some corporations don't pay their fair share of taxes.

Sixty-eight percent of Americans favor raising taxes on people earning more than $1 million per year, including 87 percent of Democrats, 65 percent of independents, and 53 percent of Republicans.

Inequality and Poverty

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A strong majority (66 percent) say that wealth should be more evenly divided and that it is a problem that should be addressed urgently.

Ninety-two percent of Americans want a society with far less income disparity than currently exists in the United States. Americans prefer some inequality to perfect equality, according to the professors at the Harvard Business School and Duke University who conducted the survey. But when asked to pick an ideal level of income disparity, Americans prefer the more egalitarian level similar to the one in Sweden (although without identifying the country by name) to that in the U.S. What's more, the rich and the poor, and Democrats and Republicans, are almost equally likely to choose the Swedish model. For example, 93.5 percent of Democrats and 90.2 percent of Republicans preferred the level of income distribution that exists in Sweden.

Sixty-nine percent of Americans--including 90 percent of Democrats, 69 percent of independents, and 45 percent of Republicans--believe that the government should help reduce the gap between the rich and everyone else. Eighty-two percent of Americans--including 94 percent of Democrats, 83 percent of independents, and 64 percent of Republicans--think the government should help reduce poverty.

Money in Politics

Eighty-four percent of Americans think that money has too much influence in politics. Slightly more Americans (85 percent) want an overhaul of our campaign finance system

Seventy-eight percent of Americans think that campaign spending by outside groups not affiliated with candidates should be limited by law.

A majority of Americans (54 percent) believe that money given to political candidates is not a form of free speech protected by the First Amendment. In other words, they disagree with the Supreme Court's Citizens United ruling.

Minimum Wage and Workers' Rights

A recent poll by Hart Research Associates found that 75 percent of Americans (including 53 percent of Republicans) support an increase in the federal minimum wage to $12.50 an hour by 2020. Sixty-three percent of Americans support an even greater increase in the minimum wage to $15 an hour by 2020.

Eighty percent of Americans favor requiring employers to offer paid leave to parents of new children and employees caring for sick family members. An even larger number (85 percent) favor requiring employers to offer paid leave to employees who are ill.

A significant majority of Americans support the right of workers to unionize, despite several decades of corporate-sponsored anti-union propaganda. Eighty-two percent believe that factory and manufacturing workers should have the right to unionize. A vast majority also support the right to unionize for transportation workers (74 percent), police and firefighters (72 percent), public school teachers (71 percent), workers in supermarkets and retail sales (68 percent), and fast food workers (62 percent).

Health Care and Social Security

Over 50 percent of Americans (including one-quarter of Republicans and nearly 80 percent of Democrats) say they support a single-payer "Medicare for All" approach to health insurance, something Sanders has long advocated. Only 36 percent oppose the idea. 12 percent are neutral.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Seventy-one percent Americans support a public option, which would give individuals the choice of buying healthcare through Medicare or private insurers. This was part of Obama's original health care plan in 2010 but the insurance industry lobby killed it, thanks to every Senate Republican and a handful of Senate Democrats, led by former Senator Max Baucus of Montana.

The Gallup poll found that 67 percent of Americans want to lift the income cap on Social Security to require higher-income workers to pay Social Security taxes on all of their wages. Most people don't realize that workers who earn more than $118,500 a year don't contribute on their full income and that simply removing that tax loophole for high earners would close the lion's share of Social Security's modest long-term funding gap. Legislation introduced by Senator Sanders and Representative Peter DeFazio of Oregon would apply the same payroll tax already paid by more than nine out of 10 Americans to those with incomes over $250,000 a year. Census Bureau data shows that only about 5 percent (1 in 18) of workers would pay more if the cap were scrapped, and only the top 1.4 percent (one in 71 workers) would be affected if the tax were applied to earnings over $250,000.

Higher Education

More than three-quarters (79 percent) of Americans think that education beyond high school is not affordable for everyone in the U.S. who needs it. Seventy-seven percent believe that higher education institutions should reduce tuition and fees, while 59 percent and 55 percent respectively agree that state governments and the federal government should provide more assistance. The average tuition bill for students at a public four-year college has increased by more than 250 percent over the past three decades. More than one-third (35 percent) of 2000-2014 college graduates report graduating with more than $25,000 in undergraduate student loan debt, in inflation-adjusted dollars. The recently graduated college class of 2015 has an average debt burden of $35,051 per student, the highest ever. Sanders introduced legislation to make four-year public colleges and universities tuition-free, paid for through a tax on Wall Street transactions.

Same-Sex Marriage

Today, 60 percent of Americans believe it should be legal for gay and lesbian couples to marry, according to Gallup, a figure that is likely to increase following the Supreme Court ruling legalizing same-sex marriage. But in 1996, only 27 percent felt that way. That year, then-Congressman Sanders was one of only 67 House members to vote against the Defense of Marriage Act, which barred federal recognition of gay marriages.

America seems to be holding its breath, trying to decide what kind of country it wants to be. We seem to be at one of those crossroads moments when attitudes are rapidly shifting and significant reform is possible.

But public opinion, on its own, doesn't translate into public policy. It has to be mobilized. That's what movements do. And that's what elections are for.

The real reasons Bernie Sanders is transforming the election: Here's why he galvanizes the left // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 3, 2015

CNN dubbed this "the summer of Sanders" as media outlets finally picked up on the large crowds Independent Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders has attracted during campaign stops. His rocketing poll numbers in early primary states like Iowa and New Hampshire led to countless stories heralding a Sanders surge — but the story is as much about the issues as it is about the man.

Even Republican candidates have taken notice of Sanders' rise. Ahead of a recent stop in Madison, Wisconsin, likely 2016 contender and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker welcomed Sanders to the state with a series of tweets attacking the democratic socialist once dismissed as too fringe. Walker may not have taken too fondly to Sanders attracting a record 10,000 people in his home state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Sanders' campaign, surely more so than that of any of the Republican candidates, seems to be gaining traction more for the ideas he espouses than because of a cult of personality.

Granted, many supporters have pointed to Sanders' straightforward manner and willingness to call out bad actors as refreshingly appealing, but unlike with Republican presidential candidates Donald Trump and Chris Christie, it isn't just a brash style that's being sold. Sanders makes a direct effort to address many of the issues that have arisen since the Hope & Change campaign of 2008 and it appears as though he is tapping into very real and long-simmering sentiments in the Democratic base.

More than a protest vote against Hillary Clinton, as some have suggested, Sanders' support appears to be support for issues Clinton's yet to fully address. Here are some of the ways that Sanders is gaining support by leading on issues or movements that other candidates ignore:

VA Scandal

Sanders was chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee when Democrats last controlled the chamber, and following the VA scandal, Sanders worked with Republicans in the House to pass legislation that expands health care access for veterans and makes it easier to fire underperforming officials.

His record and work on veterans' affairs issues has earned Sanders top awards from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion and the Military Officers Association of America, and now it appears as though that recognition is translating to support for his campaign.

The Boston Globe writes that Sanders' "surge is partly fueled by veterans," citing "entire Reddit threads [that] are dedicated to how veterans can best pitch Sanders to other veterans" and "a Facebook page promoting Sanders to veterans." As the Globe notes, in the early voting state of South Carolina veterans make up about 11 percent of the electorate.

Occupy Wall Street

The short-lived global protest movement suddenly shifted the national debate in the aftermath of the recession from talk of austerity to a focus on growing income inequality by introducing terms like the 1 Percent to national prominence in time for the 2012 campaign. But the Occupy Wall Street movement achieved no great legislative win, and after the encampments were broken down many of the grievances remained unacknowledged, let alone addressed.

Sanders' 2016 campaign embodies much of the demands of the OWS movement. Speaking to the largest campaign crowd of this cycle in Wisconsin this week, Sanders said, "The big money interests — Wall Street, corporate America, all of these guys — have so much power that no president can defeat them unless there is an organized grassroots movement making them an offer they can't refuse." For activists who organized, protested and camped out in Zuccotti Park and squares across America, this message of unfinished business is powerful. The acknowledgement of a continued struggle and willingness to put up a fight is what was galvanized the Draft Warren movement and it has now seemingly shifted to Sanders.

Student Debt Movement

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some Occupy Wall Street activists joined a movement against student debt, which has now surpassed $1 trillion in the U.S. The activists, some of whom had refused to make any more payments on their federal student loans, achieved a major victory this year when Corinthian colleges (you know them by their annoying commercials hawking their schools like Everest, Heald and WyoTech) shuttered the last of their remaining U.S. campuses, and the erasure of $13 million in debt. The movement has successfully overseen the closure of campuses in Canada the year before.

Sanders has proposed the College for All Act, a plan to provide tuition-free education at public colleges funded by a small tax on Wall Street transactions.

Citizens United

Since the 2010 Supreme Court ruling allowing unlimited political contributions by corporations and unions saw the rise of the Super PAC in electoral campaigns, Americans are shockingly united in their opposition to such obscene levels of money in politics. The overwhelming majority of Americans, including Republicans, support limits on campaign contributions.

Sanders is the only candidate to have completely sworn off all Super PAC funds, although a couple of independent political action committees have formed in support of his candidacy.

But Sanders has objected to their existence, saying, “A major problem of our campaign finance system is that anybody can start a super PAC on behalf of anybody and can say anything. And this is what makes our current campaign finance situation totally absurd.”

Obamacare

The Supreme Court may have upheld the Affordable Care Act twice, but the political battle over the health care law promises to rage on five years after its passage. With health care costs rising only marginally more slowly than they before the law’s passage and a continuation of premium increases, even Democrats who support the law have called for marked improvements as millions of Americans are left uninsured because Republican lawmakers refuse to expand Medicaid.

> Sanders has promised to return the debate to early 2007, when during the Democratic presidential primary the public option was on the table. Sanders has long called for a “Medicare-for-all” single-payer health care plan similar to what was tossed aside as too radical shortly after the talks began on health care reform once Obama took office.

Bernie Sanders out-greens Hillary Clinton: Will she be able to hold her own in a climate hawk runoff //
Salon // Lindsay Abrams – July 3, 2015

Now that President Obama has established that the executive branch can and should take a strong stance on climate change, it’s safe to say emissions reductions and the like are key issues for the Democratic candidates vying to be his successor. (In the Republican primaries, calling climate change a hoax or just ignoring the problem completely continues, somehow, to be acceptable.) And as Bernie Sanders gains early momentum for his decidedly left-of-center campaign, a big question is whether Hillary Clinton’s climate platform can compete.

As far as most issues are concerned, there’s a bit of an “anything you can do, I can do better” dynamic between the Democratic frontrunner and the democratic socialist nipping at her heels. Both, to be sure, can boast of their impressive environmental records — but while Clinton has a respectable 82 percent lifetime score from the League of Conservation Voters, Sanders’ is 95 percent, and the super PAC Climate Hawks Vote named him the 113th

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congress's top climate leader. As the primaries heat up, the differences between them just might illustrate the vast gulf between someone who hits the right talking points and someone who understands the true scope of what's needed to prevent catastrophic climate change (in a word: everything).

Vox's David Roberts argues that in our current political climate, the difference between their platforms might not matter much. "No president — not Clinton, not Sanders, not the risen Christ — could persuade the House GOP to pass aggressive restrictions on carbon," he writes. Then again, President Obama may not have Congress on his side, but he's managed to do a whole lot for climate action anyway. Where he's proved to be a disappointment has been in weighing the grave risks associated with climate change on the one hand while waving Shell on to drill in the Arctic with the other. If America's going to lead the world in fighting climate change, it's going to need an executive branch ready to nix pipeline projects, to shut down oil wells and to use the EPA to rein in as much carbon emissions as possible. Even if Sanders can't nudge Clinton to the left on climate issues, he, along with Democratic contender Martin O'Malley, can at least show voters what a truly Green platform looks like. (And if they can, as Roberts suggests, make Clinton look centrist by comparison well, that's not so bad either.)

Here's how their actions and promises compare thus far:

How seriously they take climate change

Clinton called it "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and a world."

Sanders' campaign website asserts, "Unless we take bold action to address climate change, our children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren are going to look back on this period in history and ask a very simple question: Where were they? Why didn't the United States of America, the most powerful nation on earth, lead the international community in cutting greenhouse gas emissions and preventing the devastating damage that the scientific community was sure would come?"

Keystone XL pipeline

Clinton has been aggressively silent on whether or not she supports the controversial pipeline, but back when she was Secretary of State, she said she was "inclined" to approve it. The addition of former TransCanada lobbyist Jeffrey Berman to her campaign is being read by some as an ominous sign.

Sanders' staunch opposition to the pipeline is vouched for by Bill McKibben, a leader of the anti-Keystone movement. "He's been the most consistent and proactive voice in the entire Keystone fight," McKibben said. "Everything that's been needed — from speeches on the floor to legislation to demands that the State Department change its absurd review process — he and his staff have done immediately and with a high degree of professionalism."

Offshore drilling

Clinton voted in favor of a 2006 bill that ended protections for Florida's Gulf Coast and opened up an additional 8 million acres in the Gulf for offshore drilling.

Sanders wrote an op-ed for the Guardian in the aftermath of the BP oil spill: The lesson, he wrote, is that "there must be no new offshore drilling. Not now, not ever." To that end, he introduced legislation that would have banned offshore drilling along the coastlines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Arctic drilling

Clinton does have a record of voting against efforts to open up protected areas of the Arctic to oil and gas interests; she also supported a 2007 act that would have conferred additional protections on the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Sanders, too, has never been known to vote in favor of Arctic drilling. In May, he signed a letter expressing disappointment in the Obama administration's decision to open offshore wells in the region.

Fracking

Clinton promoted fracking abroad during her tenure as Secretary of State, ostensibly to fight climate change while adding to the global energy supply. Domestically, she appears to support, if extremely cautiously, the idea of natural gas as a bridge fuel: she expounded on its potential benefits as compared to coal in a 2014 speech, although she did emphasize the need to "put in place smart regulations and enforce them."

Sanders, if you couldn't guess, is an outspoken opponent of fracking. "I'm very proud that the state of Vermont banned fracking," he said last year when the state of Vermont banned fracking. "I hope communities all over America do the same."

Clean Power Plan

Clinton came out strongly in support of the EPA's efforts to limit greenhouse gas emissions from coal-fired power plants during a 2014 speech to the League of Conservation Voters. "As you know so well, power plants account for about 40 percent of the carbon pollution in the United States, and therefore must be addressed," she told her audience. "And the unprecedented action that President Obama has taken must be protected at all cost" — a clear reference to the near-certainty that a GOP president would try to dismantle it.

Sanders, in defining his position in relation to Clinton, takes that a step further: "It is not only supporting what the president has done;" he told the Washington Post, "it is saying we've got to lead the world."

Fossil fuel subsidies

Clinton, in that LCV speech, bemoaned the fact that "tax incentives for alternative energy investments are unpredictable at best, while generous subsidies for fossil fuels are still too easy to come by." And while she praised Obama's efforts to phase out subsidies for dirty energy globally, she added, "I know we can do better."

Sanders recently introduced legislation in the Senate, the aptly named End Polluter Welfare Act, that would end tax breaks and other subsidies for oil, gas and coal altogether. It wasn't the first time he's tried that.

Green jobs

Clinton and Sanders teamed up to author the Green Jobs Act in 2007, which dedicated funding to training in "green collar jobs" that involve the "design, manufacture, installation, operation, and maintenance of technologies associated with energy efficiency and renewable, clean energy options."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

‘Grassroots movement working’: Bernie Sanders gains on the Clinton machine // Guardian // Lauren Gambino and Ben Jacobs – July 3, 2015

What began as a progressive pipe dream – that a rabble-rousing senator from the nation’s second least populous state could wrest the Democratic presidential nomination from one of the most well-known politicians in recent history – is starting to seem plausible.

By way of massive rallies, grassroots politicking and a record-setting number small donations, Vermont senator Bernie Sanders is winning over progressive voters, convincing them that his underdog campaign has a fighting chance against Hillary Clinton’s well-oiled – and extraordinarily well-funded – political machine.

On Thursday, the Sanders campaign announced it raised $15m since 30 April from 250,000 donors, many of whom have made small contributions online. In contrast, Barack Obama attracted only 180,000 donors during the first quarter of his presidential campaign in 2007, which has been considered the benchmark for online fundraising by an insurgent candidate in modern presidential politics.

The senator, propelled by a groundswell of support, is also gaining ground on Clinton in polls emerging from across the early voting states.

In Iowa, Sanders’ support has soared. A Quinnipiac poll released on Thursday found that 33% of likely Democratic primary voters prefer Sanders, which brings him within 19 points of Clinton, who is polling at 52%. In May, the same poll showed Clinton leading Sanders by 45 points. And in New Hampshire, Sanders trailed Clinton by just 8 points, according to the latest CNN/WMUR poll.

But while Sanders continues to gain momentum and money, political observers remain wary of whether the unkempt septuagenarian socialist can actually defeat Clinton in the era of almost unlimited campaign spending, or whether Democratic voters are just enjoying what one political operative in New Hampshire this week called “a summer fling”.

Taking advantage of a rising populist tide

Sanders is not just persuading progressives to open their wallets: he has a rabid fan base showing up to campaign events as well, drawing larger-than-expected crowds across the country. At a rally on Wednesday night, Sanders sounded almost taken aback by his welcome – nearly 10,000 supporters attended the Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Madison, Wisconsin, to hear him speak.

“Tonight we have made a little bit of history,” Sanders, 73, told the crowd. “Tonight we have more people at any meeting for a candidate of president of the United States than any other candidate.”

One attendee at Sanders’ rally in Madison, Doug Fritsch of nearby Lake Mills, told the Guardian that he was drawn to the senator because Sanders “still sees a role for government to protect the lower and middle class”. In contrast, he said he views Clinton as aligned with “more of the corporate interests”.

Fritsch said he was impressed with the “enthusiastic” crowd at Wednesday’s rally, which he saw as an effort to “a grassroots movement working” for Sanders.

But Sanders isn’t just holding big rallies either: he is spending significant time in early primary states and has already spent 15 days in the first-in-the-nation primary state of New Hampshire alone – more than any other Democratic candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Adam Green, co-founder of Progressive Change Campaign Committee, a group that has hailed the Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren as its "north star", said that Sanders is hitting the right notes for his left-wing base with ideas on how to unburden college students from massive debt and tackle wage inequality – and that Clinton would be wise to pay attention.

"Bernie Sanders is smartly taking advantage of the rising economic populist tide," Green said. "And the path to success for Hillary Clinton is to be bold and populist in her campaign platform."

Big crowds – but bigger dollars

Sanders' campaign has evolved from a longshot ideological crusade to a legitimate operation in a very short period of time. The campaign essentially "started from scratch" in April when the senator made up his mind to run, said Tad Devine, a senior adviser to Sanders. Devine said the big-rally strategy has helped the candidate start building out a campaign network. So far, he said, everyone has been "pleasantly surprised" at Sanders's reception.

"That style of campaigning, where there's a give and take with voters, where people come into an atmosphere where they can almost be in a community setting, that's something that Bernie's very comfortable with," Devine told the Guardian. "We don't have time to try to do the things that we're not adept at doing."

But harnessing the senator's momentum to pose a meaningful threat to Clinton will remain a challenge.

On Wednesday, Clinton's campaign announced that she has raised an estimated $45m since declaring her candidacy in April.

"Many people doubted whether we could build an organization powered by so many grassroots supporters," Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook said in a note to supporters on Wednesday. "Today's announcement proves them wrong."

Clinton's campaign said details about who has donated to her campaign are not yet available. A full accounting of her donations, as is the same for all candidates, is due on 15 July in a filing to the Federal Exchange Commission.

The Democratic frontrunner's campaign has been heavily focused on raising money. Clinton headlined 58 different fundraisers in 18 states since declaring her candidacy in April. In contrast, she has held relatively few public events – and small ones at that – and has yet to draw crowds of the same magnitude as Sanders. Clinton's one major rally in Iowa drew fewer attendees than a nearby Sanders rally two days later; even Clinton's formal campaign launch in New York City was approximately the same size as Sanders's lakeside announcement in Burlington, Vermont.

The former secretary of state often communicates her policy positions via Twitter, rather than speaking to reporters or voters. While Sanders held a question and answer session on Thursday with over 100 voters in the gritty industrial city of Fort Dodge, Iowa, Clinton spoke at a private fundraiser in Provincetown, Massachusetts, a resort town on Cape Cod.

Clinton will also get help from the Priorities USA Super PAC, which is backing her candidacy despite a pledge by the candidate to combat "uncontrolled money" in politics, and announced Thursday that it has raised $15.6m – bringing the coffers of her campaign and its allies beyond $60m so far.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In contrast, Sanders, who rails against the “grotesque and obscene” concentration of wealth in America, has refused to have a Super Pac support him and is focused on wooing small-dollar donors.

Harvard University professor Lawrence Lessig, who founded a Super Pac to end Super Pacs, said Sanders’ renouncing Super Pacs is tantamount to “bringing a knife to a gunfight”.

“I regret the fact the Bernie Sanders has embraced the idea that he’s going to live life like the Vermont snow, as pure as he possibly can, while he runs for president, because it weakens his chances – and he’s an enormously important progressive voice,” Lessig said.

That he will be outspent, Sanders admits, almost gleefully. That it will hurt his chances of securing the Democratic nomination, the upstart candidate disagrees.

“They may have the money but we have the people,” Sanders told the crowd in Madison on Wednesday. “And when the people stand together, we can win.”

A.B. Stoddard: Clinton’s feeling the Bern // The Hill // A.B. Stoddard – July 3, 2015

They said it couldn't be done.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders's rocket rise from the brunt of jokes to an official menace should be deeply concerning to Democrats who didn't see it coming. With more boffo numbers — of record-setting crowds, strengthening polling and an impressive campaign warchest – the scrappy socialist could soon reach the level of threat.

It isn't likely Sanders will topple Hillary Clinton and win his party's presidential nomination, but there is evidence of a more potent liberal energy he successfully engages that she does not. Clinton thought she caught a break when Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) decided against a run but it seems her supporters are running to Sanders. Should Clinton fail to stave off his surge, Sanders could not only embarrass her with strong showings or wins in early primary contests but may ultimately weaken her for the general election next year. She should plan accordingly.

Sanders's gathering of 10,000 supporters gathered in Wisconsin Wednesday night was larger than any crowd any presidential candidate has had all year. In the latest Quinnipiac poll of Iowa voters Sanders is at 33 percent to Clinton's 52, still behind but making solid gains. In May her lead was 60-15, which means in just two months he has more than doubled his support there. What's more is that this is the first time her support has been lower than 60 percent in that poll. Sanders's $15 million in donations in two months also represents only one-third of Clinton's $45 million in three months but far exceeds expectations and illustrates a level of grassroots enthusiasm that no one is laughing at any more. As Clinton scrambled to collect as many $2,700 checks as she could, worried that Jeb Bush was collecting larger ones as a still undeclared candidate, Sanders was counting dollar bills. His haul includes 250,000 donors making 400,000 donations of $250 or less, the average totalling $33.51.

The Sanders boomlet is rippling throughout the party and could potentially alter the primary by more quickly choking off the candidacies of former governors Martin O'Malley and Lincoln Chafee and now former Sen. Jim Webb who strangely chose to jump in Thursday at the height of Bernie buzz. But the most dangerous consequence could be that Sanders's popularity renders Clinton vulnerable enough to invite a challenge from Vice President Biden.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At least for now the Clinton camp, while perhaps genuinely stunned, is smart enough to be eating some humble pie, seeming to take Sanders seriously.

"We're never going to have a coronation in my party," Clinton surrogate Paul Begala said on CNN Thursday. "Never Never. Sen Sanders has tapped into something real."

Of course this was supposed to be a coronation, the turn Clinton waited for for eight years. It was one thing when Barack Obama, who Clinton insiders and many party operatives dismissed as a threat, cut down Clinton's shot at her dream in 2008 - he was the walk-on-water candidate from central casting. Sanders, with his often too-liberated hair and a clunky accent, is perhaps the last person anyone would cast as a potential giant killer.

Should he maintain his current trajectory eight months will be plenty of time for an old-fashioned ass kicking. But Sanders doesn't have to win Iowa on Feb. 1, 2016 - just coming close to Clinton there would be a terrible start for her default-nominee standing and could invite additional dissent in New Hampshire the following week and other contests shortly thereafter.

So far Sanders isn't attempting to reach as the broad coalition Clinton is targeting. He doesn't highlight issues that attract attention from Hispanic or African-American voters, but his rants against the billionaire class with white progressives are surely doing the trick. The real question, of course, is whether Sanders ever wants to tap into liberal hunger for government transparency and exploit Clinton's willingness to hide and destroy her email record of her tenure as secretary of state. So far he has refused to attack her integrity - heaven help her if he changes his mind.

Bernie Sanders raises $15 million. Chump change or a lot? // CS Monitor // Peter Grier – July 3, 2015

Bernie Sanders has raised $15 million since joining the presidential race in April. Is that a lot, relatively speaking?

Yes, it’s a pretty good haul. Look at it this way: That’s fairly close to the $18 million that moneybags Mitt Romney raised for his general account in the first three months of his declared presidential run in the 2012 election cycle.

Plus, Senator Sanders did it the hard way, via small donors. According to his campaign, Sanders received contributions from some 250,000 individuals. Ninety-nine percent of the donations were for $250 or less. (By way of contrast, the federal limit for campaign giving is $2,700 per person, per primary or general election.)

Sanders’s new cash stash shouldn’t be too surprising: He’s a decent fundraiser for a guy who slams Wall Street and used to call himself a socialist. Or he’s a decent attracter of money: It’s not as if he’s holding constant donor fundraising events, though he’s attended a few.

You can see this by looking at his electoral history. In his last two Senate elections, 2006 and 2012, he raised more than $5 and $6 million, respectively. That’s well over the average for other senators facing reelection those years, according to data from the Center for Responsive Politics.

The upshot of Sanders’s take is that it shows that his polls and his crowds aren’t the only indicators he’s making some progress in his campaign. He’s got enough money and enough of a donor base to maintain at least a subsistence-level campaign for as long as he wants.

Remember, unlike Hillary Clinton, Sanders seems to be running to raise and discuss populist issues, as opposed to being elected president. He doesn’t need to spend money planning for extensive get-out-the-vote teams and 50 state committees. He only has to have enough cash to bounce from rally to rally in friendly environs while generating enough free publicity via media as he can.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That means Clinton won't be able to dispatch him anytime soon," writes Jonathan Allen at Vox.

But let's not get carried away. Mrs. Clinton remains the heavy favorite. If she doesn't win the Democratic nomination, it will be one of the largest political upsets of the modern era.

After all, Sanders is doing OK raising money, but Clinton's doing much better. She has taken in about $45 million since April. And that's only for her candidate committee: She's got a super PAC, too, which Sanders doesn't. Both candidates decry the influence of these big-money committees on US politics, but only Sanders is actually eschewing their use.

And official endorsements – an excellent predictor of eventual victory – continue to roll in Clinton's direction. No member of Congress has officially backed the Vermont senator, points out Mike Lillis at The Hill. But Hillary has many, including at least 26 of the liberal Democratic lawmakers in the 69-member Congressional Progressive Caucus.

Sanders says he has a 'strong chance of winning Iowa' // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – July 3, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders spent the first half of this Friday campaigning in Republican-leaning northwest Iowa. A crowd of over 200 greeted him for an early morning event in Sheldon and about 150 people crowded into the Better Day Cafe in Storm Lake to see Sanders over the noon-hour.

"The reason that we're going around the state and into small towns is we understand the Caucus process and the votes here are as important as they are in Des Moines," Sanders told reporters after his appearance in Storm Lake. "So we think we are putting together a strong infrastructure which is going to give us a strong chance of winning Iowa."

A recent Quinnipiac University Poll found Sanders' support in Iowa has more than doubled since May, to 33 percent of the likely Iowa Caucus-goers surveyed. Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist, a Vermont senator and the longest-serving independent in congress, said late last year he would not run for the Democratic Party's 2016 presidetial nomination unless he sensed a "grassroots revolution" — and Sanders declared as he was leaving Storm Lake that it's happening.

"People are resonating to the message, that there's something fundamentally wrong with economics and politics in America," Sanders told reporters.

Brian Gerjets of Cherokee, a truck driver who is co-chair of Cherokee Democratic Party, saw Sanders in Sheldon and Storm Lake. He said Sanders is delivering a "common sense" message.

"Wake up people. Look around. Everything he's telling you is the truth," Gerjets said. "The billionaires are running this world. Whether Bernie can take it all the way to the end, that's questionable."

Lynn McMullen and his wife, Paula, run an antiques and woodworking store in nearby Fonda and they're going to vote for Sanders in the Caucuses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He's right on the issues as far as getting rid of Citizens United for one and also for single payer health care," Paula McMullen said.

Lynn McMullen added: "It's boiled down to wealthy elements and corporate people just buying the government. It's not a democracy any more and we need to turn that around or it's all over."

Sanders answered questions for 15 minutes after delivering a 50-minute speech in Storm Lake. He praised President Obama's move this past week to change the rules for overtime pay and repeated his call for 12-weeks of paid family and medical leave, as well as mandatory vacation for working Americans.

"Eighty-five percent of working men, 66 percent of working women are working longer than 40 hours a week," Sanders said. "At the very least, we have got to guarantee that those workers have two weeks of paid family vacation."

Two other presidential candidates are campaigning in the state today. Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, a Democrat, stopped at the site of a wind turbine this morning in Ankeny to highlight his ideas for boosting renewable energy. This afternoon, Louisiana Bobby Jindal, a Republican, is touring a fire arms manufacturer in Sheldon then stopping in Spencer.

WEBB

Jim Webb's Facebook engagement rivals Pataki's // CBS // July 3, 2015

Former Virginia Senator Jim Webb's quiet entry into the presidential race was reflected by Facebook engagement numbers that were similarly subdued, in comparison with some of his better known competitors.

It's hard to tell whether a higher-profile entrance would have made much of a difference to his Facebook numbers, which exceeded only Former Rhode Island Governor and Senator Lincoln Chafee's among the declared candidates of either the Republican or Democratic parties.

In the 24-hour period between 12:01 a.m. Thursday and 12:01 a.m. Friday, 49,000 people on Facebook in the U.S. generated 81,000 interactions (likes, posts, comments, shares) related to Webb and his announcement. The good news for Webb is that those numbers represent a stratospheric spike from his daily average numbers of 2,000 unique people a day.

The bad news is that everyone but Chafee attracted more interest upon entry into the presidential race. Chafee had 20,000 unique people and 27,000 interactions. He's within shouting distance of Former New York Governor George Pataki, who had 59,000 unique people and 81,000 interactions after his announcement.

On the high end, Hillary Clinton dominated the 2016 field on Facebook when she announced, with 4.7 million unique people and 10.1 million interactions. Billionaire Donald Trump, who entered the race June 16, saw 3.4 million unique people, with 6.4 million interactions

Not surprisingly, the top states chattering about Jim Webb are the mid-Atlantic states - his home state of Virginia, followed by the District of Columbia, Maryland and North Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Racial issues and foreign policy were the top political topics associated with Webb.

Webb pitched his supporters on a campaign with "a fresh approach to solving the problems that confront us and too often unnecessarily divide us," according to his email. "[O]ur fellow Americans need proven, experienced leadership that can be trusted to move us forward from a new President's first days in office. I believe I can offer both."

Jim Webb tests the limits of a maverick's appeal // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 3, 2015

Seven months after forming a presidential exploratory committee, former Sen. Jim Webb officially jumped into the 2016 presidential race Thursday. The surprise 2,000 word announcement email, coming as many headed out of town for the July 4 holiday weekend, was a typically unorthodox move for Webb.

The former senator, author, decorated Marine combat veteran and Navy secretary is a true maverick. He's a rebel who refuses to play by Washington's rules, and he has excited some liberals with his anti-conformist ethos.

Webb's refusal to play by the rules, and his willingness to break with convention, is considered refreshing in an age of deep dissatisfaction with politics. But it also means he often ends up alone, as when he defended the Confederate flag after the shooting massacre last month at a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina.

By throwing out the political playbook and letting seven months pass by without building a real campaign infrastructure, Webb went from being the first potential candidate to declare an exploratory committee to being the 15th candidate to officially enter the race.

And his ideological heterodoxy and refusal to comport to anybody's doctrine makes it unclear where he stands in a Democratic field that has so far broken down cleanly along ideological lines.

"He is not a natural ideological leader for any group in the Democratic Party," said Steve Jarding, a Harvard professor who co-directed Webb's 2006 Senate campaign. "Jim's going to have a real difficult time introducing himself to the national Democratic electorate because of things like the Confederate flag."

In his long-winded announcement message, Webb made no mention of key issues to many Democrats, like climate change, racism, women's rights, LGBT rights and abortion. He recently won a presidential straw poll at a conference of conservative activists in Colorado. On Tuesday, he said he was "very proud of having worked in the Reagan administration."

While his party has tacked to the left, Webb has remained as heterodox as ever. He supports the Keystone XL pipeline, has taken issue with affirmative action, and on Tuesday, he expressed concerns with President Obama's executive actions on immigration.

Yet, Webb is to the left of Clinton and Obama on foreign policy, and one of the foremost champions of criminal justice reform in either party and the author of the post 9/11 G.I. bill. In his announcement message, Webb focused on his opposition to the Iraq War and the 2011 intervention in Libya – both clear shots at Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton – and a populist economic message about reclaiming the American dream from elites.

Those messages are popular among liberals dissatisfied with Clinton, but will they be willing to accept Webb's less doctrinaire stances as well?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Webb's plans often remain a mystery even to those closest to him. "Jim always plays things close to the vest," said David "Mudcat" Saunders, the longtime Webb strategist who is helping out the presidential campaign on a volunteer basis.

"The day that he said he was not going to run again in the Senate, I found out that day. And the day he said he was going to do the exploratory committee, I found out that day," Saunders said last week before Webb announced.

Webb's staff thought the senator might announce his presidential campaign last Friday at a speech in Iowa, and they didn't know his plans as recently as Tuesday.

"I wake up every morning thinking he will roll into a coffee shop and announce something to the wait staff," Craig Crawford, Webb's communications director, joked last week.

The isolation that comes with nonconformity was on display near Webb's hometown last Friday night, 1,000 miles away from where the former senator was giving his speech in Iowa.

At a pep rally-like fundraiser in Webb's backyard of northern Virginia, state Democrats were having a party without him.

Rep. Gerry Connolly declared northern Virginia to be "Clinton territory," while Webb's former Senate colleagues Mark Warner and Tim Kaine called Clinton "our choice for the future" and "our next president," respectively.

Webb understandably dislikes the nitty gritty of politics, but his objections have alienated him from some Virginia Democrats, several operatives said. "He was more interested in Myanmar than he was in Martinsville," said one longtime Virginia Democratic strategist, who said officials like county party chairs gave up on asking the former senator to do fundraisers for them.

The enthusiasm for Webb's candidness may have reached a limit last month when he called for "respect" for the Confederate flag as an emblem of common soldiers who fought on both sides of the Civil War.

The reaction to Webb's comments from Democrats in Washington and New York was swift and brutal. "I think he went from a parody to a complete joke," said Ari Rabin Havt, a former staffer for Sen. Harry Reid staffer who now hosts a progressive show on Sirrius/XM radio.

Hank Sheinkopf, a New York-based Democratic strategist, said the comments single-handedly killed whatever slim shot Webb had at the nomination. "In the real world, he should save his money and buy a house, because he ain't going anyplace in the Democratic Party," he said.

The damage appears especially severe among black voters, a key Democratic voting bloc with whom Webb has never been a favorite. "It makes him a non-starter," said Stefanie Brown James, who led outreach to black voters for President Obama's 2012 reelection campaign. "It's a horrible way to start out for him."

Webb is a writer used to exploring nuance, but the fine shading of his position on the Confederate flag was lost on most observers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several Webb allies say privately they would have preferred he stay away from the topic of the flag entirely. But Webb is not one to shy away from controversy if he believes in something.

The incident also underscored the racial gambit of his campaign. While Democrats in the post-Obama era have focused on getting minorities to the polls, Webb has said he wants to bring disaffected whites back into the fold.

Ruy Teixeira, a Century Foundation demographer who studies the changing makeup of the electorate, has his doubts about that tactic.

"He seems to have this idea that he represents the forgotten majority of the Democratic Party, but it's just not true," said Teixeira. "The primary electorate is pretty heavily skewed towards college educated whites and minorities. So the idea that the would be a good candidate for that just doesn't make a lot of sense."

While Webb shares a strong independent streak and an aurora of populist authenticity with Sen. Bernie Sanders, the two presidential candidates could not be more dislike, and not just on policy.

Sanders is the product of a movement, and he is deeply embedded in it. Webb is lone-wolf individual, whose peripatetic career has followed his ambitions.

Some Democrats openly scratch their heads about why Webb is even running. "I just don't get what he's doing," said Mo Elleithee, a former Clinton aide and top official at the Democratic National Committee, who now runs the Institute of Politics at Georgetown University.

We will likely learn much more in coming days and weeks as Webb rolls out his presidential campaign, now that he's officially in the race. Few voters are paying attention at this early stage, and Webb's position on the Confederate flag may fade into the background.

Webb has surprised the political world before, as he likes to remind audiences, and maybe he can do it again.

Jim Webb Throws His Hat in the Ring for the WH // Fox // Clint Henderson – July 3, 2015

Greece on the verge of defaulting and being forced from the EU currency zone. There is a referendum on austerity scheduled for Sunday that was demanded by the country's left-wing Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras. It may have been a bad move. The country appears evenly split, but the referendum may cost Tsipras his job. EU leaders want him gone, and his popularity has plummeted as Greek banks closed and put severe restrictions on withdrawals. Greg Palkot reporting live from a very tense Athens.

We're also awaiting news on what happens now in Puerto Rico as the U.S. territory begins to run out of money. It said Monday it can't pay off its debts of some $72 billion.

Aetna buying Humana for some $37 billion creating the second largest managed health care company in the United States. It's part of the consolidation of the health care industry as the implementation of Obamacare makes bigger better for most providers.

President Obama spent some time yesterday bragging about the strength of the U.S. economy. At an event in Wisconsin President Obama also attacked Republicans saying they are good people, "It's just their ideas are bad." He said the Affordable Care Act is working and is "here to stay."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are live events today with Senator Bernie Sanders and Hillary Clinton. We'll be monitoring for news.

Former Virginia Senator Jim Webb became the latest to jump into the race for the White House. He became the fifth Democrat to announce he's running in a 2,000 word blog post.

We've also learned Republican Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker is now expected to jump into the race on July 21st.

Republicans are lining up to criticize Donald Trump who upset many with his comments about illegal immigrants when he announced for President last week. Jeb Bush and Chris Christie calling out Trump over the comments (which he's standing by).

BP agreed to a settlement over the huge Gulf of Mexico oil disaster. BP will pay several Southern states and the Federal Government some $18 billion.

Some 5,000 people in Maryville, Tennessee remain evacuated at this hour after a train carrying toxic gas partially derailed and exploded sending toxic fumes into nearby areas. 10 first responders treated for fume inhalation. 87 were seen at a local hospital. No life threatening injuries. Kristin Fisher reporting.

A Russian supply rocket was launched to carry much-needed supplies to the International Space Station. Three astronauts have been waiting for a resupply mission for weeks. Two recent resupply missions failed spectacularly recently including a Space X Falcon 9 rocket disaster. Today's Russian launch called flawless.

There's a big heat wave right in the Western United States. There's also been some severe storms in Tennessee. We'll keep an eye on it.

An airplane powered by solar power is scheduled to land in Hawaii today after it's five day journey over the Pacific Ocean.. all powered by the Sun.

We learned this week that Jet Blue has instituted baggage fees leaving only Southwest without a fee for the first checked bag. It's yet another sign of how adept the airlines have become at making money from ancillary fees. We'll talk to prominent travel blogger from the website Pizza In Motion - Ed Pizzarello - today about how you can outsmart the airlines and travel for less.

Fifth Democrats elbows way into prez race // Boston Herald // Bob McGovern – July 3, 2015

Another low-profile Democrat has emerged to challenge odds-on front-runner Hillary Clinton, while a rising Republican star is expected to formally join the crowd of GOP 2016 hopefuls.

Democrat Jim Webb, a former U.S. senator from Virginia, announced yesterday that he will take on Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, a nationally popular Republican for standing up to unions, will officially enter the race with a campaign announcement on July 13, according to his aides.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Webb, in a statement posted on his campaign website, acknowledged that he is a long shot to win the party's nomination, which many believe will go to Clinton.

"I understand the odds, particularly in today's political climate, where fair debate is so often drowned out by huge sums of money," Webb wrote. "I know that more than one candidate in this process intends to raise at least a billion dollars."

Webb, 69, was a Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan who became a Democrat in response to the Iraq War that he opposed.

Webb has said he needs to raise enough money to mount a "viable" campaign, which could be critical to competing with Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee are also vying for the Democratic nod.

Walker, meanwhile, will join a Republican ticket that has already attracted 14 candidates, including New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who joined the fray earlier in the week.

Walker's stature grew when he emerged as a powerful anti-union candidate. In 2011 he pushed a law that effectively ended collective bargaining for most public workers in Wisconsin. Four years later, he pressed to make Wisconsin a right-to-work state where employers and unions are barred from requiring all workers to pay union dues.

Along the way, he shattered state campaign finance records, collecting six-figure checks from prominent conservatives across the country.

Walker is trying to become the first president since Harry Truman, elected nearly 70 years ago, without a college degree. Walker attended Marquette University for three years, but dropped out in 1990 to take a job with the American Red Cross. Walker ran for the state Assembly that year and lost. He moved to a more conservative district outside of Milwaukee and ran again in 1993, winning that time. He hasn't lost since.

CHAFEE

Democrats in New Hampshire find some of Chafee's ideas 'odd' // AP // Michelle R. Smith – July 3, 2015

Presidential candidate Lincoln Chafee stands before a few dozen people at a meeting of New Hampshire's Belknap County Democrats. The Republican-turned-independent-turned-Democrat gets nods of approval when he tells them he was the only Republican senator to vote against authorizing the war in Iraq.

Then smiles turn to laughter when he pitches another idea: The U.S. should switch to the metric system.

The former Rhode Island governor has visited the first primary state of New Hampshire a dozen times this year. But he seems to be making barely a ripple — aside from curiosity about some of his policy platforms.

In Belknap County, at least some Democrats seemed intrigued by Chafee as someone who could represent an alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton, the commanding favorite for the nomination. But they are also puzzled by what he talks about sometimes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chafee told the group he wants to bring National Security Agency leaker Edward Snowden home, dropping all charges against him. Paula Trombi of Meredith said she liked some of what he said but was taken aback and disappointed by his position on Snowden. She also can't understand why he keeps talking about the metric system, of all things.

"With all the troubles that are going on, that seems almost odd to bring up," she said.

Dave Kerr, a selectman in Barnstead, said he agreed with Chafee that billions have been spent on the war that could have been better spent on roads and schools. But Kerr was leaving with a poster and a donation envelope for another Democratic rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who also opposed the Iraq war. A Sanders supporter had handed them out, and Kerr wondered why Chafee hadn't, also.

Chafee is known to dislike fundraising and is just starting to raise money for a race where spending is expected to be measured in the billions. His past campaigns — two Senate races as a Republican and a governor's race as an independent — have relied on an old New England family fortune amassed over generations.

Dave Pollak, chairman of Belknap County Democrats, said he agreed with Chafee that Snowden is a whistleblower and should not be prosecuted. With Chafee's background in different parties, Pollak sees him as someone who could bridge the ideological divide between Democrats and Republicans. He even likes the metric system idea.

But Pollak finds other aspects of Chafee's campaign peculiar.

Clinton's campaign is in contact with the group every week inviting its members to events, has multiple campaign offices open and created specialty groups for supporters such as "High Schoolers for Hillary." The Sanders campaign sends regular "rousing" emails on issues, Pollak said. The campaign for another rival, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also has staff in the state.

Chafee, on the other hand, has no campaign staff in New Hampshire yet and appears to be running on a shoestring. Although Chafee has a vacation home further north in Franconia, he said he hasn't been staying there during the campaign. Instead, he drives to his New Hampshire events from Rhode Island, a five-hour round trip this evening. He was back in Somersworth, New Hampshire, the following day.

It makes Pollak wonder how serious he is.

"What's the organization?" he asks. "What gives you confidence that he can get the voters out?"

Chafee gets testy when asked about matters like that. He says it's an "evolutionary process."

"You guys never ask anything about the substance," he told a reporter. "It's always about how many people, how much money have you raised. Ugh.

"I wish there was more intellectual discussion about the issues in these campaigns."

As he spoke, Chafee aide Jonathan Stevens handed out stickers saying "Trust Chafee." The design and motto are identical to the one from his 2010 campaign for governor. Asked if they're 2010 leftovers, Stevens replied, "We recycle everything."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stickers bearing this year's motto, "Fresh Ideas for America," were nowhere in sight.

UNDECLARED

BIDEN

Will Joe Biden run for president? Drumbeat picks up. // CS Monitor // Linda Feldmann – July 3, 2015

Vice President Joe Biden has long harbored dreams of being president. He's run twice before, clearly relishes political life, and has yet to rule out a third try – even as Hillary Clinton dominates in fundraising and in polls of Democrats.

After the death on May 30 of Mr. Biden's beloved elder son, Beau, such talk was put on hold. But in recent days, speculation has begun to soar. New York businessman Jon Cooper, a former Obama fundraising bundler now working on a draft effort to get Biden into the race, told the Monitor Thursday that he puts the probability of Biden running at 80 percent.

"I'm as convinced as I can be that Joe Biden will be entering the presidential race," said Mr. Cooper, who bases his assessment on signals from Biden's inner circle, though he can't name names.

Cooper has been sounding out potential donors, and already has commitments from five Obama contributors. On Thursday, Cooper signed on as national finance chair for an independent effort called Draft Biden 2016. Launched in March, the Chicago-based group has collected more than 100,000 signatures, and now has staff on the ground in early nominating states – Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina. The group has also hired a national fundraising firm.

Biden could also find encouragement in a new CNN/ORC national poll released Wednesday. Without lifting a finger, he is running second in the Democratic field, at 16 percent. Though Biden is well behind former Secretary Clinton (57 percent), he's in a statistical tie with Sen. Bernie Sanders (I) of Vermont (14 percent), who has been campaigning hard and drawing crowds numbering in the thousands. Perhaps more important, Biden is national Democrats' second-choice candidate, with 35 percent saying he's their second choice and 14 percent choosing Sanders. If Clinton were to falter seriously, Democrats' second-choice candidate could be the biggest beneficiary.

Earlier this week, a report in The Wall Street Journal quoted Biden friends by name saying that before his death, Beau Biden had encouraged his dad to run, as has Biden's other son, Hunter.

Biden will reportedly state his intentions, either way, by early August. When reached by telephone, former Sen. Ted Kaufman (D) of Delaware, a close friend of Biden's, declined to comment on the vice president's thinking. Biden's office also won't comment.

Perhaps the biggest clue that Biden might run is that he and his inner circle have done nothing to stop the draft effort, say draft organizers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We have had no communications from anyone in the Biden camp saying, ‘Stop what you’re doing,’ ” William Pierce, executive director of Draft Biden 2016, said in an interview. “Delaware’s a small state, and we talk to the same people, and all we’ve heard is a lot of encouraging communication from people who are close to the vice president.”

Pierce’s group has been holding events in Iowa and other states, and brings a life-size cutout of Biden, called “Cardboard Joe,” to liven things up. At the group’s website, DraftBiden2016.com, merchandise is for sale with the logo “I’m ridin' with Biden,” featuring the veep driving a convertible and wearing his signature aviator sunglasses.

Pundits are skeptical Biden will run and suggest that the media are inflating the possibility to add interest to the Democratic race. If Biden were to run, they doubt he could beat Clinton for the nomination. On Wednesday, Clinton announced a fundraising haul of $45 million for the first three months of her candidacy, a record for a presidential candidate’s first-quarter fundraising.

“It would be a hard catch-up for Biden. He doesn’t have the infrastructure. Who does he go to?” says veteran Democratic strategist Peter Fenn. “I’m not saying it’s impossible, I’m just saying it’s hard.”

Still, Mr. Fenn gets why Biden has kept his options open. Since Harry Truman assumed the presidency after the death of Franklin Roosevelt in 1945, most vice presidents have run for the top job, and a few have reached it. Biden, a senator for 36 years before attaining the vice presidency, has long had that presidential gleam in his eye. He first ran in 1988, then again in 2008.

“I can die a happy man never having been president of the United States of America,” Biden told GQ magazine in July 2013. “But it doesn’t mean I won’t run.”

“Joe’s a thoroughbred,” says Fenn. “He loves this. He sees the gate filling up with other horses, and it’s hard for him not to head for it.”

What about the age issue? Already in his early 70s, Biden would be the oldest person to assume the presidency. But he’s not that much older than Clinton, and he's younger than Senator Sanders. Biden supporters say what matters isn’t age, it’s energy and enthusiasm.

And Biden is nothing if not enthusiastic – sometimes to his embarrassment. Who can forget his hot-mike comment in 2010 as Mr. Obama was about to sign the Affordable Care Act: “This is a big [expletive] deal.” At a campaign appearance in southern Virginia in 2012, Biden again raised eyebrows when he told a predominantly black audience that Republicans are “going to put y'all back in chains."

Biden gaffes are many, but they’re part of what gives him authenticity in a world of overly scripted candidates, analysts say. His life experiences, including a political career bookended by personal tragedy, give him plenty to go on in connecting with voters. Unlike Clinton, Biden is not wealthy, and he doesn’t face the challenge on trustworthiness that she does, amid questions over her private e-mails and Clinton Foundation fundraising.

But by getting into the race relatively late, isn’t there a big chance that Biden would end up only damaging Clinton, the eventual nominee? Fenn, the Democratic strategist, doesn’t see it that way.

“Democrats don’t like coronations,” he says. “They don’t like this notion that someone should be given the nomination without having to work hard and go through their paces. So my sense of this is that at the end, it would be good for Hillary to go through this.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Will Joe Biden Run For President in 2016 After All? One Prominent Fundraiser Thinks So // Bustle // Chris Tognotti – July 3, 2015

On Thursday, with the announcement that former Viriginia Senator Jim Webb was jumping into the race, the Democratic presidential field hit five candidates total — if you're counting former Rhode Island Governor Lincoln Chafee, that is, the longest of long-shots. It's a thin field compared to the Republican side, and with only one household name — it's beginning to look like a showdown between Hillary Clinton and liberal upstart Bernie Sanders. But what if another high-profile Democrat was waiting in the wings? Will Joe Biden actually run for president in 2016 after all?

Throughout last year, Biden's name was one of many prospective possibilities for the Democrats, and that makes natural sense. As an incumbent two-term vice president, and one with longstanding ambitions for the top job — he's run twice before, in 1988 and 2008 — you'd expect him to be interested. But the election news cycle had sort of passed him by in recent months, due to the perceived invincibility of Clinton's primary campaign, his uninspiring poll numbers, and the tragic illness and death of his son Beau.

But now, the rumors appear to be heating up again — according to a report from The Christian Science Monitor, a major Democratic fundraiser believes there's an 80 percent likelihood that good ol' Uncle Joe will be jumping in for his last, best chance to win the presidency.

Here's what Jon Cooper, a businessman and former Obama fundraiser, told the Monitor about the effort. On Thursday, it was announced that he'd signed on as national finance chairman for the Draft Biden 2016 Super PAC.

I'm as convinced as I can be that Joe Biden will be entering the presidential race.

In recent history, sitting vice presidents have made potent presidential candidates. Over the past 30 years, two out of three two-term VPs have taken the plunge — George H.W. Bush mounted a successful run after eight years as Ronald Reagan's VP, and Al Gore came within a hair's breadth of winning after eight years as Bill Clinton's number two. Dick Cheney never ran, likey owing to his notoriously poor health — he actually signed a letter of resignation and sealed it in his office, in case he suffered a heart-related incident that left him in an unresponsive state.

In Biden's case, he faces a pretty abnormal set of circumstances. He'd undoubtedly be trailing Clinton by a huge margin from the get-go, but his current place in the polls should still give him some cause for optimism.

A recent CNN/ORC poll had him at second place nationally, at 16 percent, just outpacing Sanders at 14 percent. This is noteworthy, because Biden hasn't been campaigning, or even dropping public hints that he might run yet, compared to Sanders who's been campaigning for months. In other words, he's showing a higher floor to start from than Sanders has, and you never know — given a few months of hard campaigning himself, who's to say he couldn't strike a little fear in the Clinton camp?

If anything seems obvious, however, it's that he doesn't have much longer to wait. Besides him, there really aren't any other Democrats expected to run in 2016 — the movement to draft Massachusetts senator and progressive icon Elizabeth Warren, for all its enthusiasm, didn't end up going anywhere. And with Sanders drawing surprisingly big crowds and gaining momentum, Biden would be wise to make a move soon if he's going to — according to The Wall Street Journal, he's expected to make a decision by August.

OTHER

GOP

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DECLARED

BUSH

Jeb Bush Needs Some New Economic Advice // NYT // Editorial Board – July 3, 2015

Jeb Bush is said to have brought on Glenn Hubbard as an economic adviser — the dean of the Columbia University Graduate School of Business and a prominent conservative who served as President George W. Bush's chief economist and was an architect of the big tax cuts in 2001, which favored the wealthy. He can be expected to weigh in on wage stagnation and income inequality, campaign issues that all the candidates, including Mr. Bush, have said they will address.

If the former Florida governor heeds Mr. Hubbard's advice, he's not likely to get the issue right. Answering a question from two Times reporters about the long stagnation in middle-class incomes, Mr. Hubbard argued that "compensation didn't stagnate." He said that wages have been stuck because of global competition but that employer-provided benefits for health and retirement have increased.

Politically, the comment is notable because it seemed to minimize a problem that Mr. Bush has already said is significant. It is also off point. For the broad middle class, more than three-fourths of family income is from wages and salaries, which have stagnated since the late 1970s, with the exception of one growth period in the latter half of the 1990s. Since then, wages have been flat or falling for most of the work force, including college graduates, a consequence of the underlying weakness in the bubble economy of the George W. Bush years and ensuing income losses from the financial crisis and its aftermath.

Factoring in benefits doesn't alter the basic picture. In recent decades, wages have sometimes grown faster than benefits, sometimes more slowly. So the argument that compensation has not stagnated may appear more plausible in some periods than in others. But that does not change the overall trend of prolonged stagnation and widening inequality.

Similarly, benefits are a more robust part of the compensation picture when private-sector employees are lumped together with government employees. In general, health and retirement benefits in the private sector have become less generous in recent decades, while public-sector employees have had relatively more success in holding on to valuable benefits. For private-sector employees, the share of compensation represented by benefits has largely been flat since the government began to separately track private-sector data in 1987.

Finally, the data surely overstate the value of benefits for typical workers. That's because they are averages, and in a time of rising wage inequality, the average is pulled up by the gains of highly paid employees and executives.

Mr. Hubbard's comment echoes a similar argument made in 2005, when the labor secretary at the time, Elaine Chao, dismissed concerns about poor wage growth during the Bush years by pointing out that overall compensation, including for health care, was on the rise. That seemed to explain the problem away, but as a practical matter, it meant that money that otherwise could have gone toward raises went to cover what were then the exploding costs of health coverage.

Like Ms. Chao's focus on compensation, Mr. Hubbard's similar focus today is off the mark. Mr. Bush, and the public, should not expect fresh perspectives from advisers who were in positions of power when wage stagnation became entrenched.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush to meet with Mitt Romney in Kennebunkport // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015

Chris Christie and Marco Rubio are not the only presidential candidates catching up with Mitt Romney in New England.

Romney and his wife, Ann, plan to meet this coming week with former Florida governor Jeb Bush for lunch at Walker's Point, the Bush family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, according to aides familiar with the plans.

"Governor and Mrs. Romney look forward to visiting with Governor Jeb Bush and his family at Walker's Point this coming week," said the Romney aide, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity. An aide to Bush confirmed the plans.

In past years, the Romneys have visited with the Bushes at Walker's Point. The Romneys spend much of the summer at their own family compound on Lake Winnipesaukee in Wolfeboro, N.H., which is about a 50-mile drive from Kennebunkport.

This will be a busy week at Walker's Point. Bush is hosting a retreat there for top campaign donors on Thursday and Friday. Bush, who is expected to spend much of the week with family in Maine, also plans to drop into New Hampshire for some campaigning. He will march in two Fourth of July parades on Saturday.

Jeb Bush raises questions about Obama's Iran negotiations // Reuters // Steve Holland – July 2, 2015

Jeb Bush is skeptical about U.S.-led negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program.

In a column written for Townhall.com, the 2016 Republican presidential candidate says a flawed Iran deal could be "the legacy of the Obama-Clinton-Kerry foreign policy," and if so, "it will be a dangerous one for the next president to repair."

"As we await details of the latest concessions the Obama Administration is making to Iran, we should recall the grave danger posed to the world by Iran's non-nuclear aggression across the Middle East. Without a comprehensive strategy to deal with the totality of Iran's threats to our interests, the expected nuclear deal is likely to offer only short-term political benefits for President Obama, not lasting security benefits for America," Bush writes.

Don't Trust Iran // Town Hall // Jeb Bush – July 2, 2015

Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons poses a grave threat to the United States, to Israel, to other close partners in the Middle East, and to international peace and security. There is not yet a nuclear deal with Iran, but I agree with the many experts who believe an agreement is likely. Repeated concessions and desperate accommodation suggest the Obama Administration will do anything to secure a deal. And with America playing such a weak hand, why shouldn't the Supreme Leader squeeze President Obama for more concessions?

Although I will reserve final judgment until the details of a comprehensive agreement are public, I fear it will be a bad deal for the United States, Israel, and all who desire a stable Middle East. And it will be a good deal for Iran's leaders: one that legitimizes Iran's authoritarian regime, fills Tehran's dwindling coffers, and fuels Iran's aggression throughout the region – all without requiring the clerics to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions. Indeed, a bipartisan group that included several former senior Obama Administration officials recently acknowledged the deal being negotiated "will not prevent Iran from having a nuclear weapons capability."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As we await details of the latest concessions the Obama Administration is making to Iran, we should recall the grave danger posed to the world by Iran's non-nuclear aggression across the Middle East. Without a comprehensive strategy to deal with the totality of Iran's threats to our interests, the expected nuclear deal is likely to offer only short-term political benefits for President Obama, not lasting security benefits for America.

Iran is the world's most active state sponsor of terrorism. It has supported a wide variety of terrorist organizations, from Shi'a extremists in Lebanese Hizballah and Iraq's militias to Sunni jihadists in groups such as Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, the Taliban, and even al Qaeda. Prior to September 11, 2001, Iranian-backed Hizballah was responsible for the deaths of more Americans than any other terrorist organization in the world, and it remains an extraordinarily deadly terrorist group that threatens U.S. interests. During the war in Iraq, Iranian proxies and weapons were responsible for the deaths of more than a thousand American soldiers. Despite the wishful thinking of the Obama Administration surrounding the 2013 selection Hassan Rouhani as Iran's President, Iran's support for terrorism has only continued, and its proxies are as violent as ever.

Iran foments instability and sectarian tension throughout the region. It is a delusion to believe, as the President does, that the current regime in Tehran can be a force for stability in the Middle East. Iran has bankrolled and armed the Assad regime during its war against the Syrian people, and hundreds of Iranian special operations forces are operating as combatants in Syria. Iranian-backed militia have subverted the Iraqi state and helped fuel sectarian tensions that have driven many Sunnis into the arms of ISIL.

And in Yemen, Iran has supported Houthi rebels who deposed one of America's most important counterterrorism partners and plunged the country into chaos.

Iran has one of the most aggressive rocket and missile programs in the world. Iranian-backed militias used Iranian mortars, rockets, and improvised explosive devices to attack U.S. targets. Hamas and Hizballah have fired thousands of Iranian-produced rockets, projectiles, and missiles against Israel. The Islamic Republic of Iran has developed long-range missiles capable of hitting Israel, and is developing an Intercontinental Ballistic Missile that would be capable of hitting the United States.

Not content with aggression abroad, Iran's rulers engage in brutal repression at home. Religious minorities, political dissidents, and journalists are subjected to harassment, detention, torture, and even execution. Despite Obama Administration hopes that President Rouhani would usher in an era of moderation and tolerance, his tenure has been marked by an increase in human rights abuses and repression. The leaders of the 2009 Green Movement remain in detention, as do at least several American citizens and countless Iranian political dissidents and prisoners of conscience.

The Obama-Clinton-Kerry Iran policy has failed not only because its weak negotiating strategy will not stop Iran from developing a nuclear weapons capability, but also because it has, from the beginning, ignored the comprehensive nature of the threat posed by Iran. The nuclear program is but one symptom of an underlying disease, and the Obama Administration has treated only this one symptom, and ineffectively at that.

Whatever happens in the coming days, America under our next President will have to deal comprehensively with the threats posed by Iran. It must seek to rally the region and the world to pressure Iran to change its behavior. It must demand conclusive proof Iran has not just delayed, but given up its nuclear weapons ambitions. It must develop a strategy not just to defeat ISIL, but also to combat Iran's malign activities in Iraq and Syria. It must impose meaningful consequences on Iran for its support of terrorism and its abhorrent treatment of its own citizens. It must deny Iran the ability to produce longer-range ballistic missiles that will threaten America and its allies.

Undoing the damage done by a fundamentally flawed nuclear deal will not be easy. But it will be essential for the security of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All of these challenges will, of course, be exponentially more difficult to address if, by consummating a bad nuclear deal with Iran, the Obama Administration squanders the international consensus and sanctions currently pressuring Iran's leaders without securing a more fundamental shift in Iran's behavior.

If this is the legacy of the Obama-Clinton-Kerry foreign policy, it will be a dangerous one for the next President to repair.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio's Donor Obstacles: A Limited Base and Another Floridian // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters and Ashley Parker – July 3, 2015

In the nearly three months since he announced that he was running for president, Senator Marco Rubio has been enjoying his moment. Republicans have talked up his potential. Democrats have called him a threat. He has been in the top tier of many polls.

But one of the biggest measures of his success — whether he impresses Republican donors as much as he does the party's leading operatives and opinion shapers — has been harder to discern.

Mr. Rubio has a notable disadvantage in the congested, fragmented field of Republican candidates: He has no natural national base of support to draw on, the way Senator Ted Cruz does with evangelical Christians or Senator Rand Paul does with libertarians.

And Mr. Rubio has been cut off from some of the financial support he received in his home state, Florida, when it elected him to the Senate in 2010: Many of the wealthy donors who propelled him to national political fame are sticking by Jeb Bush, the former governor.

Bent on mitigating those deficits, Mr. Rubio has been on a cross-country fund-raising binge, spending little time meeting voters and far more at dinners and receptions in the homes of an eclectic set of patrons — from Larry Ellison, the software developer who hosted a few dozen barefoot Rubio supporters at his Japanese-inspired compound outside San Francisco, to Rick Harrison, a Las Vegas pawnshop owner best known for his role on the History Channel's "Pawn Stars."

In his private appeals for money, Mr. Rubio avoids overtly drawing comparisons to Mr. Bush. But those who have heard him say that the implied contrast could not be more obvious: He embodies the future of the Republican Party, while Mr. Bush represents the past.

"The differences are clear and don't even really need to be mentioned," said George Seay, a Dallas investor who has hosted two fund-raisers for Mr. Rubio this year.

Some differences, however, need to be stated.

In Las Vegas a few weeks ago, Mr. Rubio got across a simple message, recalled Mr. Harrison: "The other guys have a lot more money than me."

The first glimpse of how much all this fund-raising has paid off — and the clearest sign yet of how viable a force

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Rubio will be against well-financed primary opponents — will come over the next week or so when the candidates and their "super PACs" begin reporting how much money they raised in the second quarter, which ended Tuesday.

Mr. Rubio's supporters say they believe a credible sum to have in his campaign bank account when candidates report their totals would be in the neighborhood of $10 million. His super PAC, they said, should have roughly twice that.

But not all has been going as smoothly as hoped. The campaign canceled two fund-raisers last month in Florida because not enough donors had committed. A top Washington-based fund-raiser for Mr. Rubio, Carmen Miller Spence, just resigned her position with the campaign. A Rubio spokesman declined to comment on Ms. Spence's exit but said the canceled events would be rescheduled.

"All my friends — all my friends — it seems everybody over 70 is for Jeb Bush," said Gay Gaines, a Rubio supporter who has held fund-raisers for him at her Palm Beach home. "It's not that I don't think Jeb is fabulous — I do. But I said to all of them: 'You know what worries me? The millennials. They're not going to want another Bush.'"

"It kills me," she added.

Mr. Rubio has some very generous benefactors: Norman Braman, a billionaire auto dealer, is expected to give him $10 million, though the senator's supporters say they do not know when that money is coming, or whether all of it will materialize.

And if Mr. Rubio finds himself largely shut out of the Bush network, he has made inroads with another powerhouse fund-raising machine: Mitt Romney's operation, which raised $1 billion in the 2012 presidential campaign. Many of Mr. Romney's former advisers and donors feel loyalty to Mr. Rubio, who threw himself into Mr. Romney's campaign.

"He, from the get-go, was very willing to do whatever we asked him to do, no ego, was able to excite crowds and create crowds," said Tagg Romney, Mr. Romney's oldest son. "You learn a lot about a person and what they're willing to do and how they handle themselves. And he was great."

Mr. Rubio's campaign manager, deputy campaign manager and New Hampshire strategist worked on one or both of Mr. Romney's presidential runs. The Rubio campaign's ad agency, Poolhouse, was founded by two Romney campaign veterans. Another former Romney aide, Garrett Jackson, recently hosted a fund-raiser for Mr. Rubio in Texas.

And last month, at a retreat for Republican donors that Mr. Romney arranged in Utah, he praised Mr. Rubio's turn at the microphone. "There was a point in his remarks where I felt something in my heart and I said, 'Yeah, that's the America I know and love,'" said Mr. Romney, who is hosting Mr. Rubio and the senator's young family this weekend at the Romney summer home in Wolfeboro, N.H.

But other presidential candidates attended the event, and Mr. Romney's praise stopped well short of an endorsement.

Mr. Rubio has also worked to cultivate ties with several billionaires who are expected to pour huge sums into the 2016 campaign: He headlined a forum for Americans for Prosperity, the group backed by the industrialists Charles G. and David H. Koch, in New Hampshire last week. And he just signed on to an effort in Congress to limit online gambling, a priority of the Las Vegas casino magnate Sheldon Adelson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The focus on money has been relentless, not only in drumming it up but also in holding onto it with a tight fist. Mr. Rubio's campaign is run out of an old townhouse on Capitol Hill, and his campaign manager, Terry Sullivan, proudly posted on Twitter a picture of the Southwest jet he and Mr. Rubio were about to board in Las Vegas.

Sen. Marco Rubio To Campaign In Nevada // CBS // July 3, 2015

Republican Presidential candidate and Florida Senator Marco Rubio is going back to Nevada.

The Florida senator will visit Las Vegas on July 11th and make stops at a Henderson retirement community and Lt. Governor Mark Hutchinson's house for a private event with state legislators and activists.

Rubio is scheduled to give a speech at a recreational center in Sun City Anthem, a popular retirement community in Henderson. He'll then attend a private event with supporters at the Las Vegas home of Hutchison, who is Rubio's statewide campaign director.

The trip marks the second Nevada visit for Rubio since the Florida Republican announced his presidential candidacy in April. He made campaign stops in Las Vegas and Reno in May.

Marco Rubio on Trump: 'Offensive' and 'Divisive' Comments Are Not Offering A Solution // Mediaite // Ken Meyer – July 3, 2015

Marco Rubio has become the latest 2016 Republican hopeful to denounce Donald Trump's controversial statements about Mexican immigrant criminals and rapists.

Rubio put out a statement blasing the comments for not just being inaccurate and "offensive", but also dangerous for being "divisive."

"Our next president needs to be someone who brings Americans together – not someone who continues to divide," Rubio wrote. "Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from – not closer to – a solution."

Rubio's statement comes two days after his 2016 rival George Pataki urged his fellow candidates to come out against Trump's incendiary remarks, describing them as "sad and divisive" and fearful that they would hurt the Republican party. Rick Perry also disapproved of Trump's statements, saying it was a "huge error" to make such a sweeping, derogatory generalization.

You can read Rubio's full statement here:

Trump's comments are not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive. Our next president needs to be someone who brings Americans together – not someone who continues to divide. Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from – not closer to – a solution. We need leaders who offer serious solutions to secure our border and fix our broken immigration system.

PAUL

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ron Paul says Trump troubles him // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 3, 2015

Former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas) said on Thursday that GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump's 'aggressive personality' troubles him.

Paul said the billionaire's top-down management style might not translate to the White House in an interview.

"I don't think anybody should be running the economy and that's the whole fallacy of our last hundred years," Paul told host Ed Berliner of Newsmax TV's "The Hard Line."

"[Trump] can't run the economy, he can't create jobs and he should know that," Paul said.

"He can create jobs if he stays in the building industry, but even his industry is going to be in trouble because he might build too many buildings because interest rates are zero," he added.

"He taps in to a lot of people, but the thing that concerns me is that it's sort of like take charge and take over and we've had too much government taking charge and taking over.

"It's the government that created it and we don't need somebody with an iron fist to come in and say, 'It'll be done my way and I can correct all these problems,' because the solution isn't to have somebody strong to tell us what to do," he said.

Paul also praised last week's Supreme Court ruling legalizing same-sex marriage nationwide.

It ruled in a landmark 5-4 decision on June 26 that states must recognize the practice under the 14th Amendment's equal protections clause.

"[It's] their business," Paul said of same-sex marriages.

"That's the wonderful thing about libertarianism," he added. "It doesn't have to make that final decision of what people should do."

Paul's son, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), is also seeking the Republican nomination next election cycle.

He called on the government to remove itself from regulating marriage entirely on Monday.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz continues to defend Donald Trump on immigration // WaPo // Katie Zezima – July 3, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz continues to defend Donald Trump on immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz (R-Tex.), in an interview with NBC's "Meet the Press" praised Trump for talking about immigration. Trump has made inflammatory comments about Mexican immigrants, leading Macy's and Univision to sever ties with Trump.

Cruz, speaking during his book tour in Marietta, Ga., said he likes Trump, who Cruz said is "bold" and "brash." Cruz said he's not going to attack Trump.

"I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration," Cruz said, reiterating that he believes that "amnesty is wrong."

Cruz said Trump has a "colorful way of speaking -- it's not the way I speak. But I'm not going to engage in the media's game of throwing rocks and attacking other Republicans. I'm just not gonna do it."

Cruz previously said that Trump was "terrific" and shouldn't apologize because he "speaks the truth."

A number of GOP candidates condemned Trump's comments.

"They're bringing drugs," Trump said in his presidential announcement speech. "They're bringing crime. They're rapists."

Trump also said he wants to build a "great wall on our southern border" to keep illegal immigrants from Mexico out of the United States.

Ted Cruz defends Donald Trump, slams 'Washington cartel' on immigration // Politico // Ali Breland – July 3, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz defended Donald Trump on immigration and called out "the Washington cartel" he says is ignoring the issue, in an interview to be broadcast Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration," Cruz said of his rival for the 2016 GOP nomination, adding that it "seems the favorite sport of the Washington media is to encourage some Republicans to attack other Republicans."

"I'm not interested in Republican on Republican violence," he told host Chuck Todd, adding that "bold ... brash" Trump "has a colorful way of speaking."

The Texas senator's comments were similar to his defense of Trump during Fox & Friends on Tuesday.

"When it comes to Donald Trump, I like Donald Trump," Cruz said on the show. "I think he's terrific."

Trump sparked a backlash with inflammatory comments about Mexican immigrants during his campaign kick-off speech, leading to NBC and Univision severing ties with the billionaire real-estate mogul, and Macy's dropping his clothing line.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio, the Florida senator who is also vying for the Republican nomination, took a more critical approach on Trump's statements.

"Trump's comments are not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive," Rubio said in a statement released Friday.

A Conservative Firebrand From The Start, Ted Cruz Always Had A Plan // NPR // Ailsa Change – July 3, 2015

Boldness comes more naturally to Ted Cruz than compromise. Barely through his first year in the Senate, the Texas Republican bucked his party leaders and became the public face of a government shutdown while standing up for conservative ideals. Rewind three decades back, and you'd find Cruz selling a similar message as a teenager in Houston.

You could say Cruz ran with a gang in high school. Their colors were blue jacket, white shirt, red tie. They called themselves the Constitutional Corroborators. And their leader was the head of a conservative think tank named Rolland Storey, who took them around Houston to perform.

"He would introduce them and say, 'They're now going to write down memorized sections of the Constitution. Word for word,' " said Winston Elliott, who helped coach the young recruits.

The Constitutional Corroborators would roll into Rotary Clubs and other civic groups — and they'd be armed with easels.

"On cue, they would stand at the easel, and each write out on the easel a major section. And then, when they finished, [Storey] would say, 'Now each of you explain that section of the Constitution,' " Elliott said.

This is how Ted Cruz the teenager spent much of his spare time — hanging out two nights a week with a think tank in Houston called the Free Enterprise Institute.

Storey would lead the students in discussions about the Constitution, the Federalist papers and Anti-Federalist papers. They'd compete in speech contests about the free market.

Elliott, who now heads the Free Enterprise Institute, first met Cruz when he judged the skinny high school freshman in one of those speech contests.

"Suddenly Ted just turned it on," Elliott remembered. "And you just got this confidence and this clarity. Explain economic principles — basic economic principles — of inflation and property rights and this kind of thing when you're in ninth grade? I mean, I think Ted was 14 then."

It was the mid-1980s, and Ronald Reagan was Cruz's hero. Cruz's father Rafael, who had emigrated from Cuba, followed the oil business down to the Houston suburbs. And there, his son inhabited a world that was safe, quiet and insulated.

Cruz attended Second Baptist High School. It's on the campus of a megachurch tucked near a country club in a leafy, affluent neighborhood. He was valedictorian there — as well as captain of the speech team and a member of the newspaper and yearbook staffs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He was also president of the drama club.

Cruz loved being on stage, even if it meant being the villain. In junior high school, he had played Rolfe, the young Nazi in The Sound of Music. He landed the role of the murderer Bill Sikes in Oliver during high school. In his senior yearbook, Cruz is leaning dramatically into a microphone — under the title "Most Likely To Become The Next Geraldo Rivera."

Doug Daniels was a year behind Cruz at Second Baptist. He first met the future senator in Spanish class, after Cruz had just transferred from another high school midyear.

"And it was not very long before Ted was raising his hand and answering questions, like he had been there from not only the beginning of the class but the beginning of the school year," said Daniels. "At the time I probably wouldn't have used this word, but now I will say it was intimidating."

A newcomer who refuses to hold back. That's how Cruz has marked his first couple years in the Senate, too. And it's a style that's won him legions of fans in his home state.

"I think he's very passionate about things that most Texans believe, or else he wouldn't be as popular as he is," said Wally Wilkerson, the longest-serving local GOP chairman in Texas. Wilkerson's been chair in Montgomery County — just north of Houston — since 1964.

"If you might have any disagreement with Ted Cruz, it might be over his passion or his actions or whatever, but not what his beliefs are," Wilkerson said.

Cruz might not be the stereotypical Texan — he's more Ivy League than cowboy, more fighter than horse-trader — but he seems to get Texas. Consider this: After infuriating many of his Senate colleagues, who blamed him for the government shutdown in 2013, Cruz was the highest rated politician in all of Texas.

But Wilkerson says there's one thing that might be an unexpected weakness for a Latino from Texas.

"As a Hispanic, by nature and by birth, you would think the Hispanics would be attracted by that," said Wilkerson. "But I think there's something there that hadn't clicked. And I think that could be a problem for him."

It's a tension that feels especially pronounced in Cruz's hometown of Houston, which is more than 40 percent Hispanic.

Houston is no longer the city of oil rig workers. This massive, sprawling metropolis is now home to one of the most racially diverse populations in the country. Drive just 10 minutes outside Cruz's old high school, and you'll find streets lined with Indian clothing shops, Middle Eastern food stores and Guatemalan eateries.

The sheltered pocket where Cruz grew up bumps right up against the city of immigrants Houston has become. And many in these parts struggle to call Cruz their hometown hero — especially in a Latino neighborhood called Aldine. Near the airport, it's one of the poorest communities in Houston.

"He's just so — I don't know how you say this in English — humilde. He's not a humble person to want to help people who actually need help," said Nancy Yanes. She says her parents came to the U.S. illegally from El

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Salvador 30 years ago, and she doesn't like that Cruz opposes a path to citizenship for people like her parents.

"You might be from Houston, but it doesn't really seem like you care about the people in Texas, in Houston," Yanes said.

But Cruz's friends say he's not someone who was ever running for mayor of Houston. And Cruz has stuck to the same conservative principles he used to recite as a teenager.

"I don't think you'll find a single person who knew him in high school who is at all surprised where he is now," Daniels said. "He had direction. I mean, you knew Ted had a plan."

And that plan always seemed bigger than home. The kid who was never afraid to raise his hand in class — who never avoided the stage even if he had to play the bad guy — would naturally go for the biggest brass ring: the White House.

Cruz: US should withdraw from UN Human Rights Commission // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) is calling on the United States to withdraw its membership from the United Nations Human Rights Commission over its vote Friday to condemn Israel for the 2014 conflict with Palestinians.

The commission voted 41-1 on the resolution Friday, with five abstentions, to condemn Israel for targeting civilians. America was the only country to vote against it.

“Our single vote in opposition is just and the abstentions of our friends are welcome, but at this point they are meaningless gestures. It is time to stop ceding moral authority to the UNHRC and tell the truth about this hopelessly biased and anti-Semitic institution,” Cruz said in a statement Friday.

“The United States should stop legitimizing the UNHRC with our membership and withdraw now.”

The 2014 conflict stemmed from Israel’s response to Hamas sympathizers launching rockets from Palestinian territories into the country. Israel’s military operation killed more than 1,000 civilians, drawing widespread criticism from Palestinians and the international community.

But Israel has argued the Palestinians purposefully put civilians in harms way and that it needed to protect itself from the scores of rocket attacks on its country.

Cruz, an ardent supporter of Israel, backed the Jewish homeland in his statement and chided the U.N. for ignoring the Israeli perspective in the resolution.

“There is no equivalency between Israel’s right to self-defense and Hamas’ genocidal aggression against the Jewish people,” he said.

“There is no equivalence between Israel’s extraordinary efforts to protect civilians and Hamas’ use of the Palestinian people as human shields.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz owns mistakes, offers fresh insight // Houston Chronicle // Todd J. Gillman – July 3, 2015

Ted Cruz has a recurring problem with being too cocky and at key points in his life, and that has come with a price. He arrived in Washington intent on bending the Senate toward a conservative agenda, and sometimes he has succeeded. When he didn't, it was probably because his GOP colleagues were timid, wrong or even duplicitous.

These are the Texas senator's own observations in "A Time for Truth," a book that hit shelves last week.

Long passages defending his role in the government shutdown and his antipathy toward President Barack Obama, Obamacare, Iran, Russia, squishy moderates and lots of other targets are familiar to anyone who has ever heard Cruz speak. But there are plenty of fresh insights.

Cruz owns up to a number of mistakes since joining the Senate. Some of these amount to underestimating the eagerness of most fellow Republicans to shy away from a fight and abandon conservative principles. Top Republicans come in for special opprobrium - though it is notable that not once does Cruz call out fellow Texan, John Cornyn, by name.

Time and again, Cruz blasts "the Republican leadership," often chastising Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky while glossing entirely past Cornyn's role as majority whip, the party's No. 2 leader.

In the run-up to the 16-day government shutdown in fall 2013, Cruz writes, "What we did not anticipate was that Mitch McConnell and the GOP leadership team would decide to publicly, directly and aggressively lead the fight against the House Republicans and in favor of Obamacare. Perhaps they wanted to discourage conservatives like (Utah Sen. Mike Lee) and me from ever again rebelling against the party line. Or perhaps they were simply angry that a handful of senators would have the temerity to take our case straight to the American people."

Some of the most venomous passages concern the "surrender" by GOP leaders to end the government shutdown, handing the "radical left" a huge victory in its march toward socialized medicine.

Early in Cruz's Senate tenure, he caused a stir during the confirmation hearing for Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel. Hagel had repeatedly refused to detail the source of some of his income, in particular $200,000 that apparently came from a foreign source. Without full disclosure, Cruz said, Congress had no way to know if the funds had come from North Korea. Critics pounced; the insinuation smacked of McCarthyism, they said.

"I made a mistake," Cruz writes. "I allowed the White House and the Democrats to change the subject" from Hagel's "disastrous foreign policy record," in particular his "antagonism" toward Israel.

Cruz also antagonized Sen. Dianne Feinstein at a hearing over proposed gun restrictions after the Newtown, Conn., school massacre. He asked a lawyerly question comparing potential Second Amendment restrictions to analogous erosion of First or Fourth Amendment rights. It came off condescending and Feinstein shot him down by saying, "I am not a sixth grader."

In the moment, Cruz lost the image battle. In the book, he explains his motive - not to embarrass but to engage in the way he'd been trained as a Supreme Court litigator. "Her reaction puzzled me. Of course she wasn't a sixth grader. No one would ask a sixth grader a substantive question of constitutional law," he writes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He learned his lesson, he said, when the exchange went viral online: "In the U.S. Senate, senators are not used to actual debate. They are unaccustomed to finding their positions questioned or challenged in any meaningful way."

In 1999, Cruz had taken an 80 percent pay cut to serve as a domestic policy adviser on the Bush campaign, giving up a job at a boutique appellate law firm in Washington to move to Austin. Bush, a morning person (unlike Cruz) would sometimes call at 6 a.m. to discuss a memo or policy in Cruz's portfolio, which included gay marriage, taxes, criminal law, immigration and gun rights. Cruz found Bush inquisitive, remarkably charismatic and self-deprecating.

"Perhaps with the exception of a few junior staffers like me, Bush was always the most conservative person in the room," Cruz writes.

But by 2008, Cruz had grown disenchanted with the Bush administration. He disagreed with the bailouts of major Wall Street banks, and rather than revitalizing the Reagan Revolution, "it took the Republican Party down the path of bigger government, excessive spending and new entitlement programs that we couldn't afford. A Republican president should not add $5 trillion to the national debt."

Still, Cruz draws a rhetorical link between Bush's "compassionate conservatism" and his own "opportunity conservatism." Both, he suggests, stem from a desire to encourage growth and economic progress, but in his view, Bush's went astray by turning it into an excuse for intrusive government.

One of Cruz's great disappointments was failing to land a senior position in the Bush White House after the campaign. Instead, he spent a few months as a deputy attorney general, then two as a senior attorney at the Federal Trade Commission.

"I desperately wanted to be a real leader in the Bush administration," he writes. "When that didn't happen, it was a crushing blow."

But it forced him to take stock.

"I was far too cocky for my own good," Cruz writes, and he "burned a fair number of bridges on the Bush campaign."

"Going through that experience altered my personality, and forced me to view the world differently, to treat others with greater respect and humility," he writes. "I needed to get my teeth kicked in. And if that hadn't happened, there's no way I would be in the U.S. Senate today."

CHRISTIE

Exclusive: Chris Christie hires presidential campaign manager and appoints senior staff // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie has hired a seasoned Republican strategist to manage his nascent presidential campaign and has recruited other veteran operatives to round out a senior staff that also will include the top advisers who charted his rise in New Jersey.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ken McKay, a well-regarded operative who previously has served as chief of staff at the Republican National Committee and as political director of the Republican Governors Association, has joined the Christie operation as campaign manager.

Joining McKay at the top of the Christie campaign is Maria Comella, the governor's longtime communications adviser and close confidante, who is becoming the campaign's chief messaging officer. Comella, who had been deputy chief of staff for communications and planning in the governor's office, will have a broad mandate on the campaign overseeing Christie's message, communications and brand.

Christie advisers provided a list of campaign staffing moves to The Washington Post.

Once considered a front-runner for the 2016 nomination, Christie is now far back in a crowded field and will be relying on a small campaign team to guide his comeback.

McKay will be overseeing the campaign's nuts-and-bolts political operations from the national headquarters in Morristown, N.J., while Comella will serve as Christie's right-hand adviser, often traveling with him and helping him hone his message and campaign trail performance.

As expected, Mike DuHaime, who guided Christie's successful 2009 and 2013 gubernatorial runs and held senior positions on the George W. Bush, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain presidential campaigns and at the Republican National Committee, will serve as the senior strategist and lead a team of outside consultants.

Russ Schriefer, who created the gubernatorial television advertisements that helped define the Christie brand, will be the campaign's lead media consultant. He is a veteran of presidential campaigns, most recently serving as senior adviser and media consultant on Mitt Romney's 2012 campaign. Larry Weitzner, who worked with Schriefer on media for Christie's 2009 and 2013 campaigns, will be another media consultant.

Adam Geller, who was Christie's lead pollster in both governor's races, will serve in the same capacity on the presidential campaign.

The governor's closest counselor and the gatekeeper to his political orbit, Bill Palatucci, will serve as the campaign's general counsel. Palatucci will oversee all legal aspects, including ballot access issues and delegate math during what could become a lengthy nominating contest.

Palatucci, who will remain as a fundraiser and all-around adviser, is uniquely suited for the legal position considering his years of experience on the RNC and on the Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush presidential campaigns.

The senior staff combines advisers with personal histories with the governor and newcomers to the Christie orbit who bring experiences from past presidential campaigns as well as the technology sector.

"Governor Christie's 2016 campaign team combines a core group from his gubernatorial victories with an infusion of incredibly talented individuals who have worked at the highest levels in American politics," said DuHaime, who has recruited several former colleagues from the Giuliani campaign and the RNC onto the Christie team.

Some of Christie's team comes from the governor's office, where the top two aides who remain are chief of staff Regina Egea and chief counsel Christopher Porrino.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ray Washburne, a Dallas investor and fundraising powerhouse who most recently served as the RNC's national finance chairman, will hold the title of national finance chairman for Christie's campaign. Other members of the finance committee are expected to be named in coming weeks.

Working with Washburne as fundraising director is Cam Henderson, who served as executive director of the Hurricane Sandy Relief Fund from 2012 to 2014 and before that was chief of staff to first lady Mary Pat Christie. Henderson has held more political positions, including as deputy campaign manager for Giuliani's 2008 presidential campaign, working alongside DuHaime and Comella.

Christie has hired James Garcia as political director. During the 2012 presidential race, Garcia served as Romney's national field director during the primaries and as Colorado state manager in the general election. He most recently served as regional political director at the RNC.

Another relatively new addition to the Christie team is Samantha Smith, who will serve as communications director. She joined Christie's Leadership Matters for America PAC from Google, where she was a senior manager on the tech company's global communications and public policy team. She previously was a communications aide for Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) as well as on McCain's 2008 campaign.

The campaign's digital director will be Lauren Fritts, a former Fox News Channel employee who for the past four years has been digital communications director in the governor's office, where she managed Christie's active presence on YouTube and such social media as Facebook, Snapchat and Twitter.

The research and rapid response director will be Foster Morss, who has worked in the governor's office and previously served on Giuliani's campaign and at the RNC as a senior analyst and deputy research director.

Several former George W. Bush presidential campaign staffers have signed on with Christie as consultants. Brian Jones, a former RNC communications director who worked on the Romney, McCain and Bush campaigns, will be senior communications consultant.

Brent Seaborn, who led the groundbreaking microtargeting project during Bush's 2004 reelection campaign, will be Christie's voter targeting consultant.

Meanwhile, Kevin Shuvalov, a staffer on Bush's 2000 campaign and former RNC aide who has extensive experience in Iowa, will be the direct-mail consultant. And Cary Evans, a former Bush and Giuliani adviser who now is based in Washington state and has experience in Nevada and other western states, will be the telemarketing consultant.

Christie plans to open campaign offices in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. But his strategic focus is squarely on New Hampshire, which hosts the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and where he is beginning to build a robust staff.

Matt Mowers, a former Christie aide who moved to New Hampshire following the governor's 2013 reelection to become executive director of the state Republican Party, will serve as New Hampshire state director.

The New Hampshire political director will be Britt Carter, who spent the 2014 midterm campaign cycle in New Hampshire focused on building a modern, grass-roots field program for state Republicans. Matt Moroney, who has deep roots in New Hampshire and served as a field staffer for Romney in 2012 and gubernatorial candidate Walt Havenstein in 2014, will be New Hampshire operations director.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Iowa, home to the first caucuses, Christie's campaign will be directed by Phil Valenziano, a longtime operative in the Hawkeye State. He served as political director on Gov. Terry Branstad's 2014 reelection campaign and as director of the governor's inauguration. In 2012, Valenziano served as Romney's Iowa field director for the caucuses and as New Hampshire state director in the general election. He will be joined in Iowa by state political director Kevin Poindexter, who has worked at the RNC and for Romney's 2012 campaign.

Christie's sanctioned super PAC, America Leads -- which has set a goal of raising $5 million to $6 million by the close of the fundraising quarter that ended June 30 -- recently announced its senior staff.

It will be led by Phil Cox, who is considered one of the country's top Republican strategists and most recently served as executive director of the Republican Governors Association while Christie was chairman.

The super PAC's advertising and media strategy will be overseen by Doug McAuliffe, a veteran of gubernatorial, Senate and House campaigns. Gene Ulm, a partner at Public Opinion Strategies whose clients include Rep. Paul Ryan, the 2012 vice presidential nominee, will be the super PAC's pollster.

Tucker Martin, a longtime Virginia-based consultant who previously worked as former Virginia governor Robert McDonnell's communications director, will direct communications for the super PAC. Mike Leavitt, a former RNC chief of staff and veteran strategist who helped guide Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan's underdog campaign in 2014, will handle direct mail.

The super PAC's fundraising will be overseen by Paige Hahn, who ran fundraising operations at the RGA from 2011 to 2014, during which the association raised a record $250 million. And Kurt Luidhardt, who has worked for Christie and other Republicans, including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, will handle digital efforts.

Correction: An earlier version of this post misspelled Larry Weitzner's last name.

For Chris Christie, the truth hurts // USA Today // Windsor Mann – July 3, 2015

The only thing worse than a lying politician is one who tells the truth. New Jersey Governor Chris Christie is the latter, or at least he pretends to be.

Announcing his presidential candidacy on Tuesday, Christie vowed to speak the truth. "I mean what I say and I say what I mean, and that's what America needs right now," he said, presumably meaning it.

Many of the truths Christie evoked on Tuesday are indisputable. "I became governor six years ago" (True). "We have a president in the Oval Office" (True). In the not-a-news-flash file: "Both parties have failed our country." He also pointed out that "compromise" is not "a dirty word." Indeed, one can even say it on network television.

Christie is all about telling the truth — or, rather, all about telling people he will tell them the truth. He promised "a campaign of big ideas and hard truths," and reminded the audience of his truth track record: "As governor I've never wavered from telling you the truth as I see it."

What qualifies as truths in Christie's lexicon are mostly bromides, the utterance of which he considers an act of courage. He notified the crowd, "We just need to have the courage to stand up and say, 'Enough!'" This requires no courage at all, only functioning legs and the ability to enunciate two syllables.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What are those truths?" Christie asked. "We have to acknowledge that our government isn't working anymore for us." This is a platitude, not a truth, but Christie still wants credit for telling it.

If Christie intends on telling the truth, rather than merely talking about telling it, he is courting disaster. In politics, telling the truth is a liability, not an asset.

Richard Nixon's claim not to be a crook, though absurd and disingenuous, was shrewd compared to the alternative. It would have been far worse politically if he had said, "People have got to know whether or not their president is a crook. And just so you know, I am."

Jimmy Carter, who promised never to lie to the American people, surely wasn't lying when he confessed to having "looked on a lot of women with lust." This was simply an acknowledgement of biological reality, but it survives as perhaps Carter's most notorious statement.

Walter Mondale, upon accepting the 1984 Democratic presidential nomination, spoke the truth when he said he would raise taxes. The result? He won one state out of 50.

Contrary to myth, Americans don't dislike pandering. They dislike blatant pandering, which is Hillary Clinton's specialty. Once a proponent of the Trans-Pacific Partnership deal, she now is equivocal. She was for the Iraq war when it was popular and against it when it became unpopular. During her first Senate campaign, she claimed she had "always been a Yankees fan." She reminds me of the woman in Coming to America who, when asked what kind of music she likes, answers, "Whatever kind of music you like."

Christie is adopting the opposite strategy, willing, even eager, to tell you that your favorite band sucks. He vowed to run "a campaign without spin or without pandering or focus-group-tested answers" — a line that polls well in focus groups. Telling voters you will not pander to them is itself a form of pandering. Voters want to be told the truth, not what they want to hear, unless the truth is different from what they want to hear.

"You're going to get what I think whether you like it or not, or whether it makes you cringe every once in a while or not," Christie said. But the goal of a presidential candidate is to get elected, not to express cringe-inducing thoughts. Politicians who do the latter lose elections. Remember Todd Akin?

If Christie has thoughts, he failed to elucidate them on Tuesday. Instead, he clarified his approach to Q&A. "When I'm asked a question," he averred, "I'm going to give the answer to the question that's asked." Needless to say, he doesn't always do this. When asked about immigration last year, Christie said, "I'm not going to discuss a complicated issue like immigration here in Marion, Iowa." For reasons left unexplained, the residents of Marion, Iowa, are precluded from hearing the truth about immigration.

Christie said he "will not worry about what is popular but what is right." Voters prefer politicians who do the right thing to politicians who do whatever is popular, except when doing the right thing happens to be unpopular. If Christie doesn't know this already, he will learn soon.

Christie to spend the night at Romney's New Hampshire home // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 3, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) will meet with 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney during Fourth of July swings through New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Washington Post reports that Christie and his wife, Mary Pat, will have dinner at the Romney's Lake Winnipesaukee home, where they will stay the night. And Time adds that Rubio will stay there as well.

"Governor Romney heard that his friends, Governor Christie and Senator Rubio, along with their families, would be in Wolfeboro over the July 4th holiday weekend," a Romney spokesperson told Time. "He and Mrs. Romney opened their home to their friends and look forward to celebrating America's birthday."

The summer house is a six-bedroom, 5,400 square-foot home right on the water a tennis court and a horse stable, according to a 2012 blog on the real estate website Zillow.

Christie is in the Granite State, home of the second presidential nominating contest, as part of a five-day swing. He immediately went north after he announced his candidacy earlier this week, setting up shop in New Hampshire after a quick swing through Maine, where he won the endorsement of Gov. Paul LePage (R).

The morning after they spend the night at Romney's Wolfeboro home, both candidates will walk in the town's Fourth of July parade.

Rubio has also been traveling through New Hampshire and plans to walk with supporters at the parade, before traveling to Chicago on Tuesday.

PERRY

Rick Perry wants to reach out to black people. He'll have to do a lot better. // WaPo // Paul Waldman – July 3, 2015

Yesterday, Rick Perry went to the National Press Club in Washington to deliver a speech that may have seemed unusual, in that it was characterized as an effort to reach out to African Americans, but actually contained much less than meets the eye. Perry presented traditional Republican priorities — tax cuts, regulatory rollback, slashing safety net programs — as a gift the GOP wants to bestow on African Americans and acknowledged that his party hasn't exactly been welcoming to them. But if this is "reaching out" beyond the whites who form almost the entirety of the GOP's voters, it isn't going to accomplish much. Here's an excerpt:

There has been, and there will continue to be an important and a legitimate role for the federal government in enforcing Civil Rights. Too often, we Republicans, me included, have emphasized our message on the 10th Amendment but not our message on the 14th. An Amendment, it bears reminding, that was one of the great contributions of Republican party to American life, second only to the abolition of slavery.

For too long, we Republicans have been content to lose the black vote, because we found we didn't need it to win. But, when we gave up trying to win the support of African-Americans, we lost our moral legitimacy as the party of Lincoln, as the party of equal opportunity for all. It's time for us, once again, to reclaim our heritage as the only party in our country founded on the principle of freedom for African-Americans.

We know what Democrats will propose in 2016, the same thing, the same things that Democrats have proposed for decades, more government spending on more government programs. And there is a proper and an important role for government assistance in keeping people on their feet. But few Presidents have done more to expand government assistance than President Obama. Today we spend nearly one trillion dollars a year on means tested antipoverty programs. And yet, black poverty remains stagnant.

Let's be clear about one thing: The GOP didn't "give up" trying to win the black vote. It spent decades building and maintaining electoral majorities on the encouragement and exploitation of racism. It was a sin of commission, not a sin of omission. And the reason the party is now reevaluating the "Southern strategy" isn't that it had some kind of moral epiphany, it's because the strategy doesn't work anymore.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While we're on this topic, permit me a digression on this "party of Lincoln" business, which is something Republicans say when they're trying to convince people they aren't actually hostile to black people. As Antonin Scalia would say, it's pure applesauce. Here's the truth: One hundred fifty years ago, the Republican Party was the liberal party, and the Democratic Party was the conservative party. They reversed those positions over time for a variety of reasons, but the Republicans of today are not Abraham Lincoln's heirs. Ask yourself this: If he had been around in 1864, which side do you think Rick Perry would have been on? If you took more than half a second to answer, "The Confederacy, of course," then you're being way too generous to him, not to mention the overwhelming majority of his fellow Republicans.

All that isn't to say that it's impossible for Republicans to turn over a new leaf and truly give African Americans a reason to consider their party. But if they're going to be at all successful, it will take both a change in policy and a change in attitude.

A change in policy, at least outside of some very specific areas, is extremely unlikely to happen. Perry discussed the issue of incarcerations related to the drug war, and that's one example where Republicans really are coming together with Democrats to reevaluate the policies of recent decades. They deserve credit for that. But there's almost nothing else they're offering, other than to argue that the things they already wanted to do, such as cutting taxes, will be great for black people, too.

Then there's the argument Perry and others make about safety net programs: that people of color are being enslaved by them, and if we only cut those shackles then they'll rise up. This argument — that the Republican Party wants to slash the safety net only because it cares so much for the poor — has never persuaded anyone in the past, and it isn't likely to in the future.

And what about the change in attitude? The most fundamental reason Republicans can't get the votes of African Americans is that the party communicates to them, again and again and again, that it isn't just ignoring their needs but is actively hostile to them. When conservative justices gut the Voting Rights Act to the cheers of Republicans, and then states such as Perry's Texas move immediately to impose voting restrictions that they know will disproportionately affect African Americans, it sends a very clear message.

Perry began his speech with a harrowing story of a lynching in Texas in 1916, which was surely meant to convey to African Americans that he understands the legacy of racism. But it also sends an accompanying message: that he believes racism is about the violent oppression of the past and has nothing to do with the lives African Americans lead today. And that's another message African Americans hear loud and clear. Every time any issue of race comes up, whether it's about police mistreatment or discrimination in employment or anything else, the first response of conservatives is always to say, "Oh c'mon, what are you complaining about? Racism is over."

If Perry really wanted to "reach out" to African Americans and convince them that something has changed, here's a way he could do it: He could say something about the endless stream of race-baiting that comes from the most prominent conservative media figures. If you've listened to Rush Limbaugh or watched Bill O'Reilly, you know that one of the central themes of their programs is that white people are America's only victimized racial group, while African Americans form a criminal class that deserves to be constantly harassed by the police because they're a bunch of thugs the rest of us need protection from. Day in and day out, those programs' white audiences are told that Obama is some kind of Black Panther enacting a campaign of racial vengeance upon them. "All too often I have seen this president divide us by race," says Perry, when the media figures his party lionizes are constantly telling their audiences to see politics through the lens of their own whiteness and nurture their racial resentments.

And Perry can tell black people that it's welfare that's really keeping them down, but because of his party, the first African American president had to literally show his birth certificate to prove he's a real American. That's just one of the things it's going to take an awful lot of reaching out to make them forget.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Perry made a big speech on states' rights and race. But his policies don't follow. // Vox // German Lopez – July 3, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry is getting a lot of credit for a speech he made Thursday, in which he acknowledged that Republicans have historically touted states' rights to neglect and oppress black Americans. But while Perry's speech has a lot of nice language to chew on, his policies certainly don't reflect the same awareness.

"I know Republicans have much to do to earn the trust of African Americans. Blacks know that Republican Barry Goldwater in 1964 ran against Lyndon Johnson, who was a champion for civil rights," Perry, a Republican who's running for president, said at the National Press Club, according to BuzzFeed's Evan McMorris-Santoro. "They know that Barry Goldwater opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He felt parts of it were unconstitutional. States supporting segregation in the South, they cited states' rights as a justification for keeping blacks from the voting booth and the dinner table."

Some pundits applauded Perry's comments. New York magazine's Jonathan Chait, for example, described them as an "important, historic concession." He later clarified that Perry's comments are "best judged against the backdrop of nonsense through which most conservatives view racial history."

It's true that some Republicans deny the blatant racism of conservatives in the civil rights era, and it's refreshing to see Perry acknowledge those problems. But giving Perry too much credit for his comments lets him get away with saying nice things while not acting on them.

In the same speech, Perry used the states' right argument — which he acknowledged was employed by conservatives in the past to oppress black people — to support polices that disproportionately hurt African Americans. He said he still backs strict voter ID laws that studies show would likely stop more minority Americans from voting than their white counterparts. And he said state governments should still be allowed to decide whether to fly the Confederate Flag, a symbol of white supremacy and racist policies like slavery.

By all accounts, Perry also still supports the Supreme Court decision in Shelby County v. Holder — a challenge to the Voting Rights Act of 1965, a hallmark civil rights legislation — that ended up striking down a key part of the law that let the federal government oversee elections in places with a history of discrimination. The political argument against this law has always been that the federal government was limiting states' rights by controlling how they run elections. But the numbers are clear: The Voting Rights Act overwhelmingly benefited black voters, who were stopped from voting by states through poll taxes, literacy tests, and outright violence prior to the law. Yet Perry called the legislation "outdated" and "unnecessary."

To his credit, Perry restated his support for criminal justice reforms that will help wind down mass incarceration and the war on drugs, both of which have disproportionately hurt black people. But these are reforms Perry supported before his speech and as governor of Texas. They're nothing new for him.

So Perry may be changing his words — and doing so in a welcome way for those concerned about the many racial disparities in the American political and justice system. But so far he's not changing his policies to match them.

Rick Perry: Trump Made 'Huge Error,' Painted Mexicans with Broad Brush // Mediaite // Josh Feldman – July 3, 2015

Texas Governor Rick Perry said on Fox News yesterday that Donald Trump was absolutely wrong in his comments about Mexican immigrant criminals and rapists.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perry told Charles Payne, “I don’t think he’s reflecting the Republican party with his statements about Mexicans. I think that was a huge error on his part.”

He said Trump painted all Mexicans “with a very broad brush,” and contrasted The Donald’s “shoot from the hip” style with his own experience, saying, “Nobody knows that border better than I do.”

Perry deferred a bit on the question of whether companies like NBC and Macy’s are right to dump Trump, but said he didn’t like the “Mexicans are bad people” implication of Trump’s remarks.

And then… oh, you’ll never guess what happened next… Trump responded, this time with a backhanded compliment

Rick Perry: GOP Has Ignored Black Vote For Too Long // Breitbart // Sarah Rumpf – July 3, 2015

Perry’s speech, which is worth reading in full, featured brutally honest discussions of historical events, beginning with the horrific story of a 17-year-old black boy named Jesse Washington, who was brutally tortured and lynched by a mob outside a county courthouse in Waco, Texas in 1916.

Washington’s lynching, said Perry, was an event that could not be ignored, and demanded action:

Even today, we Texans struggle to talk about what happened to Jesse Washington. We don’t want to believe that our great state could ever have been the scene of such unimaginable horror.

But it is an episode in our history that we cannot ignore. It is an episode we have an obligation to transcend.

We’ve made a lot of progress since 1916.

One example of that progress that Perry experienced was when, as Governor of Texas, he appointed Wallace Jefferson to be the first black Texas Supreme Court Justice and then, in 2004, made Jefferson Texas’ first black Chief Justice.

“There are tens of thousands of stories like Wallace Jefferson’s,” continued Perry, describing America as “a country with Hispanic CEOs, and Asian billionaires, and a black President.”

“When it comes to race, America is a better and more tolerant and more welcoming place than it has ever been. So why is it that even today, so many black families feel left behind?” asked Perry, noting that African-Americans continued to economically lag behind other Americans.

Democrats have long had the opportunity to govern in African-American communities.

It is time to help black families hold them accountable for the results.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I am here to tell you that it is Republicans, not Democrats, who are truly offering black Americans the hope of a better life for themselves and their children.

I am proud to live in a country with an African-American President. But President Obama cannot be proud of the fact that the prevalence of black poverty has actually increased under his leadership.

Acknowledging that the "historical legacy" of slavery and segregation had a role in black poverty — a statement not frequently heard from Republican politicians — as well as the government role in sanctioning both of those evils, Perry said there did need to be a role for government in "addressing their lasting effects."

However, said Perry, the Democrats' solutions had a proven track record of failure, giving examples of the billions of dollars spent on Medicaid with no improvement in health outcomes, and the downward spirals seen in Democrat-run cities including Detroit, Baltimore and Chicago.

"[T]he specific policies advanced by the President and his allies on the left amount to little more than throwing money at the problem and walking away," said Perry. Black families are recognizing this, voting with their feet by moving to cities such as Dallas and Houston. In fact, more blacks moved to Texas from 2005 to 2007 than any other state except Georgia.

"Each new resident was welcomed to Texas, with open arms," said Perry, acknowledging that while his state hadn't eliminated black poverty, it had made meaningful progress. According to Perry, the supplemental poverty rate for blacks is 20 percent, as compared to 26 percent in New York, 30 percent in California, and 33 percent in Washington, D.C.

The way this was accomplished, explained Perry, was a combination of tort reforms, low taxes and regulations that not only attracted jobs, but also kept the cost of living low. The Texas economic miracle meant that there were a lot of jobs available for people who wanted them, and the state's policies meant that the salaries people earned stretched a lot further than in other states.

Because we curtailed frivolous lawsuits and unreasonable regulations in Texas, it's far cheaper to do business in Dallas or Houston than in Baltimore or Detroit. And those lower costs get passed down to consumers – especially low-income consumers – in the form of lower prices.

There's a lot of talk in Washington about income inequality. But there's a lot less talk about the inequality that arises from the high cost of everyday life.

In blue-state coastal cities, strict zoning laws and environmental regulations have prevented builders from expanding the housing supply. That's great for the venture capitalist who wants a nice view of San Francisco Bay, but it's not so great for the single mother working two jobs in order to pay rent and still put food on the table for her kids.

While his policy platform is in the final stages of development, Perry did discuss his plan for welfare reform. A one-size-fits-all program did not serve people's needs, said Perry, noting that someone in California might need more housing assistance, for example.

Perry's solution would be to send to Congress a welfare reform bill that would split the funds for non-health care-related, anti-poverty programs into two parts. The first part would be a reformed and expanded version of the Earned Income Tax Credit "so that anyone with a job can live above the poverty line. The second would be "a block grant so that states can care for their safety net populations in the manner that best serves their residents."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas also saw significant improvement in its education system, noted Perry proudly, going from 27th in the U.S. in 2002 to 2nd in 2013 for high school graduation rates. The improvement was even better for minority students, with Texas earning the top rate for both African-American and Hispanic students.

Perry also cited his support for the substantive criminal justice reforms enacted in Texas. As Breitbart News previously reported, during Perry's tenure as Governor, he encouraged the Texas Legislature to pass bills that invested money into diversion programs, drug treatment, and other alternatives to incarceration instead of building prisons.

Perry focused on the human impact of Texas' reforms. "Too many Texans were going to prison for non-violent drug offenses. And once they got out of prison, many found they couldn't get a job because they had a criminal record."

The results have been remarkable, with the state saving some $2 billion and closing three prisons, while the crime rate dropped to its lowest level since 1968. Violent crime, property crime, juvenile offense and recidivism all dropped across the board.

There is also a political advantage, as this kind of criminal justice reform has cheerleaders on both the right and the left, and is an issue with major potential for crossover appeal. Polling has consistently shown strong bipartisan support for these reforms, and with Perry having been governor of the state that is serving as the national model for criminal justice, he owns this issue as no other candidate, Democrat or Republican, can.

Perry then turned his remarks to politics, and the ongoing challenges that Republicans have had earning black votes. "I am running for President because I want to make life better for all people, even those who don't vote Republican," he said, but "I know Republicans have much to do to earn the trust of African-Americans."

Reaffirming his support for the Tenth Amendment, Perry acknowledged that conservatives' support for the states' rights protected therein sounded similar to the arguments used by segregationists, even though that was not their intention. Rather, Perry explained, his enthusiasm for the Tenth Amendment was rooted in the principle that "state governments are more accountable to you than the federal government."

However, Perry said, he was "also an ardent believer in the Fourteenth Amendment," which guarantees that the government shall not deny any person the equal protection of law. Including the rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment in any discussion about the Tenth was critically important, said Perry, if the Republican Party wanted to retain its "moral legitimacy as the party of Lincoln":

Too often, we Republicans – myself included – have emphasized our message on the Tenth Amendment but not our message on the Fourteenth – an Amendment, it bears reminding, that was one of the first great contributions of the Republican Party to American life, second only to the abolition of slavery.

For too long, we Republicans have been content to lose the black vote because we found that we could win elections without it. But when we gave up on trying to win the support of African-Americans, we lost our moral legitimacy as the party of Lincoln. As the party of equal opportunity for all.

It is time for us to once again reclaim our heritage as the only party in our country founded on the principle of freedom for African-Americans.

In a question-and-answer session after his prepared remarks, Perry first answered a question about entitlement reform. Yes, said Perry, he would support means testing, quipping, “I’m pretty sure that Donald Trump can do without Medicare.” The idea that the wealthiest Americans “have to be in line for all those entitlement programs doesn’t make sense to me.” His detailed plan for entitlement reform, as well as his tax plan, would be released soon, he promised.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perry also elaborated on his experience, an issue that he has made central to his campaign. “This is not my first rodeo,” he said, noting he had served in the Texas Legislature and as Lieutenant Governor — an office that in Texas wields enormous influence over the Senate and the overall legislative agenda — before becoming Governor, an office which he held for fourteen years.

He emphasized that none of the reforms enacted while he was Governor — even the 2003 tort reform that made Democrats howl — was passed with only Republican votes. “There are a lot of things that we agree on,” said Perry, and significant progress can be made with even a staunchly conservative agenda, if you work to “find those things we agree on, bring Democrats and Republicans together.”

“It makes sense to come up with ways to come together, not divide us,” said Perry. “We need a President who will bring this country together,” the way he was able to bring Texas together, and send a “powerful, powerful message” to the American people.

Perry criticized Donald Trump’s recent comments regarding Mexican immigrants. “I don’t think Donald Trump’s remarks reflect the Republican Party,” he said. Instead, said Perry, the GOP was reflected in “people like me” who had worked with people of all backgrounds in Texas, and in Eva Guzman, who was the first Hispanic appointed to the Supreme Court of Texas. Perry later elaborated more on his criticism of Trump in a Fox News interview, as Breitbart News reported.

In Texas, added Perry, Hispanics are 40 percent more likely to have a job and two times more likely to own a small business. And his successor, Gov. Greg Abbott (R-TX), had campaigned on a platform of tough border security, but still won the Hispanic vote by a solid margin.

“[Hispanic Texans] knew that there was a government in place that represented their values and protected them and kept them secure,” said Perry. “It is unquestionable what we have done” in Texas to improve Texans’ economic potential, and provide security, and this was something that reaches all people. “I think we have a great message…the Republican Party is where they need to be.”

Perry also cited his military experience, as the only candidate other than extreme longshot Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC)47% in the Republican presidential primary who had served.

He was also one of the very few who had felt the burden of what it is to be a Commander-in-Chief during the war on terror, seeing Texans deployed, and “looking into the eyes of spouses and parents who lost their loved ones.” Perry, who has been very outspoken in his criticism of the Obama administration’s poor response to the VA hospital scandals, also spoke of “looking into the eyes of young people” who had volunteered to serve our country, but when they returned, did not receive the care they were owed.

These veterans “need a champion,” said Perry, “who goes into the White House every day” to fight for them.

“I am a unique candidate,” said Perry. “Those experiences are unique. No one else on that stage — no one — has that experience,” and after eight years of Obama, “Americans will be looking for someone with experience, a known leader, someone with a record of success.”

As noted, Perry’s speech was widely praised. Following a strong campaign launch and solid first few weeks where he was impressing both grassroots activists and policy wonks, Perry was commended for both his laudable record, but also for his blunt, honest remarks about race and how the Republican Party had failed to reach African-Americans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

National Review's Charles C.W. Cooke voiced what many seemed to be thinking when he tweeted, "I've been unexpectedly impressed with Rick Perry this week. Another National Review contributor, Yuval Levin, called the speech "an an ambitious and impressive performance," adding that he was "hoping it sets the tone for the coming campaign."

Bill Kristol at the Weekly Standard tweeted his prediction that Perry would move up in the polls in the aftermath of this speech, noting that Perry "could claim to be the anti-DC, anti-establishment candidate who has actually governed."

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham tells Iowan: "I don't want you to vote for me" // CBS // Stephanie Condon – July 3, 2015

Conservative Sen. Lindsey Graham has made it clear he's extremely concerned about the threat of Islamic terrorism, but he isn't willing to outlaw a whole religion over it.

When a voter in Iowa suggested barring Islam in the U.S. in response to ISIS, Graham quickly shut him down, the Des Moines Register reports.

"You know what, I'm not your candidate," Graham said, cutting him off. "I don't want you to vote for me. I couldn't disagree with you more."

As he's said before, Graham told his audience Sioux City on Thursday night that he would deal with ISIS by increasing the United States' military presence in Iraq. Explaining his terse response to the voter's suggestion to outlaw Islam, Graham told people, "I'm not trying to please him."

Lindsey Graham: "I'm running" because the world is falling apart

"I'm not putting up with that," he said. "He's got a right to say whatever he wants to say, but I have an obligation to the Republican Party, to the people of Iowa and the country as a whole to be firm on this. I'm not buying into that construct. That's not the America that I want to lead."

Graham demonstrated a few times in Iowa his willingness to speak candidly. In an interview from Iowa with the Huffington Post, the longtime senator teared up talking about his friendship with Vice President Joe Biden.

"If you can't admire Joe Biden as a person, then probably you've got a problem," he said, calling the vice president "the nicest man I think I've ever met in politics."

Graham has a long way to go if he wants to gain traction in Iowa, one of the first states to nominate presidential candidates for the Republican and Democratic parties. A recent Quinnipiac poll of likely Iowa GOP caucus goers showed Graham was registering at just 1 percent support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HUCKABEE

Presidential Candidate Mike Huckabee Uses Schizophrenia As A Slur, Gets It Wrong // Forbes // Emily Willingham – July 3, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee made a common error recently in his attempts to mock what he sees as dissonance in the decisions Chief Justice John Roberts has made in two high-profile Supreme Court cases. In commenting on a Des Moines radio show about Roberts' dissension from the decision regarding same-sex marriage and his decision in favor of the Affordable Care Act, Huckabee said that Roberts

"apparently needs medication for schizophrenia."

The National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) didn't take too kindly to the attempt to use schizophrenia as a slur or to the mischaracterization of schizophrenia as involving a split personality, noting in a news release that "Schizophrenia is a mental illness that interferes with a person's ability to think clearly, manage emotions, make decisions and relate to others. It affects about 1% of Americans. The average age of onset tends to be in the late teens to early 20s for men and the late 20s to early 30s for women. It does not mean that a person has a 'split' or multiple personalities."

In fact, the disorder associated with multiple personalities has a name, dissociative identity disorder. While the two can have overlap of some symptoms, including auditory and visual hallucinations, delusions are the primary symptom that characterizes schizophrenia whereas two or more distinct personalities constitute the main feature of dissociative identity disorder.

The latter remains a controversial diagnosis and is thought to trace to extreme and often repeated traumatic experiences that lead the person with the condition to wall off the recollections of those experiences in a separate personality or personalities. It might be more common in girls and women than in males.

Schizophrenia, on the other hand, has a genetic component with a pretty high rate of co-occurrence in identical twins and is equally common in men and women. It can involve a lifelong need to manage delusions and hallucinations but violence is not, as seems to be a popular perception, a key feature. Suicide, however, is devastatingly common, and occurs at a rate of up to 10% of young men with schizophrenia.

While schizophrenia tends to be associated only with its negative manifestations, some people with the condition, including the late John Nash, have argued that some elements of it have been useful for them. However, many people with schizophrenia struggle with gaining and keeping employment, in part because of bias, and as NAMI points out in its statement, the stigma around mental illnesses like schizophrenia itself remains "a serious health problem."

Mischaracterizing schizophrenia and attempting to use it as a slight, as Huckabee did in his remarks, does nothing to diminish either the misunderstanding or the stigma (I have reached out to the Huckabee campaign for comment). He's not the first, however, to try to use a neurological condition against Roberts to criticize the chief justice's decision. "Conservative firebrand" Michael Savage, who once made headlines for averring that in "99% of cases" of autism, the child is really "just a brat," tried to blame Roberts' last decision on the Affordable Care Act on the chief justice's seizure medication.

JINDAL

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bobby Jindal Really, Really, Really Hates Gay Marriage // Mother Jones // Kevin Drum – July 3, 2015

After three courts told him he had to, Louisiana governor Bobby Jindal will finally allow his administration to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples today.

....Jindal's administration argued it's possible the Supreme Court's ruling didn't apply to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, where Louisiana had been defending its statewide ban....On Wednesday, the circuit court actually went through the motion of confirming the Supreme Court has jurisdiction over it.

....But Jindal's administration jumped on that as reason to delay even further. The Fifth Circuit technically sent the case back to the lower, district court where its earlier ruling in favor of the state had to be corrected. The New Orleans Times-Picayune reported that Jindal's spokesman said no same-sex couple would be recognized until the district court formally reversed itself. And so it did that today."

I've seen several people wondering why Jindal wasted time with this, since he knew perfectly well what the outcome would be. The answer is obvious: He's trying to position himself as the most tea-partyish, most anti-Obama, most combative conservative in the Republican field. So this is basically brand marketing. Republican voters now know that no one will stand up for traditional values as strongly as Bobby Jindal. Message sent and received.

TRUMP

Donald Trump's Lousy Week (Except for the Polling) // NYT // Daniel Victor – July 2, 2015

Donald Trump has had a bad week.

The trouble began with his inflammatory remarks about Mexican immigrants during a speech to announce his presidential candidacy on June 16.

"When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best," Mr. Trump declared. "They're not sending you. They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people."

Interactive Feature | Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)? At least a dozen Republicans and a handful of Democrats have expressed an interest in running for their party's 2016 presidential nomination.

Over the next week, each day seemed to bring a fresh blow to Mr. Trump. A brief review of the wreckage might make you feel better about your troubles.

The business impact.

The remarks set off a cascade of condemnation that engulfed some of his business dealings, beginning late last week with Univision announcing that it would no longer carry the Trump-produced Miss USA or Miss Universe pageants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week, more companies followed.

On Monday, NBCUniversal cut all ties with Mr. Trump, saying it would no longer air the pageants or "The Apprentice." Televisa, the world's largest Spanish-language media company, also cut ties. Carlos Slim, the Mexican billionaire, scrapped a television project. And in Chicago, 5 Rabbit Cerveceria pulled out of a beer partnership with a Trump Hotel bar, then renamed some of its beers in a vulgar tribute to Mr. Trump.

On Tuesday, Mr. Trump sued Univision, accusing it of violating its contract. Meanwhile, Farouk Systems, a hairdressing company, dropped sponsorship of the pageants and involvement in "The Celebrity Apprentice."

On Wednesday, Macy's said it would drop his fashion line, which had been sold in the store since 2004. (If all that wasn't enough, his hotel chain said it was investigating a possible payment card data breach.)

Petitions created on Change.org and MoveOn.org are pressuring other companies to cut Mr. Trump loose, suggesting the financial toll could continue to build.

The mockery.

As one might expect, late-night comedians have had a field day. Jimmy Kimmel joked that NBC's rejection of Mr. Trump's beauty pageants was not because they "treat women like cattle at a state fair. It was the thing about Mexicans."

Others had more pointed responses. Mayor Bill de Blasio of New York, while announcing that the city is reviewing its contracts with Mr. Trump, said his comments "do not represent the values of inclusion and openness that define us as New Yorkers." America Ferrera, the actress, said Mr. Trump lives "in an outdated fantasy of a bigoted America." Eva Longoria invoked Hitler.

He has gained infamy in Mexico too, where an array of political figures lashed out at the remarks.

And yet, polling remains solid.

But its wasn't all bad for Mr. Trump. In several recent polls he has trailed only Jeb Bush in the race for the Republican presidential nomination, whether nationally or in key states like New Hampshire and Iowa. Plus he can count Senator Ted Cruz among his defenders.

Mr. Trump, meanwhile, is unchastened. He has not apologized.

"Nothing that I stated was different from what I have been saying for many years," Mr. Trump said in a statement on Tuesday.

Hispanic leaders want GOP field to condemn Trump's 'idiocy' // AP // Steve Peoples – July 3, 2015

Hispanic leaders are bristling at the largely tepid response by Republican presidential candidates to Donald Trump's characterization of Mexican immigrants as rapists and drug dealers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several 2016 contenders have brushed off Trump's comments while others have ignored them. Marco Rubio, a Florida senator who is Hispanic, denounced them as "not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive," after declining for two weeks to address the matter directly. Another Hispanic in the race, Ted Cruz, said Trump is "terrific," "brash" and "speaks the truth."

It's an uncomfortable moment for Republicans, who want more votes from the surging Latino population.

And it could be a costly moment if more candidates don't go beyond their Donald-will-be-Donald response and condemn him directly, said Alfonso Aguilar, a Republican who leads the American Principles Project's Latino Partnership.

"The time has come for the candidates to distance themselves from Trump and call his comments what they are: ludicrous, baseless and insulting," Aguilar said. "Sadly, it hurts the party with Hispanic voters. It's a level of idiocy I haven't seen in a long time."

So far, Trump has paid less of a political price than a commercial one.

The leading Hispanic television network, Univision, has backed out of televising the Miss USA pageant, a joint venture between Trump and NBC, which also cut ties with Trump. On Wednesday, the Macy's department store chain, which carried a Donald Trump menswear line, said it was ending its relationship with him. Other retailers are facing pressure to follow suit.

In his speech last month marking his entry into the Republican race, Trump said Mexican immigrants are "bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people."

The businessman has refused to back down, although he insists his remarks were misconstrued.

"My statements have been contorted to seem racist and discriminatory," he wrote in a message to supporters on Thursday. "What I want is for legal immigrants to not be unfairly punished because others are coming into America illegally, flooding the labor market and not paying taxes." His original comments, though, did not make a distinction between Mexicans who came to U.S. legally and those here illegally.

His rhetoric may resonate with some of the Republican Party's most passionate voters, who have long viewed illegal immigration as one of the nation's most pressing problems. But the 2016 contest brings opportunity for the party to make inroads with Hispanics, with several Latino candidates and a former Florida governor, Jeb Bush, who has deep Latino ties and speaks Spanish and hasn't been shy about using it in the campaign.

Even so, Bush has said little more about Trump's comments than that they were "wrong."

"Maybe we'll have a chance to have an honest discussion about it onstage," Bush said last weekend while campaigning in Nevada, referring to Republican presidential debates.

Rev. Gabriel Salguero, president of the National Latino Evangelical Coalition, is paying keen attention to how the candidates respond to Trump's "xenophobic rhetoric."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're listening very, very closely, not just what candidates say but what they don't say — the sins of commission and the sins of omission," he said.

Among 2016 contenders:

—New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie called Trump's comments "wholly inappropriate." But in a subsequent radio interview, he said Trump is "a really wonderful guy (who's) always been a good friend."

—Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said: "I don't think Donald Trump's remarks reflect the Republican Party."

—Cruz said he likes Trump and thinks NBC "is engaging in political correctness" in breaking ties with him.

—Rubio said the next president "needs to be someone who brings Americans together — not someone who continues to divide."

—Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former technology executive Carly Fiorina and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson have been silent.

Not since the 2004 re-election campaign of President George W. Bush has a Republican presidential candidate earned as much as 40 percent of the Hispanic vote. Mitt Romney got a dismal 27 percent in the 2012 contest against President Barack Obama.

Pataki's Trump card: Using The Donald to get noticed in crowded GOP field // CNN // Jeremy Diamond – July 3, 2015

George Pataki might have found a way to get noticed in the crowded GOP field of presidential candidates: attack the highest-profile hopeful.

The former New York governor, who didn't even register 1% of support in the latest CNN/ORC poll, is looking to raise his profile by attacking Trump's controversial remarks about undocumented immigrants.

"We need a President that all Americans can respect, not a celebrity who uses words like freedom and liberty like they are a punchline in a reality show," Pataki said Friday in a statement that announced his petition that urges Americans to "Stand up to Trump."

The petition comes after Pataki has spent the last two days seizing on Trump's comments about Mexican immigrants, whom the real estate mogul and now-GOP candidate has called everything from "rapists" to "killers."

Since announcing his interest in the presidential race, GOP strategists have barely given Pataki's campaign a cursory look -- considering his campaign among the longest of longshot bids -- and a son-in-law's stroke caused Pataki to temporarily suspend his campaign in its infancy.

His Trump stunt is now giving his campaign a much-needed jolt of media attention after he launched his campaign just over a month ago, but has seen little to no national news coverage since. Until now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's certainly giving Pataki an opportunity to not only grab onto the coattails of a presidential candidate who is surging in the polls, but it's also giving Pataki a chance to distinguish himself from the rest of the field.

Most Republican presidential candidates have either dismissed Trump as a distraction or avoided getting tangled in a verbal sparring match with the bombastic billionaire.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican, has simply said that Trump is "wrong," while Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul chuckled that "I don't know what he's been saying, but uh, he apparently is drawing a lot of attention." And Sen. Ted Cruz, whose father is Cuban, has instead defended Trump as "brash" and someone who "speaks the truth" and praised him for drawing attention to illegal immigration.

Pataki has done the exact opposite: blasting Trump and calling on his fellow White House hopefuls to do the same.

"Here we are in 2015 and a leading candidate for the GOP nomination for President is calling Mexicans criminals, rapists and drug dealers. This is unacceptable," Pataki said Wednesday in an open letter to the rest of the Republican field.

Pataki's efforts were joined on Friday by Sen. Marco Rubio, a Cuban-American who called Trump's remarks "offensive and inaccurate" as well as "divisive."

"Our next President needs to be someone who brings Americans together -- not someone who continues to divide," Rubio said in a statement. "Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from -- not closer to -- a solution. We need leaders who offer serious solutions to secure our border and fix our broken immigration system."

But beyond drawing a response from other candidates, Pataki's efforts give him a chance to insert himself into the constant coverage of Trump and the fallout from his remarks, snagging interviews on CNN and with other national news outlets that will help improve his name identification.

He even got some help from Trump on that front, with the Twitter-savvy businessman who frequently uses the social media platform to lob attacks at his detractors sticking to his usual script.

"Governor Pataki was a terrible governor of NY, one of the worst -- would've been swamped if he ran again!" Trump said. "Governor Pataki couldn't be elected dog catcher if he ran again -- so he didn't!"

The move could also win Pataki some favor among the GOP establishment where strategists and party elites are keenly aware of the need to draw Latinos in, rather than turn them away, heading into the 2016 election.

Hot off heavy media coverage of the remarks and his campaign announcement last month, Trump surged to second place in the nationwide CNN/ORC poll released Wednesday. He is also ranked second in recent polls in both Iowa and New Hampshire.

But Trump is also highly disliked among many GOP voters, with more than half in several key polls saying they have an unfavorable opinion of the New York mogul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jon Stewart Slams Donald Trump Supporters For Defending 'Mexican Rapists' Comments // HuffPo // Julia Bruccullieri – July 3, 2015

Donald Trump has found himself in the center of controversy since he first announced his bid for presidency, and Jon Stewart is having a field day.

On Thursday night's show, "The Daily Show" host told viewers he wanted to thank one person "who's been there really throughout this whole run, but specially near the end of the run." That person was Trump.

"Donald recently glided back into my life on his solid gold up-and-down people mover, cranked up the unauthorized Neil Young, opened up his crazy hole, and promised me I would never be without material again," Stewart told his viewers.

The focus of Stewart's segment was a string of anti-immigrant remarks Trump made during his presidential announcement speech. You may remember hearing the Donald say: "They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people."

Like many of us, Stewart was baffled by these comments, but even more so by the people who continued to defend them.

"The one good thing to come out of this is that the farce of his candidacy is finally exposed: his un-seriousness on display, for all people and voters to see! And the results will be obvious," said Stewart, before showing that Trump is actually in second place among Republican voters in a national poll in three states flashed on screen.

"F--k me," was all he could say.

Bernie Sanders Will End the IMF's Economic Violence in Greece and Africa // HuffPo // Robert Naiman – July 3, 2015

Many people want to know more about Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders' foreign policy agenda. Yes, they say, we like what Sanders is saying about reducing extreme inequality, about reducing the political power of the billionaire class. But what about U.S. foreign policy? Yes, they say, Bernie voted no on the Iraq war; yes, they acknowledge, Sanders supports the Iran deal. But we're spending more than half of our federal income tax dollars on the Pentagon's empire, money we should be spending on rebuilding our nation's domestic infrastructure. "A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death," Dr. King said. What's Bernie going to do about that?

I'm all for pushing Bernie to talk more about downsizing the Pentagon to be an institution focused on actually defending the United States, as opposed to running around the world overthrowing other people's governments -- a Pentagon that "goes not abroad in search of monsters to destroy," as President John Quincy Adams put it.

But we should also take advantage of the new opportunity that now presents itself; it's not only with bombs that U.S. foreign policy kills and injures innocent civilians.

We should recognize and publicize the fact that Bernie Sanders is the only presidential candidate who is talking about what the IMF is doing to Greece, the only presidential candidate who has a track record of opposing the IMF, the only presidential candidate who, if elected, is likely to do anything to end the economic violence of the IMF.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his historic campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1988, Jesse Jackson often invoked the theme of "economic violence":

Economic violence is the critical issue of our day. When plants close on workers without notice, and leave them without jobs or training for new jobs -- that's economic violence. When three to five million Americans are on the streets and homeless -- that's economic violence. When merger maniacs make windfall profits and top management is given excessive bonuses, golden parachutes to aid a soft landing, while workers are asked to take a wage cut, a benefit cut and a job loss, a crash landing -- that's economic violence. When our children are victimized with poor health care, poor education, poor housing, poor diets and more -- that's economic violence against our children.

Jesse Jackson was talking about U.S. domestic policy. But others have used the idea to talk about the IMF:

Hundreds of campaigners are marching in Prague as the main policy-making body of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) begins a meeting to discuss debt relief.

They want the IMF and its sister organisation, the World Bank, to cancel altogether debts owed to them by the poorest countries.

The protesters are staging a "funeral" procession through Czech capital to highlight their view that 7 million children a year die because of the debt crisis.

Jubliee 2000, which is organising the march, says it will be totally non-violent and that it is committed to peaceful protest.

"We condemn violence, both the violence which ends in broken windows, and the violence that kills 19,000 children a day," the group's UK director Ann Pettifor told the BBC.

The IMF is not "over there." The IMF is headquartered in Washington, physically, politically and financially. A progressive economist once reported that he was at a seminar at the IMF, where a senior IMF official was indignant that people were saying that IMF is unaccountable. The IMF official demanded to know: why do people always accuse us of being unaccountable? We never do anything without checking with the U.S. Treasury Department!

Until now, unfortunately, Congressional Democrats have been largely content to let Treasury to run the show at the IMF without the input of real Democrats.

The IMF is now doing to Greece what the IMF has been doing to Africa since the 1980s and what the IMF did to South America until the progressive governments there kicked the IMF out. The IMF is a member of the "troika" of official creditors that have been making extreme austerity demands on the Greek government and are now openly demanding "regime change" in Greece before there can be any deal that ends the crisis in Greece that the troika has imposed.

(Some people complain that we shouldn't blame the IMF for what is being done to Greece; they say that some other institution or actor is more responsible. These people want us to play "accountability whack-a-mole" with the institutions. We need to hold the institutions "jointly and severally liable"; and the IMF is the bad actor in the troika for whom Americans have the most responsibility.)

Bernie Sanders is the only presidential candidate who is speaking out about this. In Congress, it's the progressive

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats - including Sanders - who are speaking out about this.

U.S. support for the IMF is more politically fragile than many people realize. Many Congressional Republicans hate the IMF, in significant measure because they see the IMF as a Democrat-supported taxpayer-financed slush fund to bail out big private banks when their international bets go bad (which assessment is quite correct.) Without the support of Congressional Democrats, the IMF is dead meat in Washington. Whenever the IMF wants more money from Washington, there's a campaign to trick low-information Democrats into believing that the IMF is "foreign aid," so that Democrats will support it.

When more Democrats own the fact that the IMF agenda is the NAFTA-WTO-TPP agenda with a European internationalist smiley face mask pasted on, the IMF will be on a fast train to the dustbin of history. And this is not necessarily a remote prospect - the fact that this is the fundamental identity of the IMF is well known among labor activists, for example.

AFL-CIO chief economist William Spriggs recently wrote:

In the U.S. we must take the side of Greece in this fight. It is in our interest, as the immediate problem of the instability this is causing is a rising dollar that will hurt U.S. exports and jobs. And, we can never be sure of the interrelated nature of financial collapses since so much of the banking sector remains in the shadows; with global derivatives trading at values greater than global output.

More importantly, we must also revolt against this economic order. It is the same order that saved JP Morgan Chase, but let Detroit and now Puerto Rico fail. It is the same religion that would sacrifice the earnings of American students with rising student debt and de-invest in public higher education. It is the same religion that would sacrifice American jobs and labor standards and back the Trans-Pacific Partnership. We must see these as the same struggle to restore sanity and purpose to role of government and its servant, the economy.

This is why supporters of the IMF should be very afraid that Bernie Sanders and progressive Democrats are denouncing what the IMF is doing to Greece. You can add your voice here.

Donald Trump again lambastes border security after a California woman is killed // LA Times // Ryan Parker – July 3, 2015

Real estate mogul and Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, who has come under fire for referring to some Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and "killers," again blasted border security in the wake of the slaying of a California woman and the news that the suspect was deported five times.

Trump did not directly refer to the comments that have cost him valuable business sponsorships and prompted denunciations from Latino groups. Instead, he focused on border security.

Other GOP contenders, after largely sidestepping the issue, are now blasting Trump's immigration remarks, with Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida the latest to do so.

In a series of tweets Friday, Trump said the shooting death of 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle at a popular tourist spot in San Francisco was unacceptable. "Our Southern border is unsecure," he said in a tweet. "I am the only one that can fix it, nobody else has the guts to even talk about it." Francisco Sanchez, 45, was arrested on suspicion of murder. Sanchez has seven felony convictions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump has stood by his "rapists" and "killers" comments, but made no direct mention of Mexican immigrants in Friday's tweets.

Fellow Republican candidates this week said that Trump has gone too far.

"His views are not reflective of the immigrant experience. He's just wrong," former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told the The Daily Caller.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, in an interview on Fox News, called Trump's comments a "huge error" that "painted with a very broad brush."

"I don't think he's reflecting the Republican Party," Perry said.

Rubio released a statement, posted Friday by CNN's Jake Tapper, condemning Trump's comments, calling them " offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive."

"Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from -- not closer to -- a solution," according to the statement.

Still, Trump does have support from at least one other GOP candidate, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, who defended Trump to Chuck Todd in an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration," Cruz said. "The Washington cartel doesn't want to address that."

Several companies -- including Univision, NBC and Macy's -- have severed ties with Trump because of those comments. Trump filed a $500-million lawsuit against Univision alleging breach of contract.

However, his stance on immigrants living in the country illegally does not seem to be hurting him in recent national polls, which have him in second place among Republicans.

Donald Trump: Whose voters is he stealing // CS Monitor // Peter Grier – July 3, 2015

Right now, Donald Trump is like a black hole whose stupendous gravitational pull is attracting a lot of media attention and some of the voters associated with the Republican 2016 presidential race. Which of his rivals in particular is this hurting?

After all, Mr. Trump's poll numbers have risen sharply since he said that this time, he's actually, positively running. Polling is a zero-sum game: His rise means other folks have fallen. Let's look at the numbers and see which of Trump's fellow candidates they are.

First, two caveats: Our Trump track record is not good. We thought he'd move to Maine and raise beets before he'd run for president. We belittled reporters who implied otherwise. We were wrong.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Also, the polls we're about to pick apart are early ones, so they're far from definitive. At this point, they're more of a general suggestion than a precise measurement. That goes even more so for the poll cross-tabs, which have a smaller sample size. Still, they could be hints of what's to come.

OK, back to the main feature. As we said, Trump's gotten a post-announcement bump in polling popularity. In the crucial early caucus state of Iowa, for instance, he's risen to a tie for second place. He currently attracts 10 percent of likely Iowa Republican caucus-goers, according to a Quinnipiac University survey. Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson also gets 10 percent. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker leads the Iowa pack with 18 percent.

The bottom line? In a look further down the list, the contender who appears to be losing ground in Iowa is Mike Huckabee. He's at only 5 percent in the new Quinnipiac poll, down from 11 percent in a comparable May survey. That sort of makes sense: Mr. Huckabee's God, grits, and gravy populism isn't that far off Trump's anti-immigrant and bellicose positions.

But Governor Walker's dropped a bit in this poll series as well. And if you move to New Hampshire, state of the first-in-the-nation primary, it appears that Trump's entry into the race has pushed the Wisconsin governor down a Franconia-sized notch.

In New Hampshire, Trump's in second, according to a recent Suffolk University poll, with 11 percent. Jeb Bush leads in the Granite State with 14 percent. Walker trails with 8 percent – a substantial drop from March, when Suffolk had him at 14 percent of the GOP primary vote.

Nationally, Trump's jump into the fray has affected Marco Rubio the most, according to a CNN/ORC poll. Senator Rubio now stands at 6 percent in CNN's most recent numbers, down from 14 percent in May.

Walker's also slipping nationally, according to CNN. He's at 6 percent, down from 10 percent in May.

Trump? He's in second place (again), with 12 percent of the vote, up from 3 percent in March, according to CNN's numbers.

See the pattern here? There's one top contender who's largely unaffected by Trump's escalator ride to candidacy – Mr. Bush. He remains the weak front-runner, but now he's got Trump behind him like a screen. The Donald is holding his arms out and bellowing to keep others from catching up.

The question is whether Trump's newfound numbers will hold up. In 2012, a series of Mitt Romney's rivals rose and fell. They were discovered by voters, then received more intense press scrutiny (Herman Cain's alleged sexual harassment problem comes to mind) and fell to earth.

As an actual candidate, Trump's now getting a taste of what more-critical media are like. The uproar over his harsh remarks about Mexican illegal immigration may be just the start. His rambling announcement speech could provide fodder for more such flaps to come.

UNDECLARED

WALKER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Scott Walker's Wisconsin, Obama urges Crowd to Flee to Democrat-Run paradise In Minnesota // Slate // Beth Ethier – July 3, 2015

President Obama took advantage of a stop in La Crosse, Wisconsin on Thursday to get in on the fun of the 2016 presidential derby, telling an enthusiastic university crowd he's lost track of how many Republicans are running but that it's probably enough for "an actual Hunger Games. That is an interesting bunch."

Obama also stoked a regional rivalry while questioning the economic credentials and policy agenda of the "bus full" of contenders for the Republican presidential nominaton, particularly the state's conservative governor and as-yet undeclared candidate, Scott Walker.

We've seen what happens when top-down economics meets the real world. We've got proof right here in Wisconsin. There was a statewide fair-pay law that was repealed. The right to organize and bargain collectively was attacked. Per-student education funding was cut. Your minimum wage has been stuck in place. Meanwhile, corporations and the most fortunate few have been on the receiving end of hundreds of millions of dollars in new tax cuts over the past four years...

What happens when we try middle-class economics? Just across the river, it's a pretty interesting experiment. In Minnesota, they asked the top two percent to pay a little bit more. They invested in things that help everybody succeed, like all-day kindergarten and financial aid for college students. They took action to raise their minium wage and they passed an equal pay law. They protected workers' rights. They expanded Medicaid to cover more people.

Now, according to Republican theory, all those steps would've been bad for the economy, but Minnesota's unemployment rate is lower than Wisconsin's. Minnesota's median income is around $9,000 higher.

Obama went on to quote an editorial in their hometown paper, the La Crosse Tribune, declaring that Minnesota "is winning this border battle." The divergence in economic fortunes of the two states has been noted for the past few years, as Democratic majorities in both chambers of Minnesota's legislature have steadily implemented progressive reforms in cooperation with a Democratic governor.

Republicans, Obama said, are like your "Uncle Harry" who says outlandish things at Thanksgiving. "You say, 'Uncle Harry, that makes no sense at all.' You still love him. He's still a member of your family, right? But you've got to correct him. You don't want to put him in charge of stuff."

The president hastily added that "if there's an Uncle Harry out here, I wasn't talking about you."

New York Times Debunked: Scott Walker's 'I'm Not Going Nativist' Conversation Never Happened // Breitbart // Matthew Boyle – July 3, 2015

A conversation about immigration between Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and the Heritage Foundation's Stephen Moore, reported on by the New York Times this week, never happened.

"We have spoken with Stephen Moore and the conversation that was reported did not happen and he will tell you that. I would recommend you reach out to him," Walker spokeswoman AshLee Strong told Breitbart News on Thursday in response to an article by Jonathan Martin and Maggie Haberman.

On Thursday, the reporters wrote: "Stephen Moore, a conservative scholar at the Heritage Foundation who backs an immigration overhaul, called Mr. Walker's embrace of a border-security-first approach 'A lurch to the right and probably something very popular among Iowa conservative voters.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But Mr. Moore also said he was not convinced that Mr. Walker was quite the immigration hawk as he may appear now," the Times added. "Rather, he called the governor's positioning 'a work in progress.'"

Then the newspaper wrote: "Mr. Moore said he had become concerned about Mr. Walker's stance [on immigration] in recent weeks, but was reassured after a phone call with the Wisconsin governor," then quoted Moore himself recounting what Walker supposedly said.

"He said, 'I'm not going nativist; I'm pro-immigration,'" Moore said Gov. Walker said.

But Walker's presidential campaign insists that conversation never happened, so Breitbart News reached out to Moore for more information.

Moore confirms that there was no phone call between him and Walker. What actually happened, he says, is a bit more murky and confusing—much different from what the Times says happened.

"Here's what happened, I'm on this group with Larry Kudlow and Art Laffer called the Committee to Unleash Prosperity," Moore told Breitbart News.

We had Scott Walker a few months ago for a dinner. So here's the miscommunication: I didn't have the conversation with the governor. Larry went down there. We've got this group, and Larry had a conversation with Scott Walker on immigration stuff—and what he told me because we all work together is that Scott Walker is still pro-growth. Our whole thing is on growth. We don't have to worry about him voting for skilled immigrants coming into the country and that kind of thing. I think the whole thing has been kind of taken out of context. From our point of view, Scott Walker is going to be pro-growth on immigration.

But Kudlow, in a phone interview on Friday evening with Breitbart News, said that's not what happened, either.

"I spoke with Governor Walker, I don't know, it must have been a month ago," Kudlow said.

It was in Madison, Wisconsin, as his request. We had a long meeting—several hours—and we discussed several issues across the board. It was a strictly private meeting, the details of which I've shared with no one. No one. I want to be very clear about that. It was between the governor and myself. No one. Not Steve Moore. Not the New York Times. Nobody. It was a private conversation and off the record.

But there was no phone call between Moore and Walker about this matter—despite the Times report—Moore confirmed. Moore told Breitbart News:

No, no that didn't happen. I did not have a conversation with Walker. It was my mistake. I kind of miscommunicated this to this reporter. What I really meant to say is that Larry did. And when Larry had the conversation, we felt that he was going to be just fine and not going to be a problem on immigration. Everybody is kind of making a mountain out of a mole hill here. It was basically just—our objective at the Committee to Unleash Prosperity is to promote policies that will make the American economy grow faster. That's all we're about and so that's all we really talked to the governor about, was what are the policies that make the economy grow faster? And Walker was at the dinner meeting and also at the thing with Larry solid. I'm a big supporter of his.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I have to talk to the reporter—I have to call him today and say, ‘Look I think you misunderstood what I was saying,’” Moore added. “What I was talking about was based on this meeting that Larry had.”

What really happened, according to Moore, was that Walker had a meeting with Kudlow, not with Moore.

“I was talking to Larry and he reported back to us because I asked, ‘Well how did the meeting go?’ and he said ‘We talked a lot about a lot of issues,’” Moore told Breitbart News. “This was right about the time this immigration issue had sprung up, and Larry was like ‘Oh, he’s going to be with us on immigration.’”

Kudlow told Breitbart News, however, that he told Moore no such things from his conversation with Walker.

“No. That is just not true,” Kudlow said when Breitbart News read Moore’s quote back to him over the phone.

The only thing I might have said to Steve and Art is that I talked to the governor about a lot of issues. I made no definitive statements on taxes, immigration, trade, nothing. Look this was a private meeting. A guy asks you in and it was a private off the record meeting, you keep it private and off the record. The only thing I can confirm is that I probably said to Steve we talked about a lot of issues. Nothing more.

When asked if Walker said in the conversation with Kudlow—the quote Moore told the New York Times,“I’m not going nativist, I’m pro-immigration”— Moore told Breitbart News he’s unsure.

“I don’t know. I wasn’t at that meeting, so I don’t know exactly what he said. I’m sort of saying what Larry Kudlow told me about the meeting,” Moore said.

Kudlow told Breitbart News he will not reveal publicly here–just as he says he has not to anyone else–the details of the conversation with Walker.

“I haven’t done it with anybody and I’m not going to start now,” Kudlow said.

Scott Walker is a friend. I don’t know what Steve was thinking or where he was going with that. But that’s you know—there’s no there there. I can report nothing to you. I’m always helpful to Breitbart. I love Breitbart. In fact, I was one of the first people to put [Andrew] Breitbart on TV many years ago. I help you guys whenever I can. But this is all I can say to you. There’s nothing more there.

This matters, because the biggest and most significant thing Walker has done on his lead up to launching his campaign has been rethinking his position on immigration.

He joined the last two winners of the Iowa Republican caucuses—former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom are running again now—by tapping into strong economic populism that has faded from the Republican Party under the leadership of people like Ryan and his fellow failure and 2012 top-of-the-ticket running mate Mitt Romney. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL)80% and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush have also been pushing the party away from the voter base toward the donor class, and Walker has been somewhat caught in the crossfire between the two different camps. At different times on different issues, he’s shown a propensity to side with either or both.

Moore himself has written in favor of looser immigration laws.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Republicans and conservatives might want to coalesce around a position of tight welfare and generous immigration rules," Moore, a member of the Wall Street Journal's editorial board, wrote in the Journal in 2013. "That is something Milton Friedman would no doubt regard as the ideal outcome. As another late great economist—William Niskanen, a member of President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers and chairman of the Cato Institute—once put it: 'Better to build a wall around the welfare state than the country.'"

Despite the fact that he admits not having had a conversation with Walker, Moore insists the governor isn't simply saying one thing to one side and the public and another to the other behind closed doors.

"I think that's what he [the Times reporter] was trying to imply—that he's saying one thing to me, and another thing to other conservative groups," Moore tells Breitbart News. "I don't think that's a fair characterization at all."

It would certainly help if Walker was more forthcoming—and his team was clearer in answering the questions that come their way—but they're not. The Times didn't respond to a request for comment for this story.

OTHER

Chris Christie and Marco Rubio Get Pajama Time at Matt Romney's House // NYT // Ashley Parker and Maggie Haberman – July 3, 2015

Mitt Romney is having a slumber party this weekend at his New Hampshire compound with some very interesting guests: Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, along with their families.

The sleepover party Friday night at Mr. Romney's summer vacation spot in Wolfeboro, N.H., came about when the 2012 Republican presidential nominee realized that the two current hopefuls would be campaigning in the area during the holiday weekend.

"Governor Romney heard that his friends, Governor Christie and Senator Rubio, along with their families, would be in Wolfeboro over the July 4th holiday weekend," an aide to Mr. Romney said. "He and Mrs. Romney opened their home to their friends and look forward to celebrating America's birthday."

Mr. Romney, who almost jumped into the 2016 presidential race for his third try at the White House, remains a coveted surrogate for Republicans and a person whose approval carries weight with donors.

The visit by Mr. Christie, first reported by The Washington Post, comes days after he announced his presidential run and as he is trying to shake off a difficult six months in which his poll numbers have fallen. Mr. Christie is struggling to keep donors by his side after Jeb Bush's entrance into the race and after lingering fallout from the scandal over the George Washington Bridge lane closings.

Aides to both Mr. Romney and Mr. Christie have never completely gotten over a rift in the 2012 race, when Mr. Christie, despite being a key supporter, declined to campaign with Mr. Romney in the final week of the campaign after Hurricane Sandy ravaged his state. Instead, the governor warmly embraced President Obama as the two toured the ravaged New Jersey coast together.

Both moves infuriated Mr. Romney's aides. But the two men have remained in touch, and this weekend Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie is bringing along his wife, Mary Pat, and two sons.

Mr. Rubio, for his part, has been making efforts to court Mr. Romney's financial support and also some of his advisers. A former top campaign aide to Mr. Romney, Rich Beeson, is deputy campaign manager for Mr. Rubio, and Wayne Berman, a Republican bundler, joined Mr. Rubio's team early. And Terry Sullivan, Mr. Rubio's campaign manager, also worked for Mr. Romney's 2008 presidential bid.

At a campaign stop in Tilton, N.H., Mr. Christie said it was too early to ask for Mr. Romney's endorsement.

"I was the first governor to endorse Gov. Romney in 2011, and I endorsed him in October," he said. "So it'd probably be bad form for me to ask him to do it any time earlier than that."

"We'll talk whatever our host wants to talk about," Mr. Christie said of his planned evening with Mr. Romney. "You know me, I'm kind of the shy and retiring type, I'll sit back and let the conversation come to me."

Campaign aides to another candidate who is in New Hampshire this holiday weekend, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, were not aware of any plans for him to meet with Mr. Romney. The two men met privately in Utah in January, when Mr. Romney was still considering entering the race.

Romney to host the Christies, Rubios at the New Hampshire home // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 3, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's comeback journey begins here in New Hampshire, so the Republican presidential candidate is paying a visit to the last winner of the state's first-in-the-nation primary and one of its most famous summertime residents.

Mitt Romney is hosting Christie and his wife, Mary Pat, at his waterfront compound on picturesque Lake Winnipesaukee on Friday night, people familiar with the plans said.

During the summer, Romney's sprawling Wolfeboro retreat — which includes a private beach, tennis court and trails — is a playground for the 2012 GOP nominee's huge family.

On Friday night, though, Romney will have the Christies as overnight guests. But they won't be the only non-family members in the house. Fellow GOP hopeful Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida and his wife, Jeanette, are also joining the Romneys for Friday night's slumber party.

"Governor Romney heard that his friends, Governor Christie and Senator Rubio, along with their families, would be in Wolfeboro over the July 4th holiday weekend. He and Mrs. Romney opened their home to their friends and look forward to celebrating America's birthday," said an aide to Romney, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity.

On Saturday morning, the Christies and Rubios will also be marching in Wolfeboro's celebrated Fourth of July parade. One of the state's more colorful parades, Wolfeboro's includes such quirks as a lawn chair brigade. The Romneys are known to be annual presences along the parade route.

Rubio, Christie planning sleepover with the Romneys // AP // Jill Colvin – July 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney will be hosting two rival Republican presidential contenders at a holiday sleepover Friday evening.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio will both be staying over at Romney's property in Wolfeboro, New Hampshire, an aide to Romney confirmed.

The aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of what the aide called the private nature of the event, said the former governor and his wife opened their home to the Christie and Rubio families after hearing they would be in town for the holiday weekend. Both candidates are scheduled to march in Wolfeboro's Fourth of July parade.

Christie, who formally jumped into the race this week, told reporters in New Hampshire Friday that he was grateful for the invitation.

"I suspect there might be a little politics discussed tonight with Mitt and Ann, but me and Mary Pat, and Andrew and Sarah are really happy that Mitt and Ann invited us to stay with them tonight," he said, according to video posted by NJ.com.

A Rubio spokesman declined to comment.

Romney had considered another run for president in 2016, but announced in January that he'd decided against it. His endorsement is now coveted.

Christie was a top surrogate for Romney's 2012 campaign and was considered a potential vice presidential contender. But he continues to receive heat in some Republican circles for leaving the trail and embracing President Barack Obama after New Jersey was hit by Superstorm Sandy just before the election.

Christie's campaign also announced some of its top staffers Friday.

The campaign will be managed by Ken McKay, who formerly worked for the Republican National Committee and Republican Governors Association.

Romney to host Christie, Rubio in New Hampshire // Politico // Jennifer Shutt – July 3, 2015

Mitt Romney is opening up his sprawling New Hampshire vacation home to 2016 rivals Marco Rubio and Chris Christie this weekend.

Christie and his wife Pat are planning to have dinner with the former GOP presidential candidate on Friday night at his home near Lake Winnipesaukee and spend the night, according to a report in The Washington Post. On Saturday they plan to walk in the town's Fourth of July parade, which is a tradition for the Romney family.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who is also running for the GOP 2016 presidential nomination, is expected to walk in the parade as well and will stay at the former Massachusetts governor's home, according to Time.

Romney won the 2012 Republican primary in New Hampshire with 39 percent of the vote, but received 46 percent in the general election and lost the state's electoral college votes to Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio, Christie To Bunk At Mitt Romney's New Hampshire B&B // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp – July 3, 2015

This may be the political junkie's sleepover of the year: Two rival candidates for the Republican presidential nomination will be bunking tonight with Mitt Romney at his vacation home in Wolfeboro, New Hampshire.

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie and Florida Senator Marco Rubio will be the guests of Romney, the Republican party's 2012 nominee. Both candidates are scheduled to march in Wolfeboro's July Fourth parade.

Speaking to reporters today in Derry, New Hampshire, Christie told reporters that he, his wife, Mary Pat Christie, and two of the couple's children, will be guests of Romney and his wife, Ann. A source close to Romney confirmed that Rubio will also be an overnight guest.

The vacation home of Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney on Lake Winnipesaukee in Wolfeboro.

The Romneys own a $10 million vacation home in Wolfeboro. The meeting at a home near New Hampshire's Lake Winnipisaukee will reunite two politicians with considerable professional and personal history in Romney and Christie, and one who is a newer acquaintance.

In 2009, Romney was an early supporter of Christie in his race for governor.

Three years later, Christie returned the favor, vigorously backing Romney in his unsuccessful challenge to President Barack Obama.

Romney opted not to make a 2016 run despite early indications he flirted with the notion. Nevertheless, he's remained an in-demand Republican surrogate and fundraiser, and his support is coveted by many in a field that swelled to 14 people Tuesday when Christie jumped in.

In an interview with Bloomberg's Mark Halperin last month, Romney named six Republican candidates whom he could support, and spoke warmly of both Rubio and Christie.

"I like Marco," Romney told Halperin, quickly adding that he liked a number of the Republican contenders. "I'm fiercely neutral in this process he quipped."

Of Christie, Romney said: "I've spent a lot of time with him and feel very close to him." And he offered his friend words of encouragement.

"Some people count him out, but not me," Romney said, referring to Christie's drop in the polls following a spate of negative publicity over his state's budget problems and his advisers' politically-motivated decision to manufacture a traffic jam outside a Democratic-controlled town.

"We like the comeback story," Romney added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On a Derry sidewalk outside MaryAnn's diner, where he had been greeting breakfast patrons, Christie declined to say what he's expecting to the discussion topics to be. "Whatever he wants to talk about," Christie, 52, told reporters of his host. "I'm confident there will be some politics discussed tonight, but there will be lots of other things talked about too."

Romney to Host Rubio, Christie for July 4th // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 3, 2015

Former Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney is hosting two of his would-be successors Friday night at his home for the July 4th holiday.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio are marching in the Wolfeboro, N.H. Fourth of July parade—the largest in the state—on Saturday morning, just blocks from the Romney family vacation home in the bucolic lakeside town.

“Governor Romney heard that his friends, Governor Christie and Senator Rubio, along with their families, would be in Wolfeboro over the July 4th holiday weekend,” a Romney spokesperson said. “He and Mrs. Romney opened their home to their friends and look forward to celebrating America’s birthday.”

Both Christie and Rubio attended Romney’s E2 Summit in Park City, Utah last month and are hoping to win over his supporters and donors in the first-in-the-nation primary state. Romney told reporters at the summit that he intends to remain neutral through the primaries.

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry are also participating in New Hampshire July 4th festivities on Saturday, but will be staying elsewhere.

OTHER 2016 NEWS

The unexpected rise of Bernie Sanders and Donald Trump // WaPo // Kathleen Parker – July 3, 2015

Stranger things have happened in American politics, but the sudden surge of Democratic/populist Bernie Sanders and Republican/pompulist Donald Trump puts one in mind of alternate universes.

And I don’t mean Miss Universes.

Both men are holding second place in some polls behind Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush, respectively. And both are steadily ascending in the polls at a greater pace than anyone could have predicted — or imagined.

Sanders, a socialist running on a platform that should send shivers up the spines of most Americans, drew his largest crowd of the season — nearly 10,000 — in Madison, Wis., last Wednesday night. The anti-establishment candidate, who wants to break up big banks and redistribute wealth, makes President Obama (and Clinton) look like robber barons by comparison.

Although Madison is a liberal college town and Sanders’s record crowd could be rationalized accordingly, poll after poll shows him closing the gap with Clinton. A Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday morning put him within 19 points of Clinton among likely Democratic caucus-goers in Iowa. Quinnipiac surveyed 761 likely Iowa Democratic caucus participants, with humans calling cell and land phones, and with a margin of error of 3.6

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

percentage points.

Meanwhile, A WMUR/CNN Granite State poll put Sanders just 8 points below Clinton in New Hampshire.

As Sanders remarked in Madison upon seeing the throng that greeted him, “Whoa.”

At the same time Sanders is on the zoom rail, mysterious things are happening around the candidacy of the Trumpster. Some of you may recognize him as the cartoon character eternally lost in a game of Monopoly, sort of the way Beetlejuice was confined to a miniature graveyard in the movie of the same name. (No matter what happens, do not say “Trump!” thrice in a row.)

He is otherwise known for: the buildings he has named after himself; a couple of TV shows he has hosted, the names of which escape me now; his hair, which he recently averred is his own; his vast fortune, about which he can’t stop bragging — and a proportionately small mouth for someone famous for having such a big one.

To wit: His recent comments about Mexican immigrants as rapists, drug runners and criminals. And, he added, “some, I assume, are good people.”

Why, there’s a good one right over there — mowing Trump’s Palm Beach Mar-a-Lago estate lawn. “Hola, Paco, que tal? ”

Trump’s insulting tirade has had the dual effect of getting him fired from NBCUniversal, Univision and Macy’s (and counting) for comments unbecoming an icon and getting him feted as the Iconoclast that Republicans have been waiting for. If you’re a member of the Republican base, a candidate can’t be too anti-immigration, too anti-Common Core — or too rich, apparently.

Even as Trump’s various enterprises are vanishing — and support among, I dunno, let’s call them “sane Americans” is waning — he has doubled down on comments that could as easily have been retracted with an apology. Here’s a sample for future reference: “ Of course, I didn’t mean that all Mexicans are rapists. I was upset by some of the statistics I’ve read and just mouthed off without more carefully considering the full impact my words could have on others. I’m sorry.” (Warning: Do not add: Some of my best friends are Mexican.)

But no. Instead, commenting on a 2014 Fusion article about Latin American women being raped as they traveled to the United States across Mexico, “Well, somebody’s doing the raping, Don!” he retorted when CNN anchor Don Lemon gave him a chance to think things through. “I mean, somebody’s doing it!” Trump said. “Who’s doing the raping? Who’s doing the raping?”

Trump has a point there. Someone is doing the raping, assuming the Fusion story is true. And the same Fusion story that claimed that 80 percent of Central American women and girls are raped as they cross through Mexico to the United States also answered Trump’s question: “Perpetrators can be coyotes, other migrants, bandits, or even government authorities.”

Hmmm, so not necessarily those who then funnel into North America?

See? Logic isn’t so hard, but rant over reason is so much more effective in attracting attention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump's fans say they like his blunt talk, that he says what they're thinking. He's BOLD! Indeed. But bold and blunt wear thin after a while.

And the United States, though keen to hear fresh voices and ideas, isn't ready for either a Robin Hood or a King John in the White House.

Enjoy the show, everybody. But rest assured: This too — and these two — shall pass.

What candidates really mean when they invoke the 'Founding Fathers' // WaPo // Andrew M. Shocket – July 3, 2015

There's nothing more American than Fourth of July cookouts, fireworks — and political speeches, especially as we enter another presidential campaign season. For politicians, nothing suits the holiday better than invocations of our nation's Founders. Not all such exclamations are cut from the same red-white-and-blue cloth, however. Pay close attention as the candidates praise the "Spirit of '76," and you'll see that they're not taking a break from partisan rhetoric, but engaging in politics at its most elemental level. Here's a guide to some founding-related phrases and what they really mean today.

"Founding Fathers"

Nothing says "I'm a conservative" more than this phrase. That's because it evokes an image of rich white guys who didn't like taxes (until they had to wage a war, in which case they raised them to levels unimagined under British rule, but that's another story). Warren G. Harding coined the term, and since 2000, it has been used almost exclusively by Republicans. The more conservative the candidate, the more likely you'll hear it. Rand Paul, George Pataki, Scott Walker, Mike Huckabee, Ted Cruz, Rick Santorum and Rick Perry have all flogged the Founding Fathers. But don't expect to hear this from Hillary Clinton: She uses "Founders" instead.

"A more perfect union"

This is the liberal response to "Founding Fathers." From the Constitution's preamble, the phrase originally expressed the hope that the Constitution would be an improvement over its predecessor, the Articles of Confederation. Today, liberals use it to imply that the nation and perhaps even the Constitution weren't immaculately conceived and stand in need of reform. You'll encounter it especially when politicians want to take on large issues such as race or the increasingly prominent role of big money in politics. Expect to hear this from Clinton and especially openly liberal presidential candidate Bernie Sanders, who has used it before to celebrate Independence Day.

"Created equal"

A phrase from the Declaration of Independence, which asserts "that all men are created equal" and "endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights," including "Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness." This may be a big one this year as candidates take on economic inequality, racial inequality or both. Democratic candidate Martin O'Malley used the phrase when announcing his candidacy, perhaps to help place himself to Clinton's left.

"A [fill in the blank] Bill of Rights"

When candidates want to drape stars and stripes over a plan to address an issue and make some innovation look as though it should be permanent, this is how they do it. The “Bill of Rights” refers to the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, of course, including cornerstones of American civic life such as freedom of speech, worship, assembly; the right to bear arms; the right to a jury trial; and protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. In recent elections, candidates have proposed a credit card bill of rights, a privacy bill of rights, veterans’ bills of rights (including one in 2008 courtesy of current Republican hopeful Huckabee), a military family bill of rights, a crime victims’ bill of rights, and even worker and shareholder bill of rights. One that probably won’t come up now that Obamacare has fundamentally altered the debate over health care: a “patients’ bill of rights,” versions of which were backed by numerous presidential candidates from 2000 to 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Our sacred Honor

The Declaration of Independence closes with its signers pledging “our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor,” no small matter given that, had the Revolution failed, they all likely would have been executed for treason. “Honor” resonates more with men than with women, and more with conservatives than liberals, and the “sacred” part catches the ear of evangelical voters. Today the phrase gets used to imply that liberal officeholders are staining the nation’s reputation. It was often brought up in the 1990s by Republicans angry about Bill Clinton’s affair with Monica Lewinsky; don’t be surprised to hear it this year from Republicans attacking Hillary Clinton over Benghazi. Cruz spoke this phrase when he announced his 2016 candidacy.

Of course, many Americans will be treated to an entire reading of the Declaration of Independence instead of a candidate’s speech. But if so, don’t despair: This guide won’t expire, and you’ll have 493 days to consult it during the 2016 presidential election campaign

Drawing voters in: Campaign logos bring artistic touch to politics // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 3, 2015

Scott Walker released a part of his logo Thursday night, with plans to unveil the full brand, piece by piece, over the next nine days until his expected presidential announcement on July 13.

The black and white image shows what looks to be a stage with the superimposed letters "CA" creeping in from the left. Such a partial glimpse is an uncommon rollout for a campaign logo, designed to build gleeful anticipation for his big kickoff and likely one of the final presidential announcements of the year.

Walker's suspenseful logo launch underscores the power and visual impact that symbols can have in defining a campaign. Along with a candidate's face, logos become the most recognizable visuals for a campaign. They aim to capture the candidate's message and personality in a brand that's versatile enough to fit on a range of paraphernalia and advertising.

"Ultimately, the logo's job is to build remembrance," said Sky Hartman, a brand designer who created Ron Paul's 2012 logo.

Hartman and other designers point to President Barack Obama's 2008 logo as a new benchmark for campaign designs. The O-shape horizon broke tradition by being a symbol that can be easily identified without the candidate's name.

"If you can design a concept that sticks in people's minds, you've been successful," Hartman said.

A number of decisions go into the creative design process. But a key component of a logo is it's transferability: The typeface, dimension and color must be small enough to fit on a button or big enough to fill up a billboard.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's campaign attempted the symbol approach, choosing a blue letter "H" with an arrow going across. Voluntarily created for the campaign by Michael Bierut, a designer at Pentagram, the logo generated a huge splash on social media, with some criticizing it for looking like the FedEx logo, while others thought the red arrow pointing to the right was a little too Republican.

Clinton's team, however, has been able to replace the blue filling in the bolded "H" with other colors and images. During the Supreme Court ruling on same-sex marriage last month, the H was filled with a rainbow. When her campaign announced it was going to Iowa, her press releases contain the H filled with a photo of a cornfield.

Just like artwork, logos are open for interpretation and can mean different things to different people. Still, campaigns generally try to convey messages of strength, optimism, and hope -- all the while capturing some element of the candidate's personality.

For Jeb Bush, that means adding punctuation. The former Florida governor also created a stir when he unveiled his logo, a recycled version of his gubernatorial brands, with an exclamation point at the end of his first name, underlined by "2016."

Jimmy Fallon poked fun at the logo when Bush was on "The Tonight Show" last month. "Do I pronounce it JEB!" Fallon said, shouting the candidate's name. "Did Regis Philbin come up with this? Jeb! Jeb is running for President 2016! Jeb!"

Bush informed Fallon that Jeb stands for his full name, John Ellis Bush.

"John, exclamation point, probably wouldn't work," the candidate joked. "But Jeb kinda works a little better."

The punctuation also aided in crafting a logo that could be used in Spanish -- ¡Jeb! -- drawing attention to his close ties to the Latino community.

The visual strength of a campaign isn't limited to the logo. Campaigns frequently print banner messages that show up on posters, in ads or on backdrops at campaign events -- remember the "We Can't Afford Four More Years" slogan from Romney's campaign.

"Campaigns are judged by how quickly and creatively they respond to real time events, which can mean changing an event's message at the very last minute," said John Legittino, who oversaw event production for Romney in 2012 and founded Harbinger Outreach, a production agency that specializes in political and media optics.

The perfect logo or message banner is short, direct and easy to understand, he said. Campaigns also have to consider how the colors will show up in a range of platforms and how logos will look from different camera shots.

"It may sound good in a meeting at campaign headquarters, but will it look good when it airs on CNN?" he said. "That's the question. It all has to be designed to translate to TV and photos."

Early fundraising totals could shape 2016 GOP field // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 4, 2015

Republican candidates are looking to use the release of their quarterly fundraising numbers to show they've got what it takes to outlast the crowded field.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The smart-money favorites are hoping to flex their muscles and fire a warning shot down the totem pole, while long-shot candidates seek to prove their mettle.

“This is the first opportunity to publicly separate the A-team 2016 contenders from the wannabes,” Ford O’Connell, a GOP strategist who worked on Sen. John McCain’s (R-Ariz.) 2008 presidential campaign, told The Hill.

“And for those mired in the middle of the 2016 GOP pack, this is a chance to outshine expectations and grab some much-needed momentum leading up to the August debate.”

The second fundraising quarter of 2015 — the first of the race for the presidential hopefuls who have already declared — ended June 30. Campaigns have two additional weeks to get the books together before reports are sent to the Federal Election Commission and later posted online.

Strategists say all eyes are on former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has sought out to blow other candidates out of the water with his fundraising totals.

Fred Malek, a top Republican donor, told The Hill he expects a “heroic number” when Bush’s campaign total is combined with his super PAC fundraising numbers.

Bush entered the race with just two weeks left in the fundraising period. But he spent the preceding months fundraising for his Right to Rise super PAC, which can accept unlimited funds — instead of a campaign that is hamstrung by FEC rules.

Because of the super PAC focus, his campaign reports will likely not come close to the record-breaking $45 million posted by Hillary Clinton on the other side of the aisle.

But there’s a reason Bush still faces pressure to post an impressive total: His campaign’s unspoken pitch that he has the fundraising chops to match Clinton in a general election.

"Hillary went out there and threw up $45 million, he has to put up a number that looks good relative to the circumstances," O'Connell said.

“You want to set the pace but also, your target is to scare the Clinton camp.”

Mike Murphy, the head of Right to Rise, reportedly lauded the super PAC’s success in a donor call and predicted the July filing would give Bush’s opponents “heart attacks,” according to Buzzfeed News.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, in second place behind Bush in early polls, didn’t notify the FEC of his impending candidacy until July. So his fundraising figures won’t be shared until October.

Sitting in third in polls, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) faces the unique conundrum of being the other Floridian in the GOP race. A poor showing will raise concerns that Bush has outmaneuvered him to lock down the Sunshine State donor pool.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other candidates aren't expecting to topple Bush's combined haul, but fundraising results can go a long way in proving strength and durability to help separate a candidate from the pack. Candidates can do that not only with a large top-line figure, but through cultivating a large base.

"If they can really wow with just raw numbers, that is very helpful to them," said Katie Packer, 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney's former deputy campaign manager.

"But if you have a broad, big well of donors that every time you dip in is willing to fill up your bucket, that's very powerful."

That method worked wonders for President Obama's elections, Packer added. Obama dwarfed Romney in percentage of donors giving $200 or less during the 2012 campaign.

Ben Carson, the only Republican candidate to announce his second-quarter totals thus far, is already plugging that strategy. He announced on Wednesday an $8.3 million haul from 151,000 donors. Campaign spokesman Doug Watts told the Associated Press that none of Carson's GOP challengers will "come even close to the number of engaged donors."

Carson's total poses a particular challenge for Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom have also touted grassroots engagement as a main catalyst for their 2016 bids.

Carson, Cruz and Huckabee are thought to be competing for the same group of evangelical voters. A big fundraising win could help lock down that share of the electorate for one of them.

The jumbled timeline of the race so far means head-to-head numbers comparisons don't tell the whole story. Cruz, Rubio and Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) were the first entrants into the field. Carson, Huckabee and Carly Fiorina entered towards the middle, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, former Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) and Bush much later in the quarter.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie announced with just days left in the quarter.

The numbers come in at a key point in the 2016 race, because of unprecedented rules for the first debates of the primary season.

Debates hosted by Fox News and CNN in August and September are restricted to just the top 10 contenders, as measured by national polling. Candidates outside the top 10 will debate separately.

"The key thing for all of them is to get on the debate stage, you almost don't care as much as long as you get on the debate stage," O'Connell said. "But if you are getting locked out of the debate stage, you better be able to throw up something that exceeds expectations. "

Poor fundraising totals could sink a fledgling campaign and give the impression that a candidate never truly got off of the ground.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Such a problem befell former Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty in 2012. He shut his campaign down shortly after missing expectations with his first quarterly report, only to find an extremely tight race where low-polling candidates were able to surge near the top as the actual primaries got closer.

Packer warned that while the numbers will shape narratives, the candidates' messages and campaign strategy will have more to do with the results.

Looking back at her experience battling Santorum back in 2012, she said, "We ran against a much weaker field in 2012 and Mitt Romney was without a doubt by a factor of 5 the best funded candidate in the campaign."

"And we still almost lost to somebody that barely had two nickels to rub together."

2016 Hopefuls Flood NH For July 4 // NBC // July 3, 2015

Presidential hopefuls are going on parade throughout the Granite State this July 4.

At least seven 2016 candidates will spend Independence Day courting residents who will vote in the nation's first presidential primary contest next year, according to scheduled logged in necn's 2016 New Hampshire Primary Candidate Tracker, making a combined 14 stops.

While parades are by far the most popular stops during the holiday tour — at least 11 such appearances are expected — candidates' Saturday calendars also include breakfasts, cookouts and grassroots events. Revelers along the routes in Amherst and Merrimack will watch no fewer than three candidates strut by. The resort town of Wolfeboro, where 2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney owns a home, will be greeted by at least two GOP hopefuls.

For some candidates, one parade just isn't enough. Republicans Jeb Bush, Lindsey Graham, and Rick Perry, as well as Democrat Lincoln Chafee, are marching in two apiece. Perry, the former Texas governor, appears to have the busiest public schedule on Saturday so far, stopping by parades in Amherst and Merrimack before greeting crowds at the Windham GOP July Fourth Cookout later in the day.

The holiday hand-shaking isn't limited to July 4 itself. Christie, New Jersey's Republican governor, has been barnstorming the state since making his official entry into the race on Tuesday, including several events on Friday. Perry and Democrat Hillary Clinton are also getting their patriotic partying started early with Friday events, while former New York Gov. George Pataki and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, both candidates for the GOP nomination, will join New Hampshire residents wishing America a belated birthday with Sunday celebrations.

Chris Christie and Hillary Clinton's fake followers // Reuters // Lena Masri – July 2, 2015

Chris Christie, Hillary Clinton and many other presidential hopefuls are haunted by fake followers on Twitter.

Almost half of Chris Christie's followers on Twitter are fake. This makes him the presidential candidate with the highest number of fake followers, according to Vocativ.

Hillary Clinton comes in second, with 35 percent fake followers, while presidential candidates Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders have as many as 90 percent real followers, and only 10 percent fake ones.

The numbers are calculated by a social media analysis tool called TwitterAudit that determines a Twitter account's authenticity. A fake Twitter follower can either be a person with an agenda or an account run by automated software.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Crowded field: Presidential hopefuls end up marching in the same Foruth of July parades // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – July 3, 2015

Marching along in a small-town parade on Saturday is the Independence Day activity of choice for 10 presidential hopefuls who are ready for cheerful photo ops and meaningful soundbites. But it's a crowded field. Some of the rivals are walking in the exact same parades.

In New Hampshire, for example, Jeb Bush, will step to the music in Amherst and Merrimack. Rick Perry is in the same two parades. So is Sen. Lindsey Graham and Democratic hopeful Lincoln Chafee. Spectators get four-for-the-price of one here.

Sen. Marco Rubio will be in Wolfeboro — the swanky summer home of Mitt Romney — for their big to-do. But Mr. Rubio does not have an exclusive, though. Gov. Chris Christie also will be there. Hillary Rodham Clinton, meanwhile, marches with the locals in the towns of Glen and Gorham.

White House hopefuls will also be in Iowa — but without such close encounters. Gov. Bobby Jindal marches in the Urbandale parade, while Sen. Bernie Sanders strides the streets of both Creston and Waukee. Martin O'Malley will walk the parade route in Independence — then ironically attends a big barbecue in a town called Clinton.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Clinton and Obama are on the wrong side of history // WaPo // Dana Milbank – July 3, 2015

Scenes from an insurrection:

In Madison, Wis., on Wednesday, 10,000 people show up to rally for long-shot presidential candidate Bernie Sanders — giving the self-declared "democratic socialist" the largest crowd any candidate has had in this election cycle. Sanders, running on a shoestring and a prayer, has closed to within single digits of Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire and is surging in Iowa.

In New York on Tuesday, populist Mayor Bill de Blasio lashes out in vitriolic terms at New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, a a fellow Democrat, accusing him of "games" and politically motivated "revenge." De Blasio and other Democrats blast Cuomo's handling of housing, immigration, the minimum wage and education.

In Washington last month, an overwhelming majority of Democrats — 158 of 186 in the House and 31 of 44 in the Senate — oppose President Obama on free-trade legislation. Obama prevails in the vote after failing in a similar vote earlier in the month, but the episode leaves the president attempting to repair a deep rift with his fellow Democrats by championing overtime rules favored by unions.

These are not isolated events. Together, they show anew how the populist movement is ascendant within the Democratic Party, and they confirm that the balance of power has shifted. Clinton, who reports raising $45 million since launching her campaign in April, will almost certainly beat the upstart 73-year-old with the crazy white hair. Obama won on trade. But Clinton and Obama are, to borrow a favorite phrase of the president, on the wrong side of history. As I've noted, the country is trending in a more liberal direction, and a growing proportion of Democrats are hard-core liberals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are various causes, but the change is likely in part a reaction to the tea party and to the Republican Party's swing to the right. Democrats so far have shown less inclination to eat their own, but there is a real possibility that intraparty fratricide will break out if Clinton and the rest of the Democratic establishment don't co-opt the rising populist movement. In New York, for example, there is already talk of a liberal primary challenge to Cuomo if he chooses to run again in 2018.

That the Sanders campaign has caught fire is a surprise to just about everybody, not least the candidate himself, who had his doubts. The Brooklyn-born Vermonter with a didactic style lacks the fire and charisma of Elizabeth Warren, who chose not to run. But his call for huge infrastructure spending and taxing the rich has caught the moment just right, even if Sanders himself is an imperfect vessel.

In May, Clinton had a 31-point lead in New Hampshire over her nearest potential Democratic competitor in the WMUR/CNN poll; now she leads Sanders by only eight points, which because of the poll's methodology is a statistical tie. In Iowa, likewise, Clinton had a 45-point lead over Sanders in May, according to a Quinnipiac University poll. Now her lead has shrunk to 19 points.

The populist pushback that propels Sanders's unexpected success also can be seen in the incendiary remarks of New York's top populist, de Blasio, who took the extraordinary step of calling journalists to City Hall to denounce the governor. He called Cuomo's actions "not anything like acceptable government practice," according to the New York Times.

At the heart of the criticism is a sense that Cuomo, though the son of the late liberal lion Mario Cuomo, was insufficiently pure in his ideology and too willing to strike deals with Republicans. Several New York liberals have begun rumbles of a primary challenge to Cuomo — an effort that would be like the conservative efforts to purge the Republican Party of RINOs (Republicans in Name Only) in recent elections.

Obama, too, has been upended by the populist wave. Though he eventually prevailed in the "fast-track" trade vote, he had nothing like the support Bill Clinton got when he pushed through the North American Free Trade Agreement with half of Senate Democrats and 40 percent of House Democrats. Liberals called that a victory. "This isn't 1993, and this is not Bill Clinton's Democratic Party," Rep. Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), who led Democratic opposition in the House, wrote in the Huffington Post on Thursday.

Bill Clinton reshaped the party with moderate "New Democrats," but the new New Democrats look more like the old. Hillary Clinton, notably, sided with liberals on the trade legislation, which is smart: If she doesn't want to get trampled by populists on the march, she'll need to grab a baton and pretend to be the drum major.

Her emails prove it, Hillary's just like us // Boston Herald // Howie Carr – July 3, 2015

So now all bitter clingers are instructed that Hillary Clinton's emails — cherry-picked by her flunkies, reported by her media groupies — somehow "humanize" her.

In other words, you are supposed to read her emails and think, "Hey — ya know, Hillary's just another 'everyday American' like me!"

OK, so let's check her emails out. Here's one from July 2, 2009. Tell me this hasn't happened to you, Mr. and Mrs. John Q. Sixpack. You need to fly somewhere, so you tell your assistant — you do have an assistant, right? — to make you a reservation, not for a seat, but for an entire private jet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And your assistant Huma, who is married to a perv ex-Congressman whose alias is “Carlos Danger,” gives you the bad news.

“The g3 (Gulfstream 3) is delayed till 5pm wheels up. There is a lear available at 2pm with 6 seats. Do u want to just leave at 5?”

Huma, do you really expect an everyday American like Hillary to settle for a tiny private jet that seats only six? She ordered you to get a 19-seat Gulfstream, as befits Her Highness. Haven’t we all drawn that line in the sand — I refuse to get on any private jet with fewer than 19 seats! Don’t you know who I am?

This next one is from Cheryl Mills, a top aide who has issued orders to the Foggy Bottom minions to stop “twittering” under Hillary’s name. This email to another aide was sent out at 3:47 p.m. on a Friday afternoon in May 2009.

“You need to walk this to HRC if she is not gone.”

I’m going to go out on a limb and say she was already gone. Friday afternoon means early slide, right, Hillary?

Did you ever want a nice cold drink in the afternoon? Of course you did. And you can do one of two things. Number one, get up and get it yourself. Number two, email your aide to order another lackey, or server, or waitress, or whatever, to bring you the drink.

Can you guess which option Hillary selected on Sept. 30, 2009?

“Pls call Sarah and ask her if she can get me some iced tea.”

Sometimes, when you’re spending the weekend in China, you see something you like. So on Dec. 15, 2009, Hillary emailed yet another payroll patriot:

“Can you contact your protocol friend in China and ask him if I could get photos of the carpets in the rooms I met in w/POTUS during the recent trip? I love their designs and the way they appeared carved. Any chance we can get this?”

If you read between the lines, what Hillary’s really asking is for the Red Chinese to give the rugs to her — on the arm, gratis, for free! Surely it would be an honor for the Chinese to comp them those nice rugs.

Next, Sonia Sotomayor, the “wise Latina woman” who was confirmed to the Supreme Court in May 2009. Hillary emails another aide ordering her to get a number so she can call and congratulate Sotomayor. Only Hillary spells her name “Sotomyer.”

Misspelling a Hispanic’s name? Isn’t that a “microaggression?” Hey Hillary, call Huma and tell her to get me an iced tea. And make it snappy!

Hillary Clinton’s private messages reveal the banality of email // Independent // Alice Jones – July 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mid-afternoon on 30 September 2009, Hillary Clinton was feeling thirsty. So she did what any dehydrated, high-powered woman would do. She fired off a one-liner email to her aide: “Pls call Sarah and ask her if she can get me some iced tea.”

What a chain of command for one glass of Lipton, but then Clinton was then the US Secretary of State. With great power comes great perks. For example, if I see a carpet I really like when I’m abroad, there is no one in my inner circle to email back home for further information. No one. Clinton has people. In an email titled “Don’t Laugh!”, she asks an assistant: “Can you contact your protocol friend in China and ask if I could get photos of the carpets of the rooms I met in during the recent trip? I loved their designs and the way they appeared carved. Any chance we can get this?”

These are just two snippets from 3,000 pages of emails released by the State Department this week. It emerged in March that Clinton had her own private account, routed through a server at home when she was in office, potentially contravening protocols on record-keeping and security. Clinton has handed over 55,000 pages of emails which will be released over the next few months. A further 32,000 pages concerning her family, “vacations and yoga routines” were deemed private by her lawyer and have been deleted. Still, to judge from this batch, there is plenty to be going on with. If, that is, what interests you is the endless minutiae of a political life.

Not even the globe’s most powerful can tame the teeming inbox, apparently. There are emails about coats – one Clinton wore in Kabul got a “77 per cent favorability rating” according to the assistant secretary of state, queries about private jets and in-jokes about yurts. There are fawning congratulations on this or that speech, and an anxiety-inducing number of “are u awake??” memos sent at all hours, both from and to Clinton.

There is a worryingly insecure grasp of social media – “We should not be twittering in the Secretary’s name since she is not the person actually twittering…” – and a hilarious exchange in which Clinton tries and fails to send a fax (“I’ve done it twice now. Still nothing.”) which took place on 23 December 2009, when no right-thinking person should be sending a fax.

Like any busy boss, Clinton keeps her emails brusque and lower case. There are no niceties, no how are yous, no all the very bests. She has a gimlet eye for detail – and not just about carpets. When an aide tells her cover of Time is “gorgeous”, she shoots back: “How does the article compare to the cover??” If you wanted to pop psychologise, you could make much of one Veep-like email that says: “I heard on the radio that there is a Cabinet mtg this am. Is there? Can I go?” Or of the fact that she hears of Bill Clinton’s new role as UN Special Envoy to Haiti only via a UN leak. “Wjc said he was going to call hrc but hasn’t had time.”

There are more serious revelations too, though not many. Most controversial is her regular contact with Sidney Blumenthal, who was exiled from the White House for being untrustworthy but still in touch frequently, and she with him, offering intelligence and guidance on speeches. Cherie Blair does not come out shining from the 19 emails in which she lobbies Clinton to meet a Qatari royal. The Benghazi attacks do not figure. And 25 emails have been rendered “classified” so the really important, actually in-the-public-interest stuff will likely never appear.

As for the banal to-and-fro of the rest, it will do Clinton no lasting harm, and may even do her good. Hillary is normal! How many of us, if we had to trawl through three years’ worth of emails, would not find a pile of stupid questions, unreasonable demands and unnecessary exclamation marks, not to mention evidence of our insecurity, authoritarian leanings, vanity or fatigue at various times?

The pitfalls of living by BlackBerry are many, which is presumably why on 1 December 2009, Clinton emailed a colleague to ask if she could borrow Send by David Shipley. The book’s subtitle is “Why People Email So Badly and How to Do it Better”. On the evidence of these blandly efficient, inoffensive, unrevealing and occasionally amusing emails, I’d say she read it cover to cover.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[If I were Hillary Clinton, I'd rather Cherie Blair just left me alone] // Guardian // Deborah Orr – July 3, 2015

Politics is too important to be left to the bad people. Who knew? Cherie Blair knew, apparently. But then she forgot. Luckily, Hillary Clinton was around to coax this easily dismissed insight back to the front of her mind. "When I see what a difference you are making," Blair wrote in an email to Clinton, "it reminds me why politics is too important to be left to the bad people." Quick. Get Hallmark on the phone. A greetings card with this on it could do excellent business in that convenience store at the foot of Portcullis House.

Not that Blair thought that her cringey brown-nosing was for public consumption. This pearl was washed up among the detritus of Clinton's newly released emails, sent from a private account when they should have been sent from an official account. Anyone hoping that the emails would contain information useful to those hoping to destroy Clinton's presidential bid must be disappointed, unless liking apples, Chinese rugs and your personal assistant is politically damaging. If anything, they confirm that powerful people are pretty much like the rest of us, except that they attract lots of other powerful people, wanting favours.

The favour Blair wanted from Clinton was a bit odd. Blair wanted Clinton to meet with Blair's friend Sheikha Mozah, erstwhile first lady of Qatar, which was something Qatar's diplomatic people could have fixed up with the US's diplomatic people with perfect ease. After all, they were raining money on the Clinton Foundation anyway, while Qatar was already established as a friendly conduit between the US and Iran.

But Blair wouldn't then have experienced the joy of hooking up one of her important and powerful friends with another of her important and powerful friends. Because that's what the good people like doing. The bad people like doing it too, though, so it's all a bit complicated.

It must be nice, seeing yourself as part of a global illuminati of good people, busily setting good people up with each other, so that all the good people can get together and do good stuff. It must be extra reassuring to realise that a proportion of the global population see you and your spouse as not actually very good people at all.

Different people, good and bad, with different and contradictory opinions, eh? Very tiresome. But if you keep it simple and decide that all the people who don't agree with you are bad, then what can go wrong? Yes, that's right. Everything can go wrong. That's why some of us are quite hung up on democratic accountability.

I'm afraid I find it a bit creepy that three women whose power devolves from their marriages are rubbing shoulders like this. All credit to Clinton for seeking and getting a democratic mandate. None to Blair or Mozah for just going ahead and behaving as if they had. The ruling Al Thani family, into which Mozah married, even manage to be effusive supporters of the Arab spring while hanging grimly on to absolute power themselves.

Blair claims she is exercising her soft power in the cause of "disability", and it's true that Qatar is much more progressive than other states that operate under sharia law. Still, I remember the days when Blair saw sharia law as considerably problematic. No matter. When you want to heal the world, you've got to work with what you can get. "You may not know," Blair modestly explained to Clinton, "but for the last four years I have been working with the Qatari's and in particular with Sheika Moser [sic] on disability issues in Qatar and I have built up a good relationship with them."

Ugh. That almost reads as if building up a good relationship was the point, not the disability issues. (And at what point in a good relationship do you learn how to spell someone's name correctly anyway?) So what, to paraphrase Mrs Merton, first attracted Blair to the multi-billionaire Sheika Mozah? It seems vulgar to bang on about the Blairs' great attraction to vast wealth. But one can shrug off any feelings of judgy self-righteousness by reminding oneself that these guys are impervious to such criticism, swaddled as they are in the soft cashmere of belief in their own rectitude. They deserve to be very wealthy and to rub shoulders with the very wealthy because they are good.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Not that the Blairs are the only people who believe in this self-serving stuff. There are plenty of people in the world who think their splendid moral purpose is so clearly evident that it needs no public scrutiny. There are plenty of people, too, who believe that philanthropy could solve all the troubles on the planet if only they could be left to get on with being good without interference from the state. Tony Blair was big on the power of charity. David Cameron and the Conservatives always are. And there's nothing wrong with charity, nothing at all, except that it's an acknowledgment and exercise of inequality, rather than a corrective to it.

Does it matter that Blair back-channelled Clinton, setting her up in a meeting with Mozah? Everyone knows, after all, that that's how things work. Does it matter that these three women flattered each other with generous dispensations of each other's time and energy, in some mutual expression of each other's goodness? It does matter that they are all women. Ladies who lunch are sneered at and patronised far more than men who play golf, even though it's historically more likely that the latter would be carving up something or other in entirely their own interests.

Clinton is not a lady who lunches, by any means. But Blair seems to have been behaving like a turbo-charged lady who lunches, and dragging Clinton into it. I'm sure Mozah is an interesting woman, and Blair can be friends with whoever she likes. But if I held high office – perish the thought – I'd find people like Blair, so keen to be the one who fixed their Qatari Sheikha chum up with their US secretary of state chum, a complete and utter pain in the backside. I wish she would start being less Cherie Blair, wife of the former prime minister, and more Cherie Booth, leading human rights lawyer, as she seemed so keen to be when her husband was in No 10.

Or maybe she doesn't know where one ends and the other begins. Last year, Booth left Matrix, the human rights chambers she co-founded in 2000, and is now focussing on Omnia Strategy, which she set up in 2011 – two years after she wrote those emails – as "a pioneering, international law firm which provides strategic counsel to governments, corporate and private clients". With friends like hers, no doubt the business is thriving.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Obama Plans Broader Use of Clemency to Free Nonviolent Drug Offenders // NYT // Peter Baker – July 3, 2015

Sometime in the next few weeks, aides expect President Obama to issue orders freeing dozens of federal prisoners locked up on nonviolent drug offenses. With the stroke of his pen, he will probably commute more sentences at one time than any president has in nearly half a century.

The expansive use of his clemency power is part of a broader effort by Mr. Obama to correct what he sees as the excesses of the past, when politicians eager to be tough on crime threw away the key even for minor criminals. With many Republicans and Democrats now agreeing that the nation went too far, Mr. Obama holds the power to unlock that prison door, especially for young African-American and Hispanic men disproportionately affected.

But even as he exercises authority more assertively than any of his modern predecessors, Mr. Obama has only begun to tackle the problem he has identified. In the next weeks, the total number of commutations for Mr. Obama's presidency may surpass 80, but more than 30,000 federal inmates have come forward in response to his administration's call for clemency applications. A cumbersome review process has advanced only a small fraction of them. And just a small fraction of those have reached the president's desk for a signature.

"I think they honestly want to address some of the people who have been oversentenced in the last 30 years," said Julie Stewart, the founder and president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums, a group advocating changes in sentencing. "I'm not sure they envisioned that it would be as complicated as it is, but it has become more complicated, whether it needs to be or not, and that's what has bogged down the process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Overhauling the criminal justice system has become a bipartisan venture. Like Mr. Obama, Republicans running for his job are calling for systemic changes. Lawmakers from both parties are collaborating on legislation. And the United States Sentencing Commission has revised guidelines for drug offenders, so far retroactively reducing sentences for more than 9,500 inmates, nearly three-quarters of them black or Hispanic.

The drive to recalibrate the system has brought together groups from across the political spectrum. The Center for American Progress, a liberal advocacy organization with close ties to the White House and Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton, has teamed up with Koch Industries, the conglomerate owned by the conservative brothers Charles G. and David H. Koch, who finance Republican candidates, to press for reducing prison populations and overhauling sentencing.

"It's a time when conservatives and liberals and libertarians and lots of different people on the political spectrum" have "come together in order to focus attention on excessive sentences, the costs and the like, and the need to correct some of those excesses," said Neil Eggleston, the White House counsel who recommends clemency petitions to Mr. Obama. "So I think the president sees the commutations as a piece of that entire process."

The challenge has been finding a way to use Mr. Obama's clemency power in the face of bureaucratic and legal hurdles without making a mistake that would be devastating to the effort's political viability. The White House has not forgotten the legacy of Willie Horton, a convicted murderer who raped a woman while furloughed from prison and became a powerful political symbol that helped doom the presidential candidacy of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis of Massachusetts in 1988.

But with time running short in Mr. Obama's presidency, the White House has pushed the Justice Department to send more applicants more quickly. Mr. Eggleston told the department not to interpret guidelines too narrowly because it is up to the president to decide, according to officials. If it seems like a close case, he told the department to send it over.

Deborah Leff, the department's pardon attorney, has likewise pressed lawyers representing candidates for clemency to hurry up and send more cases her way. "If there is one message I want you to take away today, it's this: Sooner is better," she told lawyers in a video seminar obtained by USA Today. "Delaying is not helpful."

Under the Constitution, the president has the power to grant "pardons for offenses against the United States" or to commute federal sentences. A pardon is an act of presidential forgiveness and wipes away any remaining legal liabilities from a conviction. A commutation reduces a sentence but does not eliminate a conviction or restore civil rights lost as a result of the conviction.

In recent times, attention has focused on presidential pardons because they have become politically controversial, such as Gerald R. Ford's pardon of Richard M. Nixon, the elder George Bush's pardons of Iran-contra figures and Bill Clinton's pardons of the financier Marc Rich and scores of others.

Modern presidents have been far less likely to commute sentences. Lyndon B. Johnson commuted the sentences of 80 convicted criminals in the 1966 fiscal year, and no president since then has matched that in his entire administration, much less in a single year. Ronald Reagan commuted only 13 sentences in eight years in office, while George W. Bush commuted just 11 in the same amount of time. The elder Mr. Bush commuted three sentences in his four years.

Mr. Obama started out much like the others, commuting just one sentence in his first five years in office. But in his first term he signed a law easing sentencing for new inmates by reducing the disparity between crack and powder cocaine, while his attorney general, Eric H. Holder Jr., issued new guidelines to prosecutors to avoid charges requiring excessive prison terms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his second term, Mr. Obama embarked on an effort to use clemency and has raised his total commutations to 43, a number he may double this month. The initiative was begun last year by James M. Cole, then the deputy attorney general, who set criteria for who might qualify: generally nonviolent inmates who have served more than 10 years in prison, have behaved well while incarcerated and would not have received as lengthy a sentence under today's revised rules.

"It's a touchy situation," Mr. Cole said in an interview. "You don't want to just supplant a judge's determination of sentence." But after reviewing many clemency petitions, he said, "I'd seen a number of them where the sentences seemed very high for the conduct and it noted that the judge at the time of sentencing thought the sentence was too high. We looked at that and thought this really isn't supplanting the judge."

To respond to Mr. Cole's call, several groups formed a consortium of lawyers to prepare applications for inmates, including the American Bar Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and Ms. Stewart's advocacy group. The more than 30,000 inmates who applied inundated the effort.

The consortium, called Clemency Project 2014, now has more than 50 law firms, more than 20 law schools and more than 1,500 lawyers participating. But the process is burdensome as the volunteer lawyers try to dig out documents from more than a decade ago to satisfy the criteria. So far, they have screened out 13,000 inmates who did not meet the guidelines and sent just over 50 applications to the Justice Department.

Cynthia W. Roseberry, who left her job as a top federal public defender in Georgia to lead the project, said it took a while to set up a process but it has now been streamlined. "The lawyers will be able to do the analysis a lot quicker and we'll be able to move them faster," she said.

Aside from the Clemency Project, the Justice Department has received more than 6,600 applications for commutations since Mr. Cole outlined the criteria, more than twice the rate over a similar period earlier in Mr. Obama's presidency. Ms. Leff, the pardon attorney, has solicited volunteers from around the department to give a day or more a week to help out, but her office is taxed. The White House has asked Congress to increase funding for the office from $3.9 million this year to $5.9 million next year.

Margaret Love, who served as pardon attorney under the first Mr. Bush and Mr. Clinton and now represents prisoners applying for clemency, said the process had become a mess. "It's really poor management," she said. "These are people who don't have any history with sentence reduction. They've been putting people in prison all their lives. They don't know how to get them out."

Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has expressed concern that the Justice Department has essentially outsourced a government function to the Clemency Project 2014. Department officials dispute that, saying the project does the same thing lawyers have always done in helping candidates for clemency prepare applications.

The department noted that it still reviews the cases and makes it own judgments before sending recommendations to the White House. Officials acknowledged that it was slow in starting the effort. "There was a start-up time, but now we're really in it," said Emily Pierce, a department spokeswoman. "We feel we're moving at a good pace."

In December, Mr. Obama commuted the sentences of eight drug offenders, and in March he followed up with 22 more. If he accepts most of the latest applications sent to the White House, some officials said it would probably double that last batch of 22, exceeding the 36 commutations Mr. Clinton issued at one time on his last day in office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among those Mr. Obama granted clemency in March were eight prisoners serving life sentences for crimes like possession with intent to distribute cocaine, growing more than 1,000 marijuana plants or possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

Mr. Obama signed letters to the recipients explaining that they had demonstrated the potential to turn their lives around. “By doing so, you will affect not only your own life, but those close to you,” he wrote. “You will also influence, through your example, the possibility that others in your circumstances get their own second chance in the future.

“I believe in your ability to prove the doubters wrong,” he added. “So good luck, and Godspeed.”

Despair and Anger as Puert o Ricans Cope With Debt Crisis // NYT // Lizette Alvarez – July 3, 2015

It’s the lunch hour at Baker’s Bakery, a fixture in Río Piedras, one of Puerto Rico’s oldest neighborhoods, but the bustle at the counter is long gone. The front door opens and shuts only a few times an hour as customers, holding tighter than ever to their money, judiciously pick up some sugar-sprinkled pastries and a café con leche.

On the first day of the new sales tax, which jumped to 11.5 percent from 7 percent, the government’s latest rummage for more revenue, Puerto Rico’s malaise was unmistakable.

“People don’t even answer you when you tell them, ‘Buenos dias,’ ” said Ibrahim Baker, 55, on Wednesday as he stood at the cash register of the bakery he has owned for 25 years. “Everyone is depressed.”

After nearly a decade of recession, Puerto Rico’s government says it cannot pay its $73 billion debt much longer. Gov. Alejandro García Padilla warns that more austerity is on the way, a necessity for an island now working feverishly to rescue itself. With so many bracing for another slide toward the bottom, the sense of despair grows more palpable by the day.

“So many people are leaving you can’t even find suitcases,” said Erica Lebrón, 30, as she sat outside a housing project bodega.

Before long, Puerto Ricans will face more tax increases — the next one is in October. Next on the list of anticipated measures, these for government workers, are fewer vacations, overtime hours and paid sick days. Others in Puerto Rico may face cuts in health care benefits and even bus routes, all changes that economic advisers say should be made to jump-start the economy.

People ricochet from anger to resignation back to anger again. Along San Juan’s colonial-era streets, in homes and shops, Puerto Ricans blame the government for the economic debacle. Election after election, they say, political leaders took the easy way out, spending more than they had, borrowing to prop up the budget, pointing fingers at one another and failing to own up to reality.

“It’s very, very, very worrisome,” said Mr. Baker, who added that he wanted the federal government to oversee the rescue plan because “in the hands of Puerto Rico’s politicians, this will never get better.”

For Mr. Baker, each year has been worse than the one before. He first opened his business here 25 years ago, not too far from the University of Puerto Rico. At one time, 23 employees served up pasteles and tortas. Now he has one worker, and his daughter, a recent college graduate who cannot find a job, also works behind the counter. Sales have plummeted 50 percent and, over the years, he has been forced to close two other businesses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Taxes continue to go up. But so do other costs. Living on an island, many business owners must ship their goods in from a mainland port, already a costly proposition. But a 1920 law, the Jones Act, which requires Puerto Rico to receive its shipments from the United States on American-built ships with mainly American crews, makes the cost of transporting goods even more expensive. Recently, it got costlier, Mr. Baker said.

Now there is a chorus of calls for Congress to relax the law as it relates to Puerto Rico. And some powerful Democrats are rallying behind the idea of granting Puerto Rico, a commonwealth, the ability to file bankruptcy for some of its debt-laden agencies.

“I have to pass some of these costs on to customers,” Mr. Baker lamented, a tray of bread at the ready and an espresso machine churning in the background. For example, the price of ham, he said, recently increased for him to $2.39 a pound from $1.19 a pound because of shipping costs. “So we have fewer customers. Some months nothing is left over for us after we have paid the bills.”

The high cost of electricity and water in Puerto Rico also make running his bakery, and paying his bills at home, all the harder. “I am stuck here because I have no alternatives,” he said. “I don’t have the opportunity now to even try.”

Many others in Puerto Rico, including a stream of professionals and middle-class workers, have sought alternatives. They have moved to the mainland for jobs and better prospects. Over the past decade, Puerto Rico has lost more than 5 percent of its population, which now numbers 3.6 million, according to a New York Federal Reserve report. An additional 250,000 people are expected to leave by 2020, according to the Puerto Rico Planning Board.

This year, the government closed dozens of schools across the island. About 40 percent of the island’s municipalities now have more old people than children, which means fewer workers in the pipeline and a greater need for benefits like Medicare.

A few blocks from the bakery, Paseo de Diego, a pedestrian corridor once buzzing with shops and shoppers, sits nearly empty. Store after store has closed, their metal grates covered in graffiti, except for a stretch near a busy market.

With his hats for sale on a display on the grates of a closed store along the Paseo, José Vasquez Torres, 67, said business was more than slow. “I’ve been here since 6 a.m. and not sold a single hat.”

Sitting on a folding chair next to the hats, his partner, María L. Luyando Hernandez, 62, held a thick sheaf of papers. Even a business as small and mobile as this one, she said, requires paperwork, payments and permits.

“These are all the papers we have to fill out to sell hats here,” she said. The couple owe $461 for the permit but they do not have the money. Not too long ago, the cost of a permit, Ms. Luyando said, was $21. Some sellers were able to take out loans at inexpensive interest rates to keep their businesses going, but Mr. Vasquez said he did not qualify because he had failed to pay his phone bill.

Despite a growing stack of unpaid bills, the couple manage to get by, Ms. Luyando said, because they live in affordable Section 8 housing — a small one-bedroom apartment nearby — and receive food stamps.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We are behind,” she said, “we are always behind.”

Far more people use food stamps here — 35 percent — than on the United States mainland, a reflection of Puerto Rico’s poverty rate of 41 percent, nearly double that of the poorest state, Mississippi. And about 60 percent are enrolled in Medicaid or some form of Medicare.

A health care crisis now looms. The federal government plans to cut Medicare Advantage, a popular private program run with Medicare funds, by 11 percent next year, a reduction that has already triggered rallies and protest.

Angel Ramon Rivera, 57, a friend of Mr. Vasquez, the hat seller, recently received some training as a sound engineer and is working as a D.J., charging small amounts because no one can afford more. Like many in Puerto Rico, he is part of the underground economy, which makes it easier for him to do business but harder for the government to collect taxes. But the work is sporadic and he, too, collects food stamps. He is saving his money to get out of Puerto Rico.

As he talks, his anger bubbles up. “They want us to pay for their mistakes,” Mr. Rivera said, of the lawmakers. “This is not our fault. And they shouldn’t raise taxes on the rich, either. It’s not their fault. It’s the fault of the legislature.”

Mercedes Martinez, the new head of the Teachers Federation of Puerto Rico, said the deepening crisis and calls for more austerity will once again hit the working class.

“We all have to sacrifice but workers have already sacrificed too much,” she said of the sales tax, layoffs and pension cuts. “We are not willing to make one more sacrifice. The ones who need to sacrifice are the people who created this.”

“We will throw ourselves into the streets, if we have to,” she added.

Leaning against a lamppost near the Paseo, his measuring tape around his neck, Porfirio Guerrero, 61, said he feels drained.

Sastrería Pachín, the tailor shop he owns, used to offer him a good life. Now he lists his troubles in numbers: His water bill, made worse by a drought here, has gone up to $64 a month from $21, and he barely uses water. Thirty stores on his street have closed in the past 10 years or so. It is 11:30 a.m. and not one customer has stopped in.

“Before, I went to the movies, I drank some beers with friends,” he said. “Now I go from the business to my home. That’s it. It’s suffocating.”

He arrived here from the Dominican Republic 28 years ago — “a lifetime ago” — and worked hard to build a life. He succeeded, against hard odds, not always easy for Dominicans, who sometimes face discrimination here.

“I guess the government thinks that because we have jobs, we are fine,” Mr. Guerrero said. It’s not that simple, he added, gesturing toward the empty street. “I just look down there and want to cry. We feel like we are a forgotten people in a forgotten land.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama to meet with leader of Vietnam's Communist Party at the White House // WaPo // David Nakamura – July 3, 2015

President Obama on Tuesday will meet with the general secretary of Vietnam's Communist Party, the first such visit at the White House since the two countries normalized relations two decades ago.

Obama and Nguyen Phu Trong are expected to discuss a range of issues, including the 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade accord, bilateral defense cooperation and human rights, the White House said in a statement.

The meeting will mark a rare time that Obama has played host in the Oval Office to a foreign leader who is not the official head of state. Obama met with Vietnamese President Truong Tan Sang at the White House in 2013, and he met with Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung during a regional summit in Burma last fall.

Administration officials said the meeting will provide a chance for Obama to engage directly with Trong, who is perhaps Vietnam's most powerful figure even though he does not have an official government position. Vietnam is among the nations negotiating the TPP trade pact with the United States, and over the past two years, Vietnam has been alarmed by China's maritime operations in the South China Sea.

U.S. officials see an opportunity to improve relations with Vietnam.

"We see the visit as an opportunity to continue to build on that positive momentum," a State Department official said this week during a background briefing for reporters. "Specifically, it's important for head of the party [to visit]. The party is the only party in Vietnam. It's hugely important in all decision-making, and it tends to be a more conservative element of Vietnamese leadership."

Human rights advocates have expressed alarm at Trong's visit, saying that nation has not made significant progress in releasing political prisoners and improving labor rights for workers.

There has been speculation among some foreign affairs experts in Washington that Obama could make his first visit to Vietnam this fall during his trip to Asia, but the White House has not confirmed such a visit.

INTERNATIONAL

ISIS Destroys More Artificats in Syria and Iraq // NYT // Rick Gladstone and Maher Samaan – July 3, 2015

Islamic State militants indulged in new public displays of artifact destruction this week, sledgehammering a half-dozen statues said to have been stolen from the ancient Syrian city of Palmyra.

The militants also broke up a hidden 2,000-year-old lion statue they discovered in a Palmyra museum garden and demolished a 13th-century tomb near the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk.

The destruction, publicized in photographs and statements posted by the Islamic State on social media and corroborated by officials and antiquities experts, underscored the risks to the archaeological heritage sites in Syria and Iraq, as well as the impunity of the militants now in command of large parts of both countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thursday, the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, said it had smashed at least six statues from Palmyra seized from a smuggler in an area of Aleppo controlled by the group's operatives in northern Syria.

Aleppo Fighting Flares as Syria Insurgents AttackJULY 3, 2015

It said the smuggler had been prosecuted by a Shariah court in the town of Manbij and punished with a public flogging. Photos posted by the Islamic State included a sledgehammer and statue remnants.

On Friday, Iraqi antiquities experts said the Islamic State had wrecked a tomb dating from the middle of the 13th century about seven miles west of Hawija, a town in Kirkuk Province. Before-and-after photographs showed the rubble.

"This is a terrible and tragic addition to ISIS's long list of never-ending and incomprehensible destruction of some of Iraq's and Syria's most important historic monuments," said Ihsan Fethi, a heritage expert and member of the Iraqi Architects Society.

Dismissing international outrage over its pillaging of ancient treasures in the two countries, the Islamic State has said it regarded artifacts as sacrilegious vestiges that deserve to be obliterated. In propaganda videos and photos, the group has detailed the wreckage of a museum in Mosul, Iraq, and important archaeological sites in Nimrud, Hatra and Nineveh, Iraq.

On Thursday, Irina Bokova, the director general of Unesco, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, told a meeting in London that the antiquities destruction had "reached unprecedented levels in modern history."

In May, as Islamic State fighters encircled Palmyra in central Syria, antiquities officials there rushed to move or hide many its treasures. The city is known for its 2,000-year-old ruins.

Last month, the group blew up two historic tombs near Palmyra, online photographs showed. But Thursday was the first time that the Islamic State said it had destroyed Palmyra statues.

There also was speculation that Islamic State fighters might have posted photographs of fake statue remnants and sought to smuggle the real ones themselves.

The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, a British-based group with a network of monitors inside Syria, said its sources in Manbij, where the purported statue smuggler was punished, said the Islamic State had confiscated the statues "in preparation to sell them in one of the neighboring countries." The observatory's account could not be corroborated.

Syria's official news agency, which said at least eight plundered Palmyra statues had been confiscated by the Islamic State in Manbij, also reported the destruction of a famed 2,000-year-old statue in Palmyra on Thursday. Known as Allat God, the statue depicts a lion catching a deer.

The agency said that the statue, first discovered in 1977, had been hidden inside an iron box in a Palmyra museum garden for protection but that militants had discovered the hideaway.

A wave of recent attacks by Palestinians set Israelis on edge // WaPo // William Booth – July 3, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Monday, Maysoon Musa rose early for morning prayers, then helped harvest squash in the family fields. She acted “perfectly normal,” said her mother, who described her daughter as “just a quiet girl, as shy as a chicken.”

Then the 19-year-old university student went to Checkpoint 300 in Bethlehem, a busy, depressing turnstile through the high gray concrete wall that separates the Palestinian territory in the West Bank from Israel. There, according to Israeli authorities, Musa removed a curved dagger from her bag and then stabbed and wounded a female Israeli military police officer in the neck. The victim was Liron Yisraeli, also 19.

The assault, a few miles south of Jerusalem’s Old City, was one of seven major attacks against Israelis in the occupied West Bank and East Jerusalem over the past two weeks. The pace and mixed style of violence —- ambushes, stabbings, drive-by shootings — have broken a months-long period of relative calm and set many on edge.

There has also been violence from the Israeli side, including the fatal shooting Friday morning of a 17-year-old Palestinian who had thrown rocks at a senior military commander’s vehicle.

Israeli military and police — and ordinary Israelis and Palestinians — are now wondering: Is this another brief flare-up in the conflict or the beginning of a larger conflagration?

The first attack against Israelis occurred June 19 near a popular spring west of Ramallah and close to a Jewish settlement in the West Bank. An Arab assailant fatally shot an Israeli hiker and escaped.

Two days later, a Palestinian stabbed a border police officer at the Damascus Gate outside the Old City. The attacker was shot and wounded.

A few days passed, and then, at a checkpoint in the Jordan Valley, a Palestinian opened fire with a handgun at Israeli soldiers. He was shot dead.

Days later, a gunman fired multiple rounds into a car carrying four young Israelis near another Jewish settlement in the West Bank. They had just finished playing basketball. One of the Israelis was killed. The assailant escaped.

Israelis are especially anxious about whether the attacks are the work of organized cells directed by armed factions, such as the Islamist group Hamas, which controls the Gaza Strip and is present in the West Bank; or if the violence is being driven by “lone wolf” perpetrators who strike out for personal or political reasons, or both.

Was Musa recruited to a cell? Her attorney, Ameer Yasin, told The Washington Post that Musa confessed to Israel’s domestic intelligence agency that she came to the checkpoint to attack a soldier. The attorney said he did not know whether Musa acted alone. He said he was worried, though, about her mental state and had convinced the Israelis to allow a psychological evaluation.

Musa’s mother said her relatives don’t know what happened. Her family has nothing to do with politics, neighbors said. Musa’s mother said her daughter was engaged to be married — a date had been set for August and the wedding dress ordered. Musa studied English literature at a West Bank satellite of Al Quds University.

Ramadan connection?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The recent spate of attacks coincided with the start of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, when the devout fast during the day — forgoing food, water, cigarettes — and then celebrate with evening prayer and feasts after sundown.

“We don’t know, is it Ramadan? Or is it a strategic change?” Maj. Gen. Nitzan Alon, commander of the operations branch in the Israel Defense Forces, said in an interview.

“Under the surface, the temperature is very high,” Alon said. “We try to put the cover on the pot, but it is an unstable situation.”

Alon said the past decade of Israeli counterterrorism efforts, coupled with cooperation from Palestinian security forces, has crippled the organization of large-scale attacks from the West Bank. Alon conceded that it is difficult to detect small terror cells and almost impossible to predict when a Palestinian is going to decide to ram his vehicle into a group of police at a tram stop — a common strategy six months ago.

Early Friday, Palestinian Authority forces arrested more than 100 Hamas members in the West Bank who were planning on carrying out attacks, a Palestinian official told the Associated Press. It was biggest raid of its kind since 2007.

A spokesman for Palestinian security, Adnan Dameri, told the news agency: “We will not let Hamas undermine our security and draw our country to bloodshed. We will not let Hamas carry out attacks in the West Bank.”

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s new coalition government is howling for the military and police to take stronger action and reverse decisions to loosen travel restrictions to Jerusalem during Ramadan to allow Muslims from the West Bank and Gaza to visit al-Aqsa mosque in the Old City, the third holiest site in Islam.

“The terrorist organizations must receive the message that the blood of Israeli citizens, especially residents of Judea and Samaria, cannot be shed with impunity,” Israeli Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel told Netanyahu, using place names from the Hebrew Bible to refer to the West Bank.

“The month of Ramadan has become a holiday of sacrifice in which Jews are the victims,” he said.

Abbas silent

On Tuesday, Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Yaalon accused the Palestinian Authority of inciting the attacks, alleging that Palestinians spend the day watching anti-Israel programming on TV and then head out to kill civilians.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has not spoken about the recent spate of attacks. The Palestinian Authority, however, has countered that Israelis are partly responsible for the soaring tensions. Israeli troops have stepped up raids and arrests across the West Bank, Palestinian officials say.

However, Amos Yadlin, director of the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv and a retired Israeli general, said he believed the recent attacks on Israelis were the “work of an organized cell.”

“It is no longer just someone waking up in the morning, going to the mosque, hearing incitement and carrying out an attack," he said. "It is people working with guns; it is ambushes."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iran to US: Nuke deal could result in joint cooperation // AP // George Jahn and Matthew Lee – July 3, 2015

In a message to Washington, Iran's foreign minister on Friday called for an end to "coercion and pressure" at the nuclear talks, suggesting a deal acceptable to his country will open the door to cooperation on fighting the upsurge of Middle East extremism threatening both nations' interests.

Mohammad Javad Zarif did not mention the United States by name in his video message. But with the Iran six-power talks having devolved essentially into bilateral U.S.-Iran negotiations over the past year, his comments were clearly directed at the Americans, who have been the primary drivers of the crippling economic sanctions imposed on his country over its nuclear program.

Any deal would result in an end to the sanctions. But negotiations remain bogged down ahead of the extended July 7 target date for an agreement.

The West fears Iran could develop its nuclear program to make weapons while Iran insists it is only meant to generate power and for other peaceful uses. Suggesting that Islamic extremism is a far greater threat to the world than his country's atomic activities, Zarif called for an end to "unjust economic sanctions" and for the West to join Iran in common cause against "the growing menace of violent extremism and outright barbarism."

"The menace we're facing — and I say we, because no one is spared — is embodied by the hooded men who are ravaging the cradle of civilization," Zarif said. He called for realignment from Iran's nuclear activities, saying it was time to "open new horizons to address important, common challenges."

Zarif and U.S Secretary of State John Kerry have taken the lead in the negotiations. In comments echoed by Zarif ahead of their renewed meeting on Friday evening, Kerry said the talks "are making progress." But he also spoke of "some tough issues," telling reporters, "We have a lot of work to do."

The Obama administration says that at least part of the sanctions relief for Iran under any pact will depend on Iran's full cooperation with the U.N's International Atomic Energy Agency to probe allegations that Tehran worked secretly on atomic weapons. But hopes of progress any time soon on that issue dimmed Friday.

Yukiya Amano, head of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, said his meetings with Iranian President Hassan Rouhani resulted in a "better understanding on some ways forward," but that "more work will be needed." The formulation of his statement was similar to previous ones issued by the IAEA, which has struggled for nearly a decade to resolve its concerns.

Amano's trip Thursday to Tehran was significant because it represented his last chance to secure access and cooperation before the July 7 target date.

Rouhani also provided no hint of substantial progress. Iran has previously acknowledged some activities like experiments with detonators, but says those activities had no connection to exploding a nuclear device and were instead developed for industrial purposes.

Repeating the standard Iranian line, Rouhani said after meeting Amano that the agency now understands the "pointless allegations" are "baseless."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The issue was put on the IAEA front burner four years ago when the agency published an annex of 12 alleged activities it said pointed to nuclear weapons research and development by Iran.

A U.S. intelligence assessment published in 2007 raised similar allegations, but said the work ended early last decade. Iran says the suspicions are based on doctored intelligence from Israel, the United States and other adversaries.

The U.N. agency's investigation has gained even more significance as part of the overall nuclear talks.

Amano said he discussed his agency's monitoring of Iran's commitments under any deal. Backed by the U.S., the agency seeks pervasive oversight to ensure Tehran doesn't cheat.

But Iran rejects any extraordinary inspection rules.

Speaking to reporters in Austria's capital Thursday a senior Iranian official said the IAEA's standard rules governing access to government information, sites of interest and scientists should be sufficient to ensure that his country's program is peaceful.

Iran has committed to implementing the IAEA's "additional protocol" for inspections and monitoring as part of an accord. The protocol gives the IAEA expanded access to declared and potentially undeclared nuclear sites, and to the sensitive information of the more than 120 governments that accept its provisions.

But the rules don't guarantee monitors can enter any facility they want to and offer no specific guidance about sensitive military sites — an issue of particular interest with Iran, given the long-standing allegations of secret nuclear weapons work.

Iran's foreign minister: 'We have never been closer to a lasting outcome' // Politico // Jennifer Shutt and Nahal Toosi – July 3, 2015

Iran's foreign minister says he believes international negotiators are tantalizingly close to reaching a nuclear deal with his country, but warned that the U.S. and its partners must choose between coercion and agreement.

"At this eleventh hour, despite some differences that remain, we have never been closer to a lasting outcome," Javad Zarif said in a four-minute video posted Friday to YouTube. "But there is no guarantee."

His statement was recorded in Vienna, where he has been meeting with Secretary of State John Kerry with the hopes of reaching a deal that lifts sanctions on Iran in return for curbs on its nuclear program.

Negotiators unveiled a preliminary deal in April, but failed to meet a June 30 deadline for a final, comprehensive deal, so they extended the talks until Tuesday. The two sides have been trying to bridge gaps on issues such as the pace of sanctions relief and the amount of access the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency will have to Iranian sites.

In the video, which begins and ends with soft piano music, the U.S.-educated Zarif said "military and economic coercion" cannot "ensure submission." He also suggested that the U.S. and its partners came to the negotiating table because of Iran's fortitude, as opposed to Iran agreeing to talks due to years of sanctions that have crippled its economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I sense that my negotiating partners have recognized that coercion and pressure never lead to lasting solutions, but to more conflict and further hostility,” he said. “And now, they realize that the most indiscriminate and unjust economic sanctions against my country have achieved absolutely none of their declared objectives; but instead have harmed innocents and antagonized a peaceful and forgiving nation.”

Zarif also raised the possibility of future cooperation among the countries, including against the Sunni-extremist Islamic State terrorist group, which has grabbed large chunks of Iraq and Syria.

“The menace we’re facing – and I say we, because no one is spared – is embodied by the hooded men who are ravaging the cradle of civilization,” he said. “To deal with this new challenge new approaches are badly needed.”

The U.S. considers Iran a leading sponsor of terrorism, and has said that sanctions related to the Tehran’s links to terrorists will not be lifted as part of the nuclear deal. Iran has long insisted its nuclear program is purely peaceful, but the West suspects it is designed to make weapons.

Zarif wrapped up his remarks in the video with what apparently was supposed to be a note of inspiration, quoting the ancient Persian poet Ferdowsi: “Be relentless in striving for the cause of good. Bring the spring, you must. Banish the winter, you should.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Berning, Nick" <NBerning@foe.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/22/2008 4:14:53 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Full House GOP to push drilling at 1 p.m. rally tomorrow on Capitol steps

FYI … Various environmental groups are going to send people with signs to show up and counter this.

· On Wednesday, all House Republicans assemble on the West Front Steps at approximately 1pm to unveil our legislation and publicly demand the up-or-down vote the American people deserve.

MEMORANDUM

TO: House Republicans

FR: Republican Leader John Boehner
Republican Whip Roy Blunt Conference Chairman Adam Putnam
Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor

DA: July 22, 2008

RE: House Republicans demand a vote on American-made energy now

American families continue to be crushed by high gas prices, and they are looking for leadership from Washington. House Republicans have stepped forward with meaningful solutions that will increase the supply of American-made energy, lower gas prices and promote energy independence. For their part, all Democratic leaders have offered is the same empty rhetoric and failed policies that have resulted in $4 gas.

Over the last two months, House Republicans have proposed solution after legislative solution to America¹s energy crisis, including expanded deep water and Arctic coastal plain exploration, and increased investment in next-generation alternative and renewable energies. It is truly an ³all-of-the-above² energy strategy. House Republicans have aggressively carried this national dialogue forward and offered meaningful solutions that will lower gas prices. The American people are listening, and the plan is attracting bipartisan support in Congress.

Democrats in charge of Congress, however, are charting a very different course. While gas prices soar and Americans cry out for action, this Democratic Congress has refused to take meaningful action to help lower gas prices and promote energy independence, and it¹s on track to become the least productive Congress in 25 years. The American people are demanding action, and time is running short.

This week, House Republicans will introduce our ³all-of-the-above² energy plan in a single piece of legislation that increases the supply of American-made energy, improves conservation and efficiency, and promotes new and expanding technologies.

To increase the supply American-made energy in environmentally sound ways, the legislation will:

* Open our deep water ocean resources, which will provide an additional 3 million barrels of oil per day;
* Open the Arctic coastal plain, which will provide an additional 1 million barrels of oil per day; and
* Allow development of our nation¹s shale oil resources, which could provide an additional 2.5 million barrels of oil per day

To improve energy conservation and efficiency, the legislation will:

* Provide tax incentives for businesses and families that purchase more fuel efficient vehicles;
* Provide a monetary prize for being the first to develop an economically feasible, super-fuel-efficient vehicle (reaching 100 miles-per-gallon); and
* Provide tax incentives for businesses and homeowners who improve their energy efficiency.

To promote new and expanding energy technologies, the legislation will:

* Spur the development of alternative fuels, including through government contracting, the repeal of the "Section 526" prohibition on government purchasing of alternative energy and promoting coal-to-liquids technology.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Establishes a renewable energy trust fund using revenues generated by exploration in the deep ocean and in the Arctic coastal plain.
* Permanently extends the tax credit for alternative energy production, including wind, solar and hydrogen; and
* Eliminate barriers to the expansion of carbon-free nuclear power production.

This legislation will demonstrate to the world that America will no longer keep its rich energy resources under lock-and-key. It will be a landmark step toward energy independence, and it will make needed investments in the alternative fuels that will power our lives and our economy in the future.

Numerous independent polls show the American people strongly support this approach to our energy crisis. It would clearly garner the support of a bipartisan majority of Democrats and Republicans in Congress, and it is legislation that the President would sign into law. Yet House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-CA) continues to stand in the way of lower gas prices for struggling families and small businesses. When asked last week whether she would schedule a vote on meaningful legislation to increase American energy production, the Speaker told CNN, ³I have no plans to do so.²

The Democratic leadership in Congress is defying the will of the American people and a bipartisan majority in Congress. American families are suffering. Time is running short, and further inaction can no longer be tolerated.

House Republicans will stand together beginning today and demand that the Democratic leadership hold a vote on this legislation to increase American-made energy before Congress adjourns for the month of August. On Wednesday, all House Republicans assemble on the West Front Steps at approximately 1pm to unveil our legislation and publicly demand the up-or-down vote the American people deserve. You will be contacted shortly to become an original co-sponsor of this vital legislation.

We will use every option at our disposal to force a vote on the ³all of the above² energy plan. America¹s energy future should not be held hostage to the whims of radical special-interest groups that support higher gas prices.
If Speaker Pelosi and her liberal colleagues in the Democratic leadership continue to defy the will of the American people, they do so at their own peril.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "American Security Project" <info@americansecurityproject.org>
To: John <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 11/19/2015 7:02:25 AM
Subject: Latest News from the American Security Project

Check out all that's happening at ASP! View this email in your browser

November 19, 2015

Top Stories

Developing an Effective Anti-ISIS Strategy

The recent terror attacks in Paris have created renewed demand to develop a real strategy for defeating ISIS.

From Beirut to the Metrojet bombing over the Sinai, these attacks show spillover from the Syrian Civil War that threatens the livelihood of people far beyond Syria's borders.

Click here for more.

Climate Change, Paris, the rise of ISIS, and What "Causes" Terrorism

Facebook
Twitter
Website
YouTube
Google Plus

ASP in the News

BGen. Cheney Featured in National Defense Magazine
BGen. Stephen A. Cheney, National Defense Magazine

ASP's Christine Todd Whitman on Nuclear Energy
Christine Todd Whitman, The Wall Street Journal

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the past few days, there have been a number of discussion in the press around the country and around the world on the links between climate change and terrorism. Let us be clear – no act of terror is due to climate change, but climate change has helped to create the conditions from which terrorist groups can plot and plan.

Click here for more.

On Our Blog

Climate, Energy, and National Security

The Weekly Fusion: A Look at Current Advancements in Fusion Energy
Ricky Gandhi
The future of fusion is constantly being unfolded in front of our eyes, as every week there is some breakthrough in new technologies and designs in the nuclear fusion sector of energy. Since there is such a wealth of information, I have gathered and consolidated a list of articles geared toward the advancement of making fusion energy a reality, from within the past week.
Click here for more...

The Relationship Between Climate Change and Terrorism: Reigniting the Debate
Anil Powers
E&E published an article about the relationship between climate change and terrorism. In it, E&E reporter Jean Chemnick discussed the "rekindling of an old feud" regarding the dangers of climate change, renewed partisan pushback, and policy strategies.
Click here for more...

Want America to Remain Exceptional? Try Leading on Climate Change
American Security Project
Americans have always been a very patriotic people, and I am no exception. Having traveled to over 60 countries and done business in many, I am always excited to come back to what I consider to be the best place to live on the planet. My feelings are not unique. In a recent Pew Research Center Poll, 86% of Americans affirmed their belief that the United States either stands above all other countries in the world or is at least one of the greatest countries in the world. And if you follow the political campaigns of our current presidential nominees, you will regularly hear them state their belief in American Exceptionalism and their plan to make America even greater in the broader world context.
Click here for more...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GMOs Play a Key Role in Climate and National Security
Ricky Gandhi
Climate change has had notable impacts on our environment and national security, serving as a "threat multiplier," according to the Department of Defense. The argument goes that climate change can exacerbate existing conflict by making already-scarce resources ever scarcer, such as land and water.
Click here for more...

Israel's Energy Choice
Spencer Shweky
A few weeks ago Genie Energy, an American energy company, announced that it had found significant quantities of oil and gas in Israel's disputed Golan Heights territory. Since then, many have speculated that these new-found reserves may be large enough to eventually make Israel self-sufficient in energy. While this is an exciting prospect, the wisdom of drilling in what is nearly universally regarded as an occupied territory is debatable. Israel has other options, and it should take them.
Click here for more...

Nuclear Security

Who Wields Iranian Sanctions Authority?
Sam Hickey
On December 28, 1977, the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) was signed into law, which allows a president to intervene in any U.S. business transactions with a foreign entity if a state of emergency is declared. President Bill Clinton declared in Executive Order 12957 a state of "national emergency," on March 15, 1995, to prohibit certain transactions with Iran, and this state of emergency has been renewed every year since by a U.S. president. The Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996, later renamed the Iran Sanctions Act (ISA), was introduced "to deny Iran the ability to support acts of international terrorism and to fund the development and acquisition of weapons of mass destruction," and the act has been reproduced in various capacities every couple of years by executive orders and codified by Congress.
Click here for more...

American Competitiveness:

As it Faces a Commodity Slump, Africa Needs a People-Centered Economy
John Bugnacki
After a decade of unprecedented growth, African economies appear to be in trouble.The International Monetary Fund (IMF) is now forecasting an expansion of only 3.75% for the region during this year, down from 5.0% during 2014, and the economy of the southern African state of Zambia is among the worst affected.
Click here for more...

National Security Strategy

What Constitutes Credibility in US Public Diplomacy
Matthew Wallin
As discussion ensues over how to combat ISIS online or counter Russian propaganda, it's worth taking a look at the elements that lend to credible messaging. The importance of credibility cannot be underestimated, as it provides the initial basis by which members of a target audience decide to listen to one's message in the first place.
Click here for more...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran with Ambassador Thomas Pickering

Sam Hickey

On Monday November 2, 2015, Ambassador Thomas Pickering visited American University to address Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran. Ambassador Pickering has served as Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Russia, India, Israel, Nigeria, Jordan and El Salvador. He has also served as Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Oceans, Environmental and Scientific Affairs and as Special Assistant to Secretaries of State William P. Rogers and Henry A. Kissinger.

Click here for more...

Reality, Risk, and Potential: Managing Today's Conflicts

Sam Hickey

On Monday, October 26th at the Council on Foreign Relation's, Foreign Affairs and the International Crisis Group (ICG) in New York hosted an event on "Reality, Risk, and Potential: Managing Today's Conflicts." The event featured panels of experts consisting of think tank fellows, academics, journalists, and business professionals.

Click here for more...

Asymmetric Operations

Paris Terrorist Attacks Aftermath: The EU Mutual Defense Clause

Steffen Westerburger

Last weekend France – for the second time this year – was hit by a series of coordinated terrorist attacks on its capital. The iconic city of love once again found itself at the main stage of international terrorism. President Francois Hollande addressed a joint session of both houses of parliament in Versailles on Monday, November 16th. He did not mince words: 'France is at war'. An unexpected move followed, the French President announced that his country for the first time in history intended to invoke article 42.7 of the EU Lisbon Treaty – the EU Common Defense and Security Policy. This move gives us an interesting insight into France's foreign policy strategy.

Click here for more...

Iran's Close Relationship with Syria Hinders Negotiations with the US

Anil Powers

There appears to be no end in sight for the war in Syria. As ISIS continues its campaign of terror in the region, Russia and Iran increase their military support of the Assad regime, intensifying a conflict that has already affected millions of people. With no formal peace talks in the works, the United States is reaching out to Iran to negotiate a political solution, one in which the Assad regime is removed from power. But the most critical obstacle to this is Iran's unwillingness to part ways with President Bashar al-Assad.

Click here for more...

About the American Security Project

The American Security Project is a non-profit, nonpartisan public policy and research organization dedicated to fostering knowledge and understanding of a range of national security issues, promoting debate about the appropriate use of American power, and cultivating strategic responses to 21st century challenges.

American Security Project

1100 New York Avenue, NW • Suite 710W • Washington, DC 20005
Phone: 202.347.4267 | Fax: 202.470.6631
unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Terri D. Mansfield" <terribillionairs@aol.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/17/2015 10:30:23 PM
Subject: email for John Podesta c/o Eryn re Space Treaty (attached)
Attachments: TREATY August 2015 .docx
Talking Points JULY to update .docx

Dear John,

Because the War in Space race is heating up, I felt you should be aware of several factors as you and I schedule our Skype talk.

Remember, our nonviolent ETI from the contiguous universe are helping us bring zero point energy to Earth.
They will not tolerate any forms of military violence on Earth or in space.

The following information in italics was shared with me by my colleague Carol Rosin, who worked closely for several years with Wernher von Braun before his death.
Carol and I have worked on the Treaty on the Prevention of the Placement of Weapons in Outer Space, attached for your convenience.

NEW GREAT NEWS: Federal Minister for Planning, Development and Reforms Ahsan Iqbal proposed cooperation in space technology between Pakistan and China as part of the historic declaration, saying it will take the Pak-China relations to new heights. http://tribune.com.pk/story/937041/cooperation-20-mous-worth-2-billion-signed/ A consortium of 35 Chinese companies was also formed that will invest in Pakistan: Pakistan and China on Wednesday signed 20 memoranda of understanding (MoU) worth $2 billion...emphasis on sustainability

The Cosmic Consequences of Space Weapons: Why they Must be Banned to Preserve our Future
FULL ARTICLE: http://consciousreporter.com/global-agendas/treaty-ban-weapons-space-urgently-needed/

WAR IN SPACE...
War in space isn't considered fantasy anymore
http://www.aol.com/article/2015/08/12/war-in-space-isnt-considered-fantasy-anymore/21221875/

PREPARING FOR WAR IN SPACE (articles below):
http://www.outerplaces.com/science/item/9578-anti-satellite-missiles-and-international-tensions-see-us-china-and-russia-preparing-for-war-in-spaceAnti-

Satellite Missiles and International Tensions See US, China and Russia Preparing for War in Space

---

http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/war-in-space-may-be-closer-than-ever/??ftcamp=crm/email//nbe/FirstFTEurope/product

War in Space May Be Closer Than Ever
China, Russia and the U.S. are developing and testing controversial new capabilities to wage war in space despite their denial of such work
By Lee Billings | August 10, 2015

---

http://www.express.co.uk/news/world/597809/Anti-satellite-weapons-space-war-Earth-Russia-China-United-States

World War Three in SPACE? Fears over rise in anti-satellite weapons created by Russia

A HUGE rise in anti-satellite weapons being developed by world powers has sparked fears the West could soon be embroiled in a fully-fledged war with Russia and China in outer space.

War in space isn't considered fantasy anymore
http://www.aol.com/article/2015/08/12/war-in-space-isnt-considered-fantasy-anymore/21221875/

*We're arguably closer than ever to war in space. Most satellites orbiting Earth belong to the U.S., China and Russia. And recent tests of anti-satellite weapons don't exactly ease the scare factor.

It sounds like science fiction, but the potential for real-life star wars is real enough. It's just not new.
Fears of battles in space go back to the Cold War and several initiatives, like President Reagan's "Star Wars" missile-defense system.
Deputy Defense Secretary Robert Work spoke to Congress in June about the threat. He said during a speech the technology the U.S. developed during the Cold War allows it "to project more power, more precisely, more swiftly, at less cost."
Take a moment to think about everything satellites do. GPS, surveillance and communications all depend on them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And the Scientific American notes you can disable satellites without missiles. Simply spray-painting lenses or breaking antennas is enough.
President Obama requested $5 billion for space defense in the 2016 fiscal budget.
And a former Air Force officer told the Scientific American most of the United States' capabilities in space have been declassified to send a clear message: There are no rules for war in space.

Best regards,
Edgar
Edgar D. Mitchell, ScD
Apollo 14 astronaut
6th man to walk on the Moon
Zero Point Energy Consultant

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/11/2015 12:45:49 AM
Subject:	News Clips 5.11.15
Attachments:	H4A Clips 5.11.15.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 11, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday Hillary Clinton made Mother's Day phone calls to 5 campaign contest winners. The women were from Nevada, Iowa, Colorado, Washington state and Minnesota.

A Poll indicates that there is no clear Republican front-runner in the New Hampshire presidential nominating contest, while Hillary Clinton retains an overwhelming advantage among Democrats in the Granite State's first-in-the-nation primary.

Vox's Jonathan Allen released a profile on Jake Sullivan highlighting how he advised President Obama and now Hillary Clinton on foreign policy that Vox labels "hawkish". The New York Times released a profile of Tony Rodham highlighting his past and present political and business endeavors.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 3

New Hampshire Poll: Republican Field Tightens, Hillary Clinton Still Out in Front Among Democrats // Bloomberg // John McCormack - May 10, 2015 3

Meet the man behind hawkish Hillary Clinton's foreign policy // Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 11, 2015..... 5

Tony Rodham's Ties Invite Scrutiny for Hillary and Bill Clinton // NYT // Steve Eder - May 10, 2015..... 13

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 16

As Middle Class Fades, So Does Use of Term on Campaign Trail // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 11, 2015 16

Hillary Rodham Clinton keeping an eye on opponents // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – May 11, 2015 19

Tom Brady and Hillary Clinton are too big to nail // NY Post // Kyle Smith - May 10, 2015..... 22

Hillary Clinton Calls For Paid Family Leave On Mother's Day // PoliticsUSA // Jason Easley – May 10, 2015 24

Clinton calls Iowa mom for a Mother's Day surprise // Iowa Register //Ben Rogers – May 10, 2015..... 25

North Las Vegas woman gets Mother's Day surprise from Hillary Clinton // National Review // Laura Myers - May 10, 2015 25

Hillary Clinton's Top Five Clashes Over Secrecy // Long Island Press // Jeff Gurth – May 10, 2015..... 26

Hillary Clinton email case reopened by federal judge // Washington Times // Stephen Dinan – May 10, 2015 30

Hillary Clinton in Chinatown; spirituality at Stanford // SF Chronicle // Leah Garchik - May 10, 2015..... 32

Can Clinton pull off a hat-trick of Democrat wins? // BBC News // Nick Bryant – May 11, 2015..... 33

Hillary for New Hampshire open house grassroots event at The Met on Saturday // The Conway Daily Sun // Lloyd Jones - May 8, 2015 37

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's use of 'super PAC' pushes limits of campaign finance law // Sentinel Source // Evan Halper - May 8, 2015 38

The Clinton Foundation's Behind-the-Scenes Battle With a Charity Watchdog Group // NY Mag // Gabriel Sherman - May 10, 2015 39

Under pressure, Clinton Foundation's Canadian arm reveals 21 donors // McClatchy // Greg Gordon - May 10, 2015 42

For the Clintons, a big question: What to do with Bill? // WaPo // Phillip Rucker - May 10, 2015..... 44

Paul: Clinton made Libya a 'jihadist wonderland' // The Hill // Mark Hensch - May 10, 2015..... 48

Hillary's Immigration // Iowa Starting Line // Pat Rynard - May 10, 2015..... 49

If Clinton wins White House, an uncertain future awaits her family's charitable foundation // AP // Julie Pace – May 11, 2015 50

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 52

Sanders: I'm 'most progressive' member of Congress // The Hill // Mark Hensch – May 10, 2015..... 52

Why Bernie Sanders Thinks He Can Beat Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – May 10, 2015..... 53

Bernie Sanders: I can beat Hillary Clinton // CBS News // Rebecca Kaplan – May 10, 2015..... 54

Bernie Sanders pledges not to accept super PAC support // Washington Times // Jose A. DelReal – May 10, 2015 56

Bernie Sanders challenges Hillary Clinton on trade deal and Iraq war // The Guardian // Martin Pengelly – May 10, 2015 57

Bernie Sanders's presidential candidacy four decades in the making // Christian Science Monitor // Dave Gram - May 10, 2015 58

Bernie Sanders Says He Can Beat Hillary Clinton // Huffington Post // May 10, 2015..... 60

Warren-for-president push waning // Boston Herald // Hillary Chabot – May 11, 2015..... 61

GOP..... 62

For GOP, too much of a good thing? // CNN // Julian Zelizer – May 10, 2015..... 62

GOP Hopefuls Talk Tough on National Security // WSJ // Janet Hook - May 10, 2015..... 64

Carly Fiorina breaks with many in GOP on Obama's trade pitch // CNN // Eric Bradner – May 10, 2015.... 67

Carly Fiorina fires back at critics of 'Domaingate' // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – May 10, 2015..... 67

The Pentagon's Response to Ted Cruz Regarding Jade Helm 15 // Huffington Post // Jason Stanford – May 10, 2015 68

Mike Huckabee Defends Endorsement of Diabetes Product // First Draft –NYT // Nicholas Confessore – May 10, 2015 70

Mike Huckabee: Nothing wrong with diabetes infomercials // Politico // Eliza Collins – May 10, 2015..... 71

Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson May Play Key Roles in Republican Race // NYT // Albert Hunt – May 10, 2015 72

Lindsey Graham: Hillary Clinton is beatable, but GOP is getting 'creamed' at the polls by non-white voters // RawStory // Tom Boggioni – May 10, 2015 73

Rand Paul Courts San Francisco's Techies // BuzzFeed // Ellen Cushing – May 10, 2015..... 74

Rand Paul Talks About Appealing to Young People on Tech Issues // National Journal // Eric Garcia - May 10, 2015 75

Rand Paul Plays Down Comments on Military Exercise After Mockery // First Draft – NYT // Jeremy Peters – May 10, 2015 77

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillaryclinton.Net Redirects To Carly Fiorina Campaign Website // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer - May 10, 2015 77

Waiting for Jeb to jump // Politico // Glenn Thrush – May 10, 2015..... 78

Choices, choices: Republicans ponder crowded field // USA Today // David Jackson – May 10, 2015..... 82

Jeb Bush says he, Hillary Clinton would have backed Iraq invasion // Fox News // May 10, 2015..... 85

Can Rubio or Bush help Republicans finally win Latino vote in 2016? // LAT // Mark Z. Barabak - May 10, 2015 86

Why Carly Fiorina was fired, according to Carly Fiorina // MSNBC // Anna Brand - May 10, 2015..... 88

Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson May Play Key Roles in Republican Race // NYT // Al Hunt - May 10, 2015 89

Paul Tells Tech-Heavy Crowd He's Against NSA Data Collection // AP // Ellen Kickmeyer - May 10, 2015 91

Ben Carson outlines flat-tax proposal // POLITICO // Eliza Collins - May 10, 2015..... 92

In South Carolina, a Republican Scramble to Stand Out // AP // Bill Barrow and Mitch Weiss - May 10, 2015 93

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 94

Hillary Clinton Uses Mother's Day To Talk About Paid Family Leave // Jezebel // Stassa Edwardsd – May 10, 2015 95

How Hillary Is Winning // NYT // Frank Bruni - May 9, 2015..... 95

Clinton: Direct Evidence vs. Facts // WSJ // Mike Carroll – May 10, 2015..... 98

George Clooney gushes over Hillary Clinton and his new life with Amal // Woman's Day - May 11, 2015. 98

In Britain, an electoral earthquake shatters pre-election assumptions // WaPo // Dan Balz - May 10, 2015.. 100

TOP NEWS..... 100

Domestic..... 100

Jimmy Carter falls ill in Guyana, returns to U.S. early // LAT // Kurtis Lee - May 10, 2015..... 101

Networks Fret as Ad Dollars Flow to Digital Media // NYT // Emily Steel and Sydney Ember - May 10, 2015 101

Nuclear plant to clean up oil spill in Hudson River // USA Today // Matt Spillane - May 10, 2015..... 103

International..... 104

Saudi Arabia Says King Won't Attend Meetings in U.S. // NYT // Helene Cooper - May 10, 2015..... 104

Chasing a rainbow party // Economist // May 10, 2015..... 107

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

New Hampshire Poll: Republican Field Tightens, Hillary Clinton Still Out in Front Among Democrats // Bloomberg // John McCormack - May 10, 2015

There's no clear Republican front-runner in the New Hampshire presidential nominating contest, while Hillary Clinton retains an overwhelming advantage among Democrats in the Granite State's first-in-the-nation primary.

Clinton's advantage over her potential Republican rivals has narrowed, however, and the general election in the battleground state looks increasingly competitive, according to a new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm New Hampshire Poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll also shows that Senator Marco Rubio is rising while support for his fellow Floridian, former Governor Jeb Bush, has fallen off. Rubio and Bush both were the first choice of 11 percent of likely Republican primary voters in the poll, while Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky each scored 12 percent.

Clinton is the first choice of 62 percent of likely Democratic primary voters roughly nine months before the primary. That's her best showing since November and suggests a recent wave of influence-peddling allegations about her family's foundation as well as the controversy over her use of a private e-mail server while she was secretary of state haven't tarnished her with the party's base.

There are warning signs for Clinton in New Hampshire. Since the last poll in February, three of the top-polling Republican candidates—Bush, Paul, and Rubio—have moved into striking distance and are now within the poll's margin of error of tying her in hypothetical match-ups.

The poll, conducted May 2-6 by Washington-based Purple Insights, shows Bush and Rubio as Clinton's closest competitors in potential head-to-head contests. Both trail her by 2 percentage points. Paul is next, 3 percentage points behind her, followed by Walker, who trails Clinton by 6 points.

Clinton's closest New Hampshire primary competitor, Senator Bernie Sanders of neighboring Vermont, was the first choice of 18 percent of likely Democratic voters. Vice President Joe Biden was at 5 percent and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley at 3 percent. Neither Biden nor O'Malley have said they'll run.

“Clinton’s strength in the primary remains historic," said Purple Insights' Doug Usher. "But she’s facing the laws of political gravity among independent voters more quickly than her campaign might have hoped.”

Clinton's numbers with independent voters were destined to fall at some point, Usher said, as the campaign becomes more fully formed and intensely competitive.

Among independent general-election voters in New Hampshire, Clinton is tied or nearly tied with Bush, Paul and Rubio. She does better against Walker with this group, leading 42 percent to 36 percent.

Rubio, who announced his candidacy April 13, more than doubled his level of primary support since the poll's last sample, in February. Bush, who isn't expected to formally announce until June, dropped five percentage points, his lowest level since the poll started tracking the state's voters in November.

Poll respondent Stephanie Korb, 57, a Republican dental assistant from Belmont, N.H., said she is leaning toward Rubio.

“He seems like a less offensive choice than the others,” she said. “I want to hear what the candidates want to do to turn this country around and you're not hearing that.”

Support for Paul and Walker have remained steady since February. Paul has formally announced his candidacy, while Walker is expected to hold off until June or later.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump was selected by 8 percent of likely primary voters—up 5 percentage points from February—followed by 7 percent for New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, 6 percent for Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, 5 percent for retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, 4 percent for former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, and 3 percent for former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina.

Scoring 1 percent were former Texas Governor Rick Perry, Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, former Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, and Ohio Governor John Kasich, none of whom have formally announced bids.

Walker does best when first and second choices are combined, a positive sign for his prospects in the state. He's backed by 24 percent in that case, followed by 21 percent for Bush and Paul and 20 percent for Rubio.

“The Republican primary remains as wide open as ever, and there are no signs here that any candidate has a clear route to winning in New Hampshire,” Usher said.

Part of Paul's strength is his ability to attract independent voters, a key group especially in New Hampshire, where they can vote in partisan primaries. He's supported by 18 percent of independents who said they were likely to vote in the Republican primary, easily the most of anyone in the field. That means he's going to want to see the state's Democratic primary remain a lopsided affair, prompting independents to stick with the action on the Republican side and continue to support him.

Bush is relatively weak among independents. While drawing support from 15 percent of Republicans, he has the backing of just 6 percent of independents. That's a potential problem for Bush, especially if he runs poorly in the Iowa caucuses set for the week before New Hampshire's primary. A Quinnipiac University poll released last week showed Bush in 7th place in Iowa, so he might need a top finish in New Hampshire to rebound.

Fred McGarry, 69, a semi-retired engineer from Deerfield, N.H., said he's leaning toward Bush, although the moderate Republican said he wishes he had other choices.

“I'd be happier if his last name wasn't Bush,” McGarry said. “All the others are too far to the right for me and my guess is that some of them will play well in the strongly red states, but not get elected nationwide.”

The poll shows gender differences developing among likely Republican primary voters. Paul does twice as well among men as he does among women, while Rubio does slightly better with women than men. Walker also does slightly better among men. Bush performed equally well among both genders.

“Walker has got a lot of good credibility and his conservative vocabulary is excellent,” said John Van Uden, 79, a retired manager for a farm equipment company who lives in Bedford, N.H. “He knows what he's talking about from his experience as a governor.”

And New Hampshire voters aren't convinced that the next president will be named either Bush or Clinton. Asked to choose which of the two would be the next president, a third of New Hampshire's likely general-election voters said Clinton, 27 percent didn't venture a guess, 22 percent said someone else, and 18 percent said Bush.

Among Republican primary voters, 31 percent say they think another Bush will move into the White House in 2017, while 34 percent say someone else, 24 percent said they're not sure, and 10 percent said Clinton.

The poll included 500 general-election voters as well as over-samples to have 400 Republican primary voters and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

400 Democratic primary voters. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points on general-election questions and plus or minus 4.9 percentage points on primary election questions.

Meet the man behind hawkish Hillary Clinton's foreign policy // Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 11, 2015

In late 2010, Tom Nides sat down for lunch with the throwback diplomat Richard Holbrooke on the second floor of Kinkead's, a legendary seafood restaurant near the State Department's headquarters in the Foggy Bottom section of Washington.

Nides had just been nominated to succeed Jack Lew as deputy secretary of state, and Holbrooke, who was serving as the US special representative for Afghanistan and Pakistan, wanted to give Nides the lay of the land. Nides thought that meant a status update on the region.

But Holbrooke, who paid attention as meticulously to the ups and downs of the Washington elite as he did to the twists and turns of international deal-making, intended to detail the department's power structure. As they ate, Holbrooke explained that Nides must acquaint himself with a singular force in Secretary Hillary Clinton's inner circle.

"Let me tell you, the only person and the one person you need to get to know, who is loved by everyone in the institution and gets things done, is Jake Sullivan," Holbrooke said.

The 38-year-old Sullivan catapulted through the ranks of the Democratic foreign policy establishment, from 2008 Clinton campaign aide to top policy hand at State to national security adviser for Vice President Joe Biden. Now the blue-eyed, sandy-haired Minnesotan has come full circle, having been picked earlier this month for the delicate task of running the Clinton campaign's foreign policy, an area in which the candidate's hawkish instincts diverge from those of war-wary progressives.

For liberals hoping Clinton will undergo a left-oriented metamorphosis on foreign policy to match the economic and social policy transformations that have her sounding more and more like an Elizabeth Warren acolyte, Sullivan's selection will be a disappointment. He won't drag Clinton to the left — or anywhere else.

"He's in line with her," said Ben Rhodes, a deputy national security adviser to President Barack Obama. "On the spectrum of people in our administration, he tended to favor more assertive US engagement on issues" and "responses that would incorporate some military element." That included early advocacy for arming Syrian rebels when he worked for Clinton at State and the Ukrainian military when he was Biden's national security adviser.

"Reject cynicism. Reject certitude. And don't be a jerk."

Like Clinton, though, Sullivan is decidedly dedicated to the proposition that no ideology or solution fits every situation.

"Reject cynicism. Reject certitude. And don't be a jerk," he advised the University of Minnesota's public policy graduates in a 2013 address. "Now, when I say 'reject certitude,' I don't mean your core principles. You can and must be certain about those ... But in public policy, principles simply point the way — they do not provide specific answers about what to do in specific circumstances."

He and Clinton both subscribe to the non-philosophical school of so-called "smart power." A concept developed by Harvard professor and former Defense Department official Joseph Nye, smart power encompasses the use of both hard power favored by hawks (military threat, force, and sanctions) and the soft-power levers favored by foreign policy doves (foreign aid, forging cultural and economic bonds, and negotiation).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Jake was not the most experienced diplomat at the state department i could have chosen..."

In the confines of the national political debate, hard power and soft power are black-and-white choices. In the smart power construct, they are not at odds; they are complementary. And while Sullivan is more given to the use of force than many in the Obama administration, he's also shown a willingness to engage diplomatically with some of the toughest customers in the world.

He was one of a handful of Obama White House aides looped into the effort to reestablish ties US ties to Cuba. Before that, Clinton dispatched him to Oman in 2012 to begin negotiations with Iran over a possible deal to roll back economic sanctions on Tehran in exchange for restrictions on the country's nuclear enrichment program.

"Jake was not the most experienced diplomat at the State Department I could have chosen, but he was discreet and had my absolute confidence," Clinton wrote in her memoir Hard Choices. "His presence would send a powerful message that I was personally invested in this process."

"Ugh!"

As important as sharing Clinton's worldview, Sullivan's developed a role in her orbit as a solicitor, and distiller, of the best arguments on all sides of a debate, and as someone who is widely trusted as an honest broker among the sometimes warring factions of Hillaryland. Former Undersecretary of State Bob Hormats, who spent eight years working at the National Security Council in the 1960s and '70s, says Sullivan's approach is reminiscent of that of Brent Scowcroft, who served Presidents Gerald Ford and George H. W. Bush as national security adviser.

"He is known to have strong views but also was good at pulling together the views of people whose opinions he trusted"

When done well, the national security adviser's job is to collect the wisdom, insights, and policy preferences of the president's war Cabinet and present them with as little prejudice as possible. Sullivan's role on the campaign, like his role at State, is similar to that. There's no learning curve. His tendencies are her tendencies. Veteran Clinton foreign policy aides say he would be on the short list for the national security adviser post if she wins the presidency.

"He is known to have strong views but also was good at pulling together the views of people whose opinions he trusted and conveying those to the secretary so she could see different perspectives," Hormats said. "In many ways I think his temperament and his interlocutor role are similar to those of Brent Scowcroft, who was extremely knowledgeable and well-respected for these traits. ... And, like Jake, he stayed out of the limelight."

When I emailed Sullivan to tell him I was working on a profile of him, he replied in four characters:

"Ready to make commitments"

Sullivan, the second of what would become a set of five kids, was born in Burlington, Vermont, a few weeks after Jimmy Carter's 1976 election, and later moved to Minnesota. Until he was well into his 30s, he had only really observed one Democrat in the presidency: Bill Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At Minneapolis Southwest High School, Sullivan was a standout on the debate and quiz bowl teams, garnering "most likely to succeed" honors. He graduated from Yale in 1998, went to Oxford on a Rhodes scholarship, and then returned to Yale for law school.

That's where he first met Harold Koh, the renowned human-rights lawyer and international law expert.

Koh, who would go on to become dean of the law school and then serve as Clinton's top lawyer at State, recalls Sullivan volunteering to help with the legwork on an amicus brief for the Supreme Court in the landmark case Lawrence v. Texas. The case looked like it could be a watershed moment for the attainment — or rejection — of civil rights for the gay and lesbian community. Sullivan felt it was important to push that needle forward.

Yale's role brought together Sullivan's values on a domestic policy matter with his interest in international law. His desire to jump into the fray showed he was "ready to make commitments" to social justice issues, Koh said. It was also a sign that he shares Clinton's view that domestic policy is a factor that affects America's ability to lead abroad.

In the brief, Koh and colleagues argued that the Supreme Court should weigh the conclusions of foreign and international courts in determining whether a Texas statute banning same-sex sodomy violated the Constitution. The 6-3 majority opinion overturning the Texas law noted, "Other nations, too, have taken action consistent with an affirmation of the protected right of homosexual adults to engage in intimate, consensual conduct." Sullivan would go on to clerk for Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer, who sided with the majority in the Lawrence case.

Years later, when Koh and Sullivan worked together as top State advisers, Clinton delivered a speech in Geneva in which she equated gay rights and human rights, a formulation designed to signal that the US would judge foreign countries' human rights records in part on how they treated members of the LGBT community.

"I speak about this subject knowing that my own country's record on human rights for gay people is far from perfect," Clinton said. "So we, like all nations, have more work to do to protect human rights at home."

When Sullivan left Biden's office last year, he went back to Yale to be close to his fiancée, Maggie Goodlander, a former adviser to Senators Joe Lieberman and John McCain, who is pursuing a law degree. In New Haven, he and Koh co-taught a class on foreign policy and law, where Sullivan pushed students to deliver debate-style arguments and then critiqued them to show how they could be sharper.

Like Clinton, another Yale-trained lawyer, Sullivan simply loves assessing the arguments, Koh said.

Winning friends and influencing Obama

Sullivan prepped Clinton for her 2008 debates with Obama and other Democrats. He did such a good job that, after the primary, Obama's team borrowed him from Clinton to help the future president get ready for his face-offs with Republican nominee John McCain.

When Obama won the White House, Sullivan told friends he planned to head home to Minnesota, where he wanted to practice law and eventually run for office — possibly then–Rep. Michele Bachmann's House seat. Clinton changed that arc by offering him a newly created job as her deputy chief of staff for policy at the State Department. He was 32 when he was sworn in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He quickly accumulated influence within the department, becoming Clinton's right hand in formulating policy, conducting diplomacy, writing speeches, and, at times, dealing with the media. Colleagues say he showed a unique ability to dive into and out of issues, and to move from the crisis of the moment to long-term planning. And, of course, he had an uncanny knack for knowing what Clinton would want done.

A wee-hours reader and emailer, Sullivan developed a reputation for cutting through bureaucratic thickets to get decisions quickly on even minor items. That helped him suck up turf and authority at State, where he was eventually given additional duties as the head of the department's in-house strategic think tank, the Office of Policy Planning.

Perhaps most impressive, though, is the way he earned the trust of both Clinton and Obama’s foreign policy team at a time when the two camps were still feeling each other out. Sullivan formed a bond with two of Obama’s national security aides, Denis McDonough and Ben Rhodes, often channeling the view of the White House within the State Department.

Though he gained notoriety with conservatives for being part of the email chain on Benghazi talking points, the truth is that he was in near-constant communication with the White House on all manner of issues for four years.

For example, when Clinton accused Pakistan of harboring Osama bin Laden in 2009, Sullivan quickly reached out to see if Obama’s aides wanted her to walk it back. The answer: double down. The close contact on even minor issues reduced the real and inevitable tension between Obama and Clinton camps that had fought bitterly over the Democratic nomination and didn't always see eye to eye on foreign policy matters.

Sullivan, unlike the vast majority of Clintonworld, had formed relationships with Obama's team during the 2008 general election campaign. That's one reason he became a go-to resource for the White House. The other: he was one-stop shopping on policy, diplomacy, and communication.

"Jake did everything for Secretary Clinton," Rhodes said.

In another episode in 2009, Sullivan took up the White House's cause in pushing for the ouster of Jared Cohen, a member of the Policy Planning Office staff who asked Twitter founder Jack Dorsey to delay scheduled maintenance of the company's platform because members of the Iranian Green Movement relied on it to communicate.

Obama had just said the US wouldn’t interfere in Iran’s domestic politics, and Cohen’s intervention, which was leaked to the New York Times, made it look like the president wasn’t honoring that promise. From Sullivan's point of view, which matched that of the White House and some veteran diplomats, the story about Cohen's action could backfire on the Green Movement. The demonstrators had signaled they would lose credibility if fellow Iranians saw them as puppets of Washington.

Clinton had a different take on the matter, telling her top aides that Cohen’s effort was exactly what the US should be doing.

That episode in June 2009 was one of the rare occasions when Sullivan and Clinton diverged. He was at her elbow for nearly every stop on her marathon, four-year tour of the world. When he wasn't literally by her side, it was because he was representing her with foreign officials.

"When he shows up somewhere, they know he speaks for Hillary and he speaks to Hillary," Koh said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The cat's meow"

Often, a Washington staffer reflects one or two traits of his or her boss — or quickly learns to adopt them. Sullivan clearly reminds Clinton of herself: lawyerly, organized, detail-oriented, and capable of moving from issue to issue without losing his place. And, of course, his pragmatic streak on policy matches hers. He also shares a few of Bill Clinton's traits, most notably a rare likability.

"When Jake Sullivan first came to work for me, I told my husband about this incredibly bright rising star — Rhodes Scholar, Yale Law School — and my husband said, 'Well, if he ever learns to play the saxophone, watch out,'" Clinton once said, adding that when she traveled as secretary of state she talked to people all over the world who wanted to "meet a potential future president of the United States — and of course they mean Jake."

As Nides put it, "Hillary thinks he is the cat's meow."

While Sullivan has made a big name for himself in Washington over a short period of time, and is well-positioned to join a possible second Clinton administration in a powerful role, he often tells friends he wants to return home — at least for a while — and run for elective office.

That may be informed, in part, by his desire to be closer to his roots.

With one exception since 2001, Sullivan has traveled to the NCAA men's basketball Final Four city to meet up with his siblings. They show up, without tickets, and try to find their way into the arena, according to a friend. Another friend said growing up in a household full of smart kids has helped Sullivan keep an even keel in the choppy waters of Washington politics and international diplomacy.

Teammate of rivals

It was back to Minnesota that Sullivan planned to go when Clinton left the State Department in early 2013. He was finally going to set up that run for office. But he ended up staying in Washington for a job that would increase his value to Clinton as a foreign policy adviser and keep him in the middle of an issue — a possible nuclear deal with Iran — that presents tremendous risk to her in 2016.

Clinton had refused Obama's request to stay in her job, and the White House didn't want to lose Sullivan, too. The biggest job available was national security adviser to Biden.

Sullivan insisted that, once again, he had his heart set on going back home so he could eventually come back to Washington as an elected official in his own right.

Obama sealed the deal by telling Sullivan, among other things, that he could be far more influential as Biden's national security adviser than as a junior member of Congress, according to a person familiar with their conversation. It was a line Sullivan had heard before, from Nides and others. Obama, who served less than one term in the Senate, knew from back-benching it on Capitol Hill.

And though he was assigned to the vice president's office, Sullivan understood the role would give him access to the president's daily briefing on intelligence and put him in the Situation Room for National Security Council meetings. In those ways, it represented an ideal training ground for becoming the president's national security adviser.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

White House officials say there was never any tension surrounding Sullivan's decision to work for Biden — a path Clinton encouraged him to follow — because everyone knew that if she ran for president, Sullivan would go with her. He had risen with her, and his views on US engagement with the world fit hers much better than Obama's or Biden's. Biden, for example, was against the raid that killed Osama bin Laden and striking Libya.

Sullivan participated in a series of meetings with Clinton and foreign officials in Paris and the Middle East in which the Libya coalition was stitched together. He handed her the phone when she asked Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, from a television greenroom in Tunisia, to abstain from a Security Council vote on Libya.

From the vice president's office, he continued to be part of the US negotiating team on an Iran deal that Republicans, and some Democrats, say places too much trust in Tehran. The administration believes it is the only path to ensuring Iran is unable to develop a nuclear weapon in short order. After Sullivan left the administration last year — for the teaching post at Yale rather than a run for Congress — he continued to participate in the P5+1 talks with Iran.

"You can't be effective that way"

A few weeks after Holbrooke advised Nides to develop a relationship with Sullivan, Holbrooke's heart burst in a meeting with his deputy Frank Ruggiero, Clinton, and Sullivan at the State Department. In typically animated fashion, he had been arguing against the administration's policy on dealing with the Taliban as Obama tried to wind down the war in Afghanistan.

In Holbrooke's view, it was worth sitting down with Taliban leaders to see if a deal could be struck in which they would sever their relations with al-Qaeda and live by the new constitution of Afghanistan. The White House position was that those concessions should be pre-conditions of negotiating with the Taliban. Holbrooke thought they should be pre-conditions for a deal, but not for a meeting. On that matter, Sullivan was with the White House.

As Holbrooke made his impassioned plea to Clinton, he heaved and turned red. His aorta had torn open. Sullivan and Ruggierio came to his aid and hustled him to a nearby elevator so he could be rushed to George Washington University's hospital. Holbrooke died a couple of days later.

He had once told a colleague, after finding himself talking to Sullivan when he called for Clinton, that Sullivan could someday be secretary of state.

Less than two years after Holbrooke's death, Sullivan was assigned to reach out to Iran about a possible nuclear deal, without apparent pre-condition. He continued to work on the developing deal even after he left Washington. The controversial premise on which it hinges — that the agreement can be so sound as to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon — is politically risky for Clinton.

She has left her options open, for the moment, saying last month that "diplomacy deserves a chance." Her top foreign policy aide's involvement in the negotiations may make it harder for her to distance herself from a deal, but she has not committed to supporting one.

Like Clinton, Sullivan, for better and worse, has shown situational flexibility in his approach to foreign policy. Often, there's no perfect choice on the table. And what works for one problem may not work for another.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The minute you start treating public policy problems like arithmetic problems, with an absolute right and an absolute wrong answer, quit," he told the Minnesota graduating class. "You can't be effective that way. In a world of imperfection, you will not find a flawless position, which means that whatever position you adopt will inevitably have weaknesses or blind spots. You should acknowledge them."

Tony Rodham's Ties Invite Scrutiny for Hillary and Bill Clinton // NYT // Steve Eder - May 10, 2015

The heavyset 60-year-old man who walked with a cane seemed an unlikely speaker at the glamorous launch party for a cosmetics company held in Santa Monica, Calif., in March.

But Tony Rodham appeared at ease among the special guests and well-heeled investors, offering them encouragement as well as an invitation.

"If there's anything I can ever do for any of you, let me know," Mr. Rodham said. "I'll be more than happy to do it."

A promotional video of the party that the cosmetics company later released identified the speaker as "the youngest brother of former first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton," a relationship that has been Mr. Rodham's calling card since the days of the Clinton White House.

On and off for two decades, the affable Mr. Rodham has tried to use his connections with his sister and his brother-in-law, former President Bill Clinton, to further a business career that has seen more failures than successes. The connections to the Clintons have given Mr. Rodham, a self-described "facilitator," a unique appeal and a range of opportunities, like addressing Chinese investor conferences and joining an advisory board of a company seeking permission to mine for gold in Haiti.

But his business dealings have often invited public scrutiny and uncomfortable questions for the Clintons as Mr. Rodham has cycled through a variety of ventures, leveraging his ties to them and sometimes directly seeking their help.

When Mr. Clinton worked as a co-chairman of Haiti's earthquake recovery commission, Mr. Rodham and his partners sought a $22 million deal to rebuild homes in the country. In court proceedings three years ago in an unrelated lawsuit, Mr. Rodham explained how "a guy in Haiti" had "donated" 10,000 acres of land to him and described how he had leaned on Mr. Clinton to get the rebuilding project funded amid bureaucratic delays.

"I deal through the Clinton Foundation. That gets me in touch with the Haitian officials," Mr. Rodham said, according to a transcript of his testimony. "I hound my brother-in-law, because it's his fund that we're going to get our money from. And he can't do it until the Haitian government does it.

"And he keeps telling me, 'Oh, it's going to happen tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow.' Well, tomorrow hasn't come yet."

Mr. Rodham's Haiti project never did happen. The Clinton Foundation said in a statement that it was not aware of Mr. Rodham's Haiti project and had no involvement in it. Mr. Clinton's office said he had not been involved in any of Mr. Rodham's pursuits in Haiti.

But Mr. Rodham was able to prevail on the former president for help in other ways.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Mr. Rodham was short on cash in 2010, Mr. Clinton helped get him a job for $72,000 a year raising investments in GreenTech Automotive, an electric car company then owned by Terry McAuliffe, an old friend of Mr. Clinton's and now the governor of Virginia.

"I was complaining to my brother-in-law I didn't have any money. And he asked McAuliffe to give me a job," Mr. Rodham said during the court proceedings, which were the result of a lawsuit over unpaid legal bills filed by his lawyer in a child support case.

A brother down on his luck seeking help from more successful siblings is a familiar story, and presidents and their families have hardly been immune from that sometimes uncomfortable situation. For the Clintons, Tony Rodham has not been the only source of embarrassment.

Mrs. Clinton's other brother, Hugh Rodham, stumbled through an unsuccessful campaign for the Senate in Florida during Mr. Clinton's first term. Roger Clinton, the former president's brother, served a year in federal prison on a cocaine distribution charge. And all three were involved in lobbying Mr. Clinton for pardons for their associates as he left office, prompting a congressional inquiry.

"They're all colorful," Rahm Emanuel, a former Clinton aide who later became mayor of Chicago, said in an interview in 2001. "They're all living large."

As Mrs. Clinton began her 2016 campaign for the presidency, Hugh Rodham and Roger Clinton had faded from public view, but Tony Rodham emerged as a controversial figure. A government investigation in March found that GreenTech, which sought green cards for its Chinese investors through an American government program, had received special treatment in the handling of its visa applications. The report described instances when Mr. McAuliffe and Mr. Rodham contacted an official from the Department of Homeland Security to complain about the pace of the visa process.

Mr. Rodham's unsuccessful pursuit of housing contracts in Haiti, which has not previously been reported, raised new questions.

As Mrs. Clinton campaigns, she speaks fondly of her brothers. At a stop in Iowa, she recalled them working together at her father's drapery business. Her official campaign biography prominently mentions them.

"She loves her family more than anything," said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Her brothers have always been there for her, and she will always be there for them. Each, though, have their own lives, their own jobs, their own ups and downs."

As the youngest of three children, Tony Rodham has lived in the shadow of his sister. He never finished college, and he worked at a variety of jobs — as a prison guard, private detective and at the Democratic National Committee — until after the Clintons were in the White House, when he became a consultant and deal broker. He was once married to Nicole Boxer, the daughter of Senator Barbara Boxer of California.

He lives with his second wife, Megan, and two young children in a large house on a hill in Vienna, Va., a suburb of Washington. He declined to speak to a reporter who went to his door one afternoon in April, and he did not respond to other messages seeking comment for this article.

But in a statement from Mr. Rodham passed on by the Clinton campaign, he said that he wanted to protect his family's privacy and that he would not engage in disputing claims about him, which he said he considered to be political attacks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His wife said the family was excited about Mrs. Clinton's campaign for president.

"The kids love their Aunt Hillary," she said. "We are supportive, and we are excited."

Mr. Rodham described his dire financial situation during the court proceedings in 2012. As a result of a series of failed business deals — including some in oil and gas, water, housing, tutoring and pharmaceuticals — he said he had not made a mortgage payment in 10 months and was fighting home foreclosure.

The Clintons, he said, had been generous, even paying for his son's schooling, but they were not going to give him more money. "Hillary and Bill are done," he said. "I mean, look at what they've done for me. They've given me money all the time."

Mr. Clinton's willingness to assist in getting him work with Mr. McAuliffe was helpful, Mr. Rodham said, but at $6,000 a month, it was not enough. "It's kind of like the job he got me a long time ago when I worked in the prison," he said.

Even more important, according to Mr. Rodham, was what he said was going to be Mr. Clinton's help on his Haiti rebuilding project. That project came about when Sheldon Drobny, an old friend, contacted Mr. Rodham about making a connection for a Chicago-area contractor, who wanted to become involved in building houses in Haiti.

"We were trying to help. Period," Mr. Drobny, a co-founder of Air America Radio, the former liberal talk network, said in a phone interview. He called the effort "humanitarian."

Mr. Drobny said he had connected with Mr. Rodham because of what he believed were his ties to the Clinton Foundation, which was playing a central role in the rebuilding efforts. Ultimately, he said, nothing happened "because the Haiti government was not cooperative."

The Clinton Foundation said in its statement that aside from supporting a housing exposition in Haiti, it had not been directly involved with any housing projects. The foundation also said Mr. Rodham's project had not been among the more than 300 submitted for consideration at the expo.

Mr. Rodham projected that he could make $1 million on the Haiti deal if it came to pass — enough money, he said in his court testimony, to take his family to Disney World and cover his debts, including his legal bills and his long overdue federal taxes.

Mr. Rodham eventually settled his bill with his former lawyer, Gwendolyn Jo M. Carlberg. Ms. Carlberg said in a phone interview that, despite her lawsuit, she did not have a negative view of Mr. Rodham. "I found a lot of good in Tony," she said.

He is still sought after for deals and personal appearances.

That was the case in March when Mr. Rodham attended the celebration of Wynn Beauty & Health in Santa Monica, which included a performance from an "American Idol" contestant. In addition to appearing in the promotional video, Mr. Rodham posed for at least a dozen photos.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But after a reporter contacted Wynn Beauty & Health, Mr. Rodham was removed from the video and photos of him disappeared from the company's Facebook page. In an email, the company said that Mr. Rodham was not involved in the business and that he had appeared at the celebration only as a longtime friend offering congratulations.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

As Middle Class Fades, So Does Use of Term on Campaign Trail // NYT // Amy Chozick – May 11, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton speaking last month with voters in Marshalltown, Iowa. She has made "everyday Americans" a focus of her campaign, staying away from the term "middle class."

Hillary Rodham Clinton calls them "everyday Americans." Scott Walker prefers "hardworking taxpayers." Rand Paul says he speaks for "people who work for the people who own businesses." Bernie Sanders talks about "ordinary Americans."

The once ubiquitous term "middle class" has gone conspicuously missing from the 2016 campaign trail, as candidates and their strategists grasp for new terms for an unsettled economic era. The phrase, long synonymous with the American dream, now evokes anxiety, an uncertain future and a lifestyle that is increasingly out of reach.

The move away from "middle class" is the rhetorical result of a critical shift: After three decades of income gains favoring the highest earners and job growth being concentrated at the bottom of the pay scale, the middle has for millions of families become a precarious place to be.

A social stratum that once signified a secure, aspirational lifestyle, with a house in the suburbs, children set to attend college, retirement savings in the bank and, maybe, an occasional trip to Disneyland now connotes fears about falling behind, sociologists, economists and political scientists say.

That unease spilled out during conversations with voters in focus groups convened by Democratic pollsters in recent months.

"The cultural consensus around what it mean to be 'middle class' — and that has very much been part of the national identity in the United States — is beginning to shift," said Sarah Elwood, a professor at the University of Wisconsin and an author of a paper about class identity that one Clinton adviser had studied.

Rising costs mean many families whose incomes fall in the middle of the national distribution can no longer afford the trappings of what was once associated with a middle-class lifestyle. That has made the term, political scientists say, lose its resonance.

"We have no collective language for talking about that condition," Dr. Elwood said.

The result is a presidential campaign in which every candidate desperately wants to appeal to middle-class Americans — broadly defined as working-age households with annual incomes of $35,000 to $100,000 — but does not know how to address them. That has led to some linguistic maneuvering.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Marco Rubio, a Florida Republican, has said what makes America unique are the “millions and millions of people who aren’t rich.” Mr. Sanders, an independent from Vermont who is seeking the Democratic nomination, has talked about “working families” and “people working full time.” Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, a Republican, has made “hardworking men and women across America” the focus of his message.

“It used to be ‘middle class’ represented everyone, actually or in their aspirations, but now it doesn’t feel as attainable,” said David Madland, managing director of economic policy at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank with close ties to the Clinton campaign. “You see politicians and others grasping for the right word to talk about a majority of Americans.”

Candidates realize they cannot win election without widespread appeal among the 51 percent of Americans who, according to Gallup, identify as middle or upper-middle class. That compares with an average of 60 percent who identified the same way in polls conducted from 2000 through 2008.

But sociologists say such surveys obscure how Americans feel about the characterization — and how much the middle class has shrunk. They call the new economy an “hourglass” with a concentration of wealth at the top and low-paying service jobs at the bottom and “a spectacular loss of median-wage jobs in the middle,” said William Julius Wilson, a sociologist and Harvard professor.

In surveys, more Americans still choose ‘middle class’ when asked which category they belong to, because they do not want to identify as rich or poor and because no new phrase exists to describe middle-income earners who view their social class as vulnerable. Working class, once associated with manufacturing jobs, now mostly connotes low-paying service jobs.

“People are looking for some way to say, ‘I recognize I’m a little below the middle,’” said Dennis Gilbert, a professor of sociology at Hamilton College who has published books on American class structure.

Before presidential campaigns tested replacement terms, academics started to adopt phrases like the “near poor” or “the sandwich generation.” After the Great Depression, “submerged middle class” became popular to describe families who could rise if aided by the New Deal.

“What do you call people who don’t have good jobs but who aren’t poor?” said Andrew J. Cherlin, a sociology professor at Johns Hopkins University and author of “Labor’s Love Lost,” about the rise and fall of working families.

The words may be endangered, but the idyllic image of the American middle class that took hold after World War II and became the backbone of everything from selling appliances to pitching presidential candidates still looms large on the campaign trail. When candidates talk about the middle class, they increasingly use the words as a nostalgic term, a reminder about what the American economy has been and what it could again become — with the right president, of course.

The 67-year-old Mrs. Clinton regularly walks down memory lane with stories about her middle-class upbringing in the suburbs of Chicago, invoking an era when parents who were not rich could raise a child who would become a senator, a secretary of state and a potential president.

In addition to her signature phrase, “everyday Americans,” Mrs. Clinton often says: “We need to make the middle class mean something again.” The line, her campaign said, was informed by the growing school of thought that in 2015, “middle class” makes a majority of voters more anxious than optimistic..

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In the 1960s, 'middle class' felt like it fit your lifestyle," said Felicia Wong, the president and chief executive of the Roosevelt Institute, a liberal think tank with ties to Mrs. Clinton's economic team.

Even if families fall in the middle in income distribution, they cannot afford many of the necessities, much less the luxuries, traditionally associated with being middle class, Ms. Wong said.

Household incomes for the middle class have been stagnant, while the costs of middle-class security — which economists define as child care, higher education, health care, housing and retirement — increased by more than $10,000 from 2000 to 2012, according to a Center for American Progress report, "Middle-Class Squeeze."

"If you're technically in the 50th percentile in income distribution but you can't afford to send your kids to college or take a vacation, are you middle class or not?" Ms. Wong said.

But skeptics say that "everyday Americans" and the other phrases candidates use to fill the void are overly vague and upbeat and obscure a bleak reality.

"If you had a candidate running around talking about the 'submerged middle class,' voters would run the other way," said Frank Levy, an economist and professor emeritus at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The phrases can be awkward, too, or slow to catch on. Mrs. Clinton has a mantra: "Everyday Americans need a champion." But when she visited a high school in Las Vegas last week to talk about immigration, she found the students had welcomed her with a handmade sign with her campaign slogan. They had botched the punctuation — and a bit of the meaning, though perhaps it still resonated. "Everyday, Americans need a champion," it read.

Hillary Rodham Clinton keeping an eye on opponents // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – May 11, 2015

WASHINGTON — Hillary Rodham Clinton is leaving nothing to chance this time around.

The Clinton presidential operation may look like a juggernaut from the outside, but her attempts to marshal early support in the home states of long shots are evidence that she feels the need to protect every flank, no matter how weak the opposition appears.

In Rhode Island, office space for a local Clinton campaign headquarters was identified early in the campaign; in Maryland, several lawmakers have already lent their names to Clinton for fund-raisers. And in Vermont, she moved quickly to sew up support.

These aren't states that typically get much attention from presidential candidates. But all three are home to underdogs who have announced, or are considering, their own bid for the Democratic Party's nomination. That makes the states turf Clinton can't ignore.

"She knows there is going to be a media onslaught against her," said Joe Paolino, a former Providence mayor who will be leasing her campaign office space in Providence. "She isn't taking anything for granted. This is not a walk in the park for her."

Eight years ago, Clinton also basked in the aura of inevitability only to be out-organized and out-campaigned by Barack Obama. Clinton's campaign has pledged that it will avoid mistakes from that race, so this time around her campaign is leaner. The staff is smaller. The offices are less lavish.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tyrone Gayle, a spokesman for the Clinton campaign, said the organization is making a concerted effort nationally. “Hillary Clinton is committed to earning every vote,” said Gayle in a statement.

Two of Clinton’s challengers are new to the Democratic Party, and therefore lack strong ties with the local party establishments. For Clinton, that made for easy endorsement pickings in Vermont, where Democratic Burlington Mayor Miro Weinberger revealed his support for her the same day that Bernie Sanders, an independent and former Burlington mayor, said he would challenge her for the Democratic nomination.

The Clinton campaign reached out to line up the endorsement before Sanders’ announcement, according to a source familiar with the conversation, reflecting an attention to detail. Vermont’s other senator, Patrick Leahy, is also backing Clinton.

Sanders’ camp brushed off the endorsements. “Would you rather have politicians or the people backing you?” said Sanders’ spokesman Michael Briggs.

Sanders has gone on to raise more than $3 million since he got in the race on April 30; mostly from small donations, according to his campaign. And he’s getting a close look from Iowa caucus-goers, according to a survey out last week. His support rose to 15 percent from zero in February, according to a poll by Quinnipiac University.

Much of it came from people in the liberal wing of the party who hoped Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren would jump into the race. She polled at 19 percent three months ago but was dropped from the more recent survey because she’s not running for president.

Another Democratic newcomer challenging Clinton is former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee. On April 9, he said he’d consider a presidential bid.

Within days, current Rhode Island Governor Gina Raimondo, a longtime Clinton supporter, told the Associated Press she wouldn’t back the home state candidate, in part because it is “time to put a mom in the White House.”

Then word leaked to the local press that Clinton was preparing to set up operations in the state — even open an office in Providence. Debbie Rich, a spokeswoman for Chafee, declined to comment on Clinton’s campaign activities, other than to point out that her campaign’s office address was publicized “right after” Chafee revealed he was considering running.

The Clinton campaign wouldn’t comment on the Rhode Island office and noted that the only official state headquarters to launch so far are in her home state of New York and in New Hampshire, where a Manchester operation opened last week.

Next month, Clinton will make an appearance in Rhode Island for fund-raiser at the home of loyalist Mark Weiner, said Paolino, who is helping to organize the event. He predicted the state’s “entire Democratic establishment” will be behind Clinton.

That’s not surprising, since Chafee was a Republican when he represented the state in the US Senate and an independent when he was elected governor in 2010.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perhaps the bigger threat to Clinton's nomination comes from Maryland, where the former governor, Martin O'Malley, has long been considering a presidential campaign. He, too, has seen Clinton incursions in his state.

Shortly after the November 2014 elections, in which O'Malley's chosen successor lost to a Republican, the Ready for Hillary super PAC scheduled two fund-raisers in his home state sponsored by a raft of Maryland politicians. The organizers wanted a strong showing of local officials backing Clinton.

"They were bombarding us with calls," said one Maryland lawmaker who was asked repeatedly to participate.

Maryland's Steny Hoyer, the House minority whip, tried to gin up support for a Clinton "grass-roots organizing meeting" held Saturday in Bethesda, O'Malley's childhood town.

The former governor's supporters say that the group backing Clinton represents "establishment" thinking. "It just points to the fact that O'Malley is new blood with new ideas and a 'can-do attitude' and the establishment doesn't normally endorse that," said Terry Lierman, a former Maryland Democratic Party chairman.

And the O'Malley camp is taking back some ground. Montgomery County Executive Isiah Leggett, who supported a Ready for Hillary fund-raiser last year, plans to hold a house party for O'Malley this weekend, according to a copy of the invitation.

Clinton will be trying to vacuum up cash in the state at the same time. A fund-raiser for her candidacy is set for next month, said former Maryland attorney general Doug Gansler, who has signed on with her as a "Hillstarter."

"She's going to have to raise a lot of money," he predicted.

Across the Potomac River, former Virginia senator Jim Webb is also considering a run for the White House and has been making stops in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Should he decide to take on Clinton, he, too, will have a formidable Clinton ally in his backyard: Virginia Governor Terry McAuliffe, a man who has been close to the Clintons since the 1990s.

Tom Brady and Hillary Clinton are too big to nail // NY Post // Kyle Smith - May 10, 2015

Where have we seen the Tom Brady scandal before?

A global celebrity appears almost certainly to be involved in a massive, possibly years-long web of corruption that makes many past events look suspicious. The central figure simply declines to provide evidence that might be damning (or exculpatory). And the supervising authority shrugs and says, "What can we do? The subject declined to cooperate." Because said supervising authority has deep business and personal ties to the subject it's supposed to be investigating.

Congratulations, Tom Brady and Hillary Clinton. They won't punish you much, if at all. They won't even really come after you. You're both too big to nail.

You both have ardent fans who won't believe the preponderance of evidence already available, aren't particularly interested in hearing more evidence and wouldn't change their minds even if shown a video of, say, Brady sticking a needle into a ball in the locker room or Hillary telling the Russians, "Just leave a bag of cash over there, and our uranium is yours."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Modal Trigger

No matter what they do wrong, fans will never punish Tom Brady or Hillary Clinton.

They both even have a daddy figure giving amazingly unconvincing and legalistic denials: Patriots owner Bob Kraft said of lawyer Ted Wells' Deflategate investigation, "To say we are disappointed in its findings, which do not include any incontrovertible or hard evidence of deliberate deflation of footballs at the AFC Championship Game, would be a gross understatement."

Hey, Bob, next time just say, "We didn't do it." You kind of sound like Bill Clinton defending Hillary: "There is no doubt in my mind that we have never done anything knowingly inappropriate in terms of taking money to influence any kind of American government policy."

Putting Brady on the bench for a couple of weeks wouldn't do anything to change the fact that the history of integrity of NFL games is in question.

The Patriots committed an outrageous act of cheating that should have vacated their AFC Championship win. Withdraw their Super Bowl title? They had no right to play in that game in the first place. Millions of dollars legally changed hands in the expectation that the NFL was maintaining integrity. It wasn't.

How deep and wide is the Patriots' cheating operation? How long was it underinflating footballs to make them easier to grip and less likely to be fumbled? The NFL doesn't know and doesn't want to find out.

It could order Brady (and his coaches, and everyone else connected with the Patriots) to turn over texts and phone records and email records. But it won't, just as the Obama administration won't force Hillary to hand over her server and other communications equipment for inspection and won't hire a special prosecutor to issue subpoenas and gather facts.

How deep and wide is the Patriots' cheating operation? How long was it underinflating footballs…? The NFL doesn't know and doesn't want to find out.

In each case, the so-called "supervisor" is simply a warm and friendly colleague who is in business with the target.

The NFL can't afford to have the full truth about Deflategate, and its place in the long history of Patriots cheating, known. If there is a text out there that conclusively damns Brady, then the league's greatest performer, its best team, and the most-watched broadcast in the history of television are all rendered part of a neo-Black Sox scandal. The league cannot afford to have its reputation so tarnished. Its interest is in doing the absolute minimum to make it appear that it did a thorough investigation, then put it all to bed as rapidly as possible. The TV networks that are in business with the NFL have the same interest.

Where is the NFL's curiosity about the fact that, since a rule change in 2006, allowed teams to manage the footballs used by their own quarterbacks, the Patriots have had an almost uncanny ability to prevent fumbles, and that their players fumble a lot more when wearing other uniforms? A statistician for FiveThirtyEight.com published this week a chart ("using both binomial and Poisson models") that put the odds against the Patriots' fumble rate occurring by chance at more than 10,000 to one. Those are roughly the same odds that anything important and football-related happens in the Patriots locker room without the knowledge of Bill Belichick.

Belichick was, of course, "cleared" by the report, which means no wrongdoing has been found. Why would it? If two locker-room flunkies take the fall, that would be ideal for the NFL.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Wells, the lawyer who issued the report, specializes in defending white-collar criminals. The NFL has been a client of his law firm for many years, and he has every incentive to make his client look good. Wells' partner Brad Karp, a co-author of the report, has long represented the NFL in its concussion litigation, involving hundreds of lawsuits and many, many billable hours for the Paul, Weiss Rifkind, Wharton and Garrison law firm. These men aren't prosecutors. They aren't disinterested outsiders. They're in business with the NFL.

But, hey, let's give the NFL a little credit. If it hired its own defense team to pretend to investigate itself, that's more than Hillary did.

Hillary Clinton Calls For Paid Family Leave On Mother's Day // PoliticsUSA // Jason Easley – May 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton's Mother's Day call for paid family leave illustrates why she is such a formidable presidential candidate.

Former Sec. of State Clinton said, "It is outrageous that America is the only country in the developed world that doesn't guarantee paid leave. I have this new granddaughter, and I want her to have every opportunity, but I want every child in our country to have every opportunity. We know that when women are strong families are strong. When families are strong countries are strong. What more can we do so that it isn't quite so hard? The answer is that we can do a lot if we do it together."

Hillary Clinton is redefining and taking back the word opportunity for Republicans. In the Republican vernacular, the term opportunity is something that is reserved for wealthy men and corporations. Clinton is defining opportunity as equality and fairness, not just for women, but for children and families.

Her view of opportunity is what makes Hillary Clinton the candidate who could be 2016's most pro-children and pro-family candidate for the White House. President Obama has fought hard for equal pay for women and paid family leave, but one gets the sense that it is Hillary Clinton who can achieve these goals.

It has been decades since the country has seen a candidate for president who so clearly knows who she is. Despite the media attacks and hand-wringing, there is a basic comfort that millions of voters already feel with Clinton. The contrast is best understood by watching a stampede of faceless and shapeless Republican candidates trying to bend themselves into what voters want.

When it comes to Hillary Clinton, it is all right there. Hillary Clinton presents a vision for the future that looks both attainable and easy to see.

Clinton calls Iowa mom for a Mother's Day surprise // Iowa Register //Ben Rogers – May 10, 2015

Kelly Drake received a phone call from a politician on Mother's Day that was different than most.

Not every Iowa mother gets to chat with a presidential candidate, after all.

Drake, 51, of Ankeny, won a contest put on by Democrat Hillary Clinton's campaign, where recipients received a phone call from the former secretary of state wishing them well on Mother's Day. Josh Shelledy, Drake's son, entered her in the drawing. He said he knew his mother was an avid supporter of Clinton, and he thought there was no better gift.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shelledy's hunch was spot-on.

"I thought it was amazing," Drake said. "I think a lot of her and she is an amazing person, and for her to wish me happy Mother's Day is awesome."

MORE: Complete coverage of Hillary Clinton

Drake said she was impressed with the sincerity of Clinton's phone call and the fact that she didn't talk about politics.

"I just thought she was a mother to a mother, and I thought that was great," Drake said.

Drake said it was the best Mother's Day gift she could have received.

North Las Vegas woman gets Mother's Day surprise from Hillary Clinton // National Review // Laura Myers - May 10, 2015

Amy Ponce of North Las Vegas got a Mother's Day surprise on Sunday — not breakfast in bed or a new pair of slippers — but a call from Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton who wished her "a happy day."

"At first I thought it was a joke," said Ponce, 37, whose 18-year-old son, Austin, won a campaign contest for his mother. Five winners received calls, including in Nevada, Iowa, Colorado, Washington state and Minnesota, the campaign said.

It was a special year for Clinton, too, her first as a grandmother.

"I've been a mother for more than 35 years now, and I'm still not sure how my mother did it," Clinton said in a statement. "She didn't always have an easy life, but she managed to remain strong and kind and always remember everyone who helped her."

Amy Ponce, who is married, also has a 12-year-old daughter. She said that until Clinton emerged on the political scene she hadn't been politically active.

In fact, she voted for the first time in 2008 — but for Clinton's Democratic rival, Barack Obama, who won millions of new voters. Perhaps it wasn't Clinton's time, but now Ponce said the former first lady and secretary of state appears to be a strong contender.

"I think we're leaning that way," to vote for Clinton, she said. "That would be real neat" to have the first female president. "We definitely would be voting Democratic."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about her previous voter apathy, Ponce said, “For me, it was probably a lack of time. And probably a lack of being educated enough on making the right decision.”

Ponce said the call with Clinton was short and sweet, at about 1:30 p.m. “It was something you don’t get a chance to do everyday,” she said.

Ponce has been paying close attention to some hot- button campaign issues, however. She’s a Patient Services Representative in a pediatrician’s office, giving her insight into how Obama’s Affordable Health Care Act is playing out.

“Definitely a good law, but a few flaws,” Ponce said. “I’ve heard from a lot of people personally that it still is not quite as affordable as they had anticipated.”

Austin Ponce appears to be the politician in the family. He said he’s looking forward to voting for the fist time in a presidential election in 2016 and he’s hoping to volunteer for the Clinton campaign as well.

He thanked his teacher Ms. Karlye Mull for encouraging him and said he’s taking advanced placement government classes with her this year.

“It really helps when you have a teacher who’s passionate about the subject,” Ponce said, adding he’ll keep his family involved, too.

Hillary Clinton’s Top Five Clashes Over Secrecy // Long Island Press // Jeff Gurth – May 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton at Book Revue

Hillary Clinton signing copies of her book "Hard Choices" on Wednesday Aug. 6, 2014 at the Book Revue in Huntington. (Spencer Rumsey/Long Island Press)

Back in April of 2007, when she was campaigning for the Democratic presidential nomination for the first time, then-Senator Hillary Clinton lashed out at the secrecy of the George W. Bush administration.

She told a New Hampshire audience that if elected she would implement a “plan to enhance accountability and transparency” and “to replace secrecy and mystery with openness.” One part of her plan: “It’s time our government went fully online as well.”

She lost her bid to be the Democratic presidential nominee. But 20 months later, before then-Illinois Sen. Barack Obama took that job and she became secretary of state, she set up a private computer server registered to her home in Chappaqua, N.Y., to handle all her official, as well as private, emails for the next four years. Her decision — a secret until earlier this year — impeded efforts by the press and others to review State Department actions.

Now it is Hillary Clinton’s record of transparency that has come under fire. At a press conference in March, she acknowledged that in retrospect “it would’ve been better for me to use two separate phones and two email accounts.” She has asked the State Department to release her official emails, a process that could take months.

Few public figures have been as scrutinized as Hillary Clinton. Sometimes her disclosures go beyond what is required, but she’s also racked up a reputation for secrecy that at times has returned to haunt her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are five examples covering the last two decades. Some are drawn from a 2007 book I did, with Don Van Natta Jr., entitled “Her Way: The Hopes and Ambitions of Hillary Rodham Clinton” (Little Brown & Co.). Clinton’s office didn’t respond to a request for comment.

1) 1992: The Commodity Trades

During Bill Clinton’s first run for the White House, his campaign declined to release all of the couple’s tax returns. Later it emerged that the campaign had weighed requests from the press and decided not to do so, because a few of the returns showed Hillary Clinton’s spectacular success in commodities trading, in which she made almost $100,000 from an initial investment of $1,000 in a matter of months, for a return of almost 10,000 percent. Hillary Clinton threatened a campaign lawyer who had access to the material with retribution if she released the data: “You’ll never work in Democratic politics again,” the lawyer, Loretta Lynch, says Clinton told her. It wasn’t until 1994, as the New York Times prepared to publish an article detailing the trades, that the Clintons made the returns public.

2) 1993: The Health Care Task Force

As First Lady, Clinton led a presidential task force to overhaul the U.S. health-care system. The group, which produced a 1,342-page bill that failed to win Congressional approval, came under intense criticism from lawmakers and interest groups for meeting behind closed doors. Several court challenges were brought in an attempt to open the process. Ultimately the courts provided a partial legal victory to the administration. Clinton later wrote she didn’t mind the criticism since she was “trying to do something important for people” but she acknowledged the failure was partially the result of her “own missteps” in “trying to do too much, too fast.”

3) 1994: Records from the Rose Law Firm

U.S. investigators in 1994 subpoenaed the First Lady’s billing records from her years at the Rose Firm in Little Rock, Arkansas, documents that had been also sought by reporters. A focus of their interest was her legal work for a failing savings and loan, but records of those billings weren’t found. Much later, Clinton’s long-time assistant, Carolyn Huber, said she found in the White House residence an additional box of records that contained the billing memos. They were turned over to the independent counsel in 1996. Clinton testified she had no knowledge of how the records wound up where they did.

4) 2006: The Energy Task Force

Late in her first term as U.S. senator from New York, Clinton set up an energy task force to help her work through the issue, deliver a major speech on the subject and prepare for a possible presidential run, participants in the task force told us for the book. They produced a 40-page report in April 2006. The whole project, including the existence of the group, its members and its work product was a secret, designed, participants said, to encourage frank discussions of the issue. The leader of the task force headed an investment firm with major holdings in the energy sector. Senators routinely get input from outsiders, and no law requires their disclosure, but a secret task force is unusual.

5) 2015: The Family Foundation

The Clinton family foundation, now called the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, made disclosures that exceed the legal requirements. Charities are not required to list donors, but as part of Clinton’s selection as secretary of state the foundation agreed to disclose the identity of contributors and restrict solicitations from foreign governments. Still, the information on the foundation’s website is less than full. Donors are identified but not the exact amount of each donation or the date of those contributions. Instead, donations fall under ranges and are listed cumulatively. The foundation did not announce that it started raising money from foreign governments after Hillary Clinton left office. But last month the Wall Street Journal pieced together some new foreign donations after the foundation's web site was updated. That article was the first in a spate of news accounts raising questions about foreign money coming into the Clinton network as she prepares a run for president. The foundation has said the donors are carefully vetted and their money goes to important charitable projects.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Julian Castro is 'only' veep prospect for top Clintonians, says source // Washington Times // Joseph Curl - May 10, 2015

ANALYSIS/OPINION:

Top members of Team Hillary are already pushing Julian Castro as her vice presidential nominee, with one source telling me last week that right now, there isn't even a second choice.

"There's only one person the top guys are looking at right now, and that's Julian," said the source, who is close to top Clinton officials. "They know the Republicans are making a big push this cycle for the Hispanic vote, so that makes Castro an easy pick — and an obvious pick."

The source said the Clintons still remember that Julian Castro, along with his brother, Joaquin, were early backers of Mrs. Clinton in her 2008 run, and the Clintons are known to pay back their friends, just as they do their foes.

Although Mrs. Clinton is far from clinching the Democratic nomination for president, her path is fairly uncluttered. So far, she faces a 73-year-old senator from Vermont and a one-time governor of Maryland. But the former is a socialist who longs for redistribution of wealth and the latter was once mayor of Baltimore, which imploded in race riots. Neither is seen as a serious threat.

Also in the wings is Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, but the Clinton source said the odds of Mrs. Clinton picking another woman for the ticket are "zero." The source said that also likely eliminates Wendy Davis, the liberal darling of Texas Democrats.

There are a few others that make the shortlist, according to several other top Democrats. Sen. Mark Warner might be able to secure Virginia, as could former Democratic National Committee Chairman Tim Kaine, both men being former governors of the commonwealth.

Jay Nixon, the governor of Missouri, is also mentioned, but the Clinton source laughed that idea off: "You think they'll really put out bumper stickers that say Clinton/Nixon? Good guy, but no chance."

And Evan Bayh, the longtime Indiana politician who served two terms in the Senate, also makes the shortlists of many, but he is a creature of Washington and some Clinton insiders say Mrs. Clinton is looking for an outsider, preferably from a state that isn't a solid Democratic stronghold.

That desire puts a few others in play, like retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who would allay some fears that Mrs. Clinton is weak on defense, and Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack, a former governor of Iowa, home of the first political caucuses of the 2016 campaign.

A new name is also floating around: Martin Heinrich, the 43-year-old senator from New Mexico. For the past several cycles, the Western state has been in play and, more important, his short time in Washington (just two years), along with his youth (Mrs. Clinton is 67) makes him a conceivable running mate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Others, like Charlie Crist of Florida or Vice President Joseph R. Biden, are nonstarters. And don't look for Mrs. Clinton to pick a former U.S. president — her husband. No chance.

That leaves Julian Castro at the top of the list. He, too, brings the bloom of youth: At just 40 years old, he's also highly accomplished — a two-term mayor of San Antonio (Democrats are making a play for Texas in 2016) and, most recently, President Obama's pick to be secretary of housing and urban development.

Interestingly, the Castro brothers — twins born to a single mother whose own mother had come across the Mexican border as a 6-year-old orphan — don't speak Spanish. That means at least three Republicans in the race — Sen. Ted Cruz, Sen. Marco Rubio and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush — will be the Spanish speakers, but not Mr. Castro.

Mr. Castro brings a slew of desirables. He has declared that "Joaquin and I got into Stanford [University] because of affirmative action," even though he said he scored just 1,210 on my SATs, "which was lower than the median matriculating student." Mrs. Clinton is planning to push affirmative action as a key campaign issue.

More, the Castro brothers are a rags-to-riches story — but always with the help of government, another key tenet of Mrs. Clinton's campaign. And Julian Castro has pushed gay issues throughout his career, an issue dear to Mrs. Clinton.

Julian Castro knows that his moment may soon arrive, but downplays the veep talk.

"At the moment I'm focusing on my role as HUD secretary," he told Buzzfeed. "At the right time later on down the road, I anticipate getting involved. It's clear both parties are going to speak to the Latino community in this cycle. What's also clear is only the Democratic Party has embraced policies that have improved the economic prospects for the Latino community," he said.

He's not a shoo-in, of course, and much will depend on how desperate Mrs. Clinton is a year from now. (Remember Sarah Palin?) But Mr. Castro delivers on all the big issues Mrs. Clinton hopes to hit hard in her campaign, and right now, he seems to be the only talk in Team Clinton Town.

Hillary Clinton email case reopened by federal judge // Washington Times // Stephen Dinan – May 10, 2015

Joint request to turn over messages agreed upon

A federal judge has reopened an open-records case trying to pry loose some of former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's emails, marking the first time a court has taken action on the email scandal.

Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed Friday to a joint request by the State Department and Judicial Watch, which sued in 2012 to get a look at some of Mrs. Clinton's documents concerning a public relations push.

Both sides agreed that the revelation that Mrs. Clinton had kept her own email server separate from the government, and exclusively used her own email account created on that server, meant that she had shielded her messages from valid open-records requests.

Now that she has belatedly turned some emails over, the government offered — and Judge Walton confirmed in his ruling — that the agency should search them all to see whether any should have been released to Judicial Watch.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is the first case that’s been reopened,” Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, said Friday. “It’s a significant development. It points to the fraud by this administration and Mrs. Clinton.”

Judicial Watch has filed a series of open-records requests seeking State Department emails and, when the administration failed to comply, has gone to court to force them. Just last week Judicial Watch filed a new batch of eight lawsuits trying to shake loose some of the secret emails, and said that was just the first round.

The State Department said it doesn’t comment on open-records lawsuits.

Publicly, the department has struggled to handle the inquiries over Mrs. Clinton’s emails.

Officials didn’t acknowledge that there were missing emails until prodded by the House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attack on the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi, Libya. After that prod, the department asked Mrs. Clinton to turn over emails that contained government business.

She provided about 30,000 emails, but said she discarded another 32,000 she deemed weren’t government business, and then wiped the server. She has refused requests by the Benghazi inquiry chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy, South Carolina Republican, to turn the server over to a neutral third party.

On Friday, Mr. Gowdy released an interim report detailing his first year of investigation, citing “obstacles and frustrations” in dealing with the administration. He said they have talked with new witnesses who hadn’t been interviewed by any other Benghazi probe, and had unearthed documents that haven’t been part of other investigations.

But he said Mrs. Clinton’s emails remain a large question mark, and the State Department still hasn’t turned over emails from her senior staff.

“The State Department has told the committee that it cannot certify that it has turned over all documents responsive to the committee’s request regarding the former secretary’s emails,” Mr. Gowdy said in his report.

Mr. Gowdy also hinted that Congress’s investigative powers may be limited when it comes to trying to force a president and his team to come clean.

“The legislative branch’s constitutional toolbox seems inadequate to uphold our task in seeking the truth,” Mr. Gowdy said, pointing to the administration’s unwillingness to serve subpoenas on itself, neutering much of Congress’s investigative power.

Mr. Fitton said that’s why his group’s lawsuits are so critical, saying Congress’s hands are tied and the Justice Department hasn’t committed to conduct an investigation of another part of the Obama administration.

“It’s going to be independent actions by JW at this point,” Mr. Fitton said. “This is how anything is going to break loose.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton in Chinatown; spirituality at Stanford // SF Chronicle // Leah Garchik - May 10, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton was in town for fundraisers, one at the Century Club, hosted by Susie Buell, and the other at the home of Tom and Kat Steyer. She also found time to talk about immigration with Democratic state Senate President Pro Tem Kevin de León, and urban issues with Mayor Ed Lee, who, as Carla Marinucci wrote, suggested they meet at the Red Blossom Tea Co.

•Tea house proprietor Alice Luong had met the mayor a couple of times, but didn't know until five minutes before he arrived that he'd be having tea there. "I really thought it was just the mayor coming to visit merchants in Chinatown, which he often does. We see him walking around." When Clinton arrived, "we were pretty ecstatic. ... I explained to Madam Secretary that this is how we brew tea, and when we were doing the tasting, she asked quite a lot of questions" about water temperature and tea varieties. "I assume she is a tea drinker," Luong said.

Lee's assistant paid for the Tasting Flight consumed by the mayor and the candidate, and "Madam Secretary's staff" bought some teas to take away. "I think Madam Secretary prefers a stronger, darker tea. We brewed a cup for her to take into the car."

As to the handle by which Luong repeatedly referred to Clinton, "I asked the assistant what I should call her. She's no longer a senator and she's so accomplished. The assistant said, 'Whatever you like.' But we're very Chinese, very traditional. We address her by her post."

•Fervent Clinton supporter Eleni Kounalakis, who'd been on Michael Krasny's "Forum" show that morning, talking about her book, "Madam Ambassador," attended the Buell event. She was surprised when Clinton greeted her with, "Eleni, I heard you on the radio this morning!" The candidate's either got an amazing ability to multitask or a very efficient staff.

•The Steyer event started at 11 in the morning. By 4 p.m., he was cool and composed, as though he'd had nothing else to do that day, giving a reading from Ezekiel at Stanford's Memorial Hall. And more about that below.

The Stanford event was the investiture of the Rev. Professor Jane Shaw as dean for religious life. Shaw, who got her doctorate at UC Berkeley, was at Oxford when she was hired as dean of Grace Cathedral, a job that brought her back to the Bay Area. At Stanford, she will teach in the department of religious studies as well as preside as dean, providing what Stanford President John Hennessy said was "ethical and spiritual leadership for the university."

The church, built in 1903, is filled with stained glass and curved wooden ornamentation; it feels warm, welcoming. Every aspect of the investiture ceremonies, which included multifaith prayers and music by the St. Lawrence String Quartet, seemed to flow from the passage read by Steyer, which refers to the possibility of giving new life to dry bones, that is, healing misery and renewing hope.

Shaw's friend Anna Deavere Smith delivered a sermon referring to Baltimore, her hometown, as a "city of dry bones. ... Everything is rubble now from the streets of my youth." Police, she said, have had to do the "dirtiest work of all," and now it is time for others to tackle poverty, despair, no matter how uncertain they are of solutions. "If we wait for clarity, it will never happen. 'Confidence,' I tell students, 'is overrated. Give doubt a try.'"

At Stanford, said Hennessy, "real smart and ethical people are working to solve the world's problems. ... Jane made us realize we need complex answers to complex questions." Then he draped around Shaw's neck a white silk scarf he had received from the Dalai Lama, and poof, she was thereby invested.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In another part of the program, undergrad Elizabeth Woodson had read from a Quaker text, proposing the goal of allowing “the stranger and the things we find strange, let themselves do and be who they are.” So after the ceremonies, when we went outside for drinks and cookies, including S-shaped ones covered with dyed red sugar, although I wondered if Berkeley foodies would stand for blue-dyed confections, I just let those cookies be what they were, and gobbled one right down.

And as Steyer and Woodson said — I’m told this is a tradition in high Protestant churches — here ends the reading.

Can Clinton pull off a hat-trick of Democrat wins? // BBC News // Nick Bryant – May 11, 2015

Not since the era of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Harry S Truman have the Democrats won three presidential victories in a row.

The 2016 election presents the party with a rare opportunity to pull off a historic hat-trick.

America's political geography gives the Democrats an enormous advantage.

So, too, does the country's changing demography, because constituencies that favour the Democrats are growing in electoral influence.

Despite the Republicans' current strength in congressional and gubernatorial politics - presently, the GOP holds the House of Representatives and the Senate, along with 31 governors' mansions - the party is weak in presidential politics.

It has lost four of the past six presidential elections. In five of those, the Democrats have won the popular vote.

The "blue wall" is especially advantageous.

That is the name given to the 18 states, as well as the District of Columbia, that have voted Democrat in every presidential election since Bill Clinton's first victory in 1992.

Democratic Blue Wall:

California (55), Connecticut (7), Delaware (3), Hawai'i (4), Illinois (20), Maine (4), Maryland (10), Massachusetts (11), Michigan (16), Minnesota (10), New Jersey (14), New York (29), Oregon (7), Pennsylvania (20), Rhode Island (4), Vermont (3), Washington (12), Washington DC (3), Wisconsin (10).

What makes the blue wall such a towering edifice is the size of its building blocks: some of the country's most populous states, like California, New York, Illinois, Michigan and New Jersey.

To win the Electoral College, the institution that elects the president on a state-by-state basis, the victorious candidate requires 270 votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Strong core support

For the past six elections, the states that make up the blue wall have yielded 242, just 28 short of the target.

The Republicans have a wall of their own: 13 states that have voted for the GOP's presidential candidate in the past six elections.

But those states amount for only 102 Electoral College votes between them.

To some, then, the "Red wall" looks more like a flimsy picket fence.

line

Republican Red Wall:

Alabama (9), Alaska (3), Idaho (4), Kansas (6), Mississippi (6), Nebraska (5), North Dakota (3), Oklahoma (7), South Carolina (9), South Dakota (3), Texas (38), Utah (6), Wyoming (3).

line

The Blue Wall is by no means insurmountable.

Though it held firm at the 2000 and 2004 elections, George W Bush emerged the victor.

Many of these blue states, like New Jersey, Massachusetts and Illinois, have Republican governors, and the GOP has not given up hope of turning them red.

Pennsylvania, with its 20 Electoral College votes, is particularly high on the their target list.

But the wall does grant the Democrats an inbuilt advantage in the Electoral College.

Just consider this statistic. Since 1992, the Republicans have achieved an average of 211 Electoral College votes. The Democrats' average is 327.

Demographic advantage

Demographics also appear to favour the Democrats: the support they are now receiving from minorities, Millennials (voters under 30) and women.

The Democrats have opened up a huge lead among minority voters, a growing and increasingly important part of the electorate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the last presidential election, 71% of Latinos voted for Barack Obama, up from 67% in 2008. Some 73% of Asian-Americans also voted Democrat, along with 93% of African-Americans.

Younger voters, who tend to be more liberal-minded on issues like same-sex marriage and immigration, are also leaning towards the Democrats.

Some two-thirds of Millennials voted for Obama in 2012.

A majority of women have also favoured the Democrats in recent presidential elections. Fifty-five per cent of women voted for Obama in 2012, while the figure for unmarried women was even higher at 67%, partly because the Republican Party has become associated with restrictions on abortion.

Obviously all is not lost for the GOP, not least because the party has demographic advantages of its own.

In 2012, 59% of white voters plumbed for Mitt Romney. Among the so-called silent generation, those born between 1925 and 1945, the Republicans have a lead of 47% to 43%. But America is becoming less white, and that presents problems for the Republicans.

Their prime strategy since the civil rights era of the 1960s, after all, has been to target white voters, regardless of their income levels.

Obama support

Next year, the GOP will be hoping that the so-called "Obama coalition" of minorities, Millennials and women, does not become the "Hillary Coalition," if, as expected, she wins the Democratic presidential nomination.

Black voters will not turn out in such high numbers for Hillary, they reckon.

The GOP also hopes to make inroads into a Latino vote deterred from backing Republicans because of the party's tough line on immigration.

Hillary Clinton

Can Hillary Clinton follow her husband into the White House?

Party strategists believe there is truth in Ronald Reagan's famous observation: "Latinos are Republicans. They just don't know it yet."

As for the Millennials, a string of recent polls suggest that their support for the Democrats is waning - although a survey conducted in April by the Harvard Institute of Politics suggested that 55% of voters under the age of 30 would prefer the White House to remain in Democratic hands.

There are Democrats who believe that the Hillary coalition could be even more formidable than the Obama coalition.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campaigning to become America's first female president, she will hope to attract higher levels of support from white women, more than half of whom voted Republican in 2012.

She might attract more male white voters than Obama.

Yet Democrats run the risk of over-confidence, a mistake made by Republicans following the back-to-back victories of George W Bush.

In those heady days, strategists like Karl Rove spoke assuredly of an emergent permanent Republican majority, only to see Obama score two victories.

More recently, GOP morale has been boosted by the work of the political journalist John Judis, who predicted at the start of the century an "emerging Democratic majority".

In January, Judis penned a revisionist essay headlined "The Emerging Republican Advantage," which argued that the Republican triumph at last November's congressional mid-term elections was "the latest manifestation of a resurgent Republican coalition".

White vote

The Republicans were even more dominant among white voters, he observed, which was problematic for the Democrats because they still required between 36% and 40% of the white working-class vote to win the presidential election.

But it is always a mistake to equate strength in congressional politics with success in presidential politics.

Between 1968 and 1992, for instance, the Democrats dominated the House of Representatives.

For that entire era, a Democrat sat in the powerful speaker's chair.

But during that era, the Democrats won just one presidential election, when Jimmy Carter edged out Gerald Ford in 1976.

The electorate that votes in congressional elections is different in size and make-up to that which turns out in presidential polls.

History suggests it will be hard to win three consecutive victories.

Since the war, the Republicans have only managed it once, when George Herbert Walker Bush followed Ronald Reagan into the White House.

Could Hillary Clinton do what no Democrat has done for more than 65 years?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary for New Hampshire open house grassroots event at The Met on Saturday // The Conway Daily Sun // Lloyd Jones - May 8, 2015

Hillary Clinton isn't planning to be in the Granite State this weekend, but that hasn't stopped her supporters from scheduling a meeting to plot campaign strategy for the Democrat front-runner to become the party's nominee for the presidency.

Hillary for New Hampshire's supporters and volunteers is hosting a grassroots open house on Saturday at 11:15 a.m. in the meeting room at The Met Coffee House in North Conway Village.

"We're doing this in all 10 counties," Harrell Kirstein, spokesperson for Hillary for New Hampshire, said by phone Thursday. "This will be the Hillary Clinton campaign's first event in Conway."

Kirstein, who was campaign communications director for Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen's successful re-election campaign last year, said that at the open houses, "Hillary for New Hampshire will ask volunteers to activate and organize friends and neighbors in their community to take part in this campaign.

"This grassroots organizing series," he said, "will be a chance for longtime friends of Hillary's to reengage in her campaign, as well as a welcome invitation for new supporters to get involved for the first time."

Clinton announced April 12 that she is running for president, and she immediately became the front-runner, not only for the Democrats, but for the Oval Office.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is also seeking the nomination from the Democrats. He entered the race April 30, and actually made a campaign stop in Mount Washington Valley 48 hours later, on May 2, speaking at the White Mountain Hotel in Hale's Location.

The Republican field doubled to six prominent GOP hopefuls this week when Carly Fiorina, the former chairman and chief executive officer of Hewlett-Packard; Ben Carson, the director of pediatric neurosurgery at the Johns Hopkins Children's Center and recipient of the Presidential Medal of Freedom; and Mike Huckabee, former governor of Arkansas and FOX news host, all threw their hats into the ring days apart.

The trio join Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas, who announced he was running March 23), Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky., announced April 7), and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla., announced April 30).

None of the GOP candidates since announcing has visited the valley, although Paul, who was the Carroll County Republican Committee's Lincoln Day Dinner keynote speaker on March 20, gave strong indications then he was leaning towards a run.

"I think things are starting to get interesting," Kirstein said of the presidential race.

Kirstein said members of the public can sign up at hillaryclinton.com/newhampshire to receive more information on open houses and other events happening in New Hampshire. Full details on other open houses will be released ahead of individual events.

Clinton's use of 'super PAC' pushes limits of campaign finance law // Sentinel Source // Evan Halper - May 8, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign team had hoped to frame her trip hopscotching through the mansions of some of California's deepest-pocketed donors this week as an exercise in modesty, highlighting the relatively low price of a ticket to the events as a reflection of her commitment to cultivating the grass roots.

But that narrative quickly unraveled when word got out that the candidate was also using the California trip as an occasion to begin courting an entirely different group.

Clinton, who has emphasized campaign finance reform in the early stage of her latest White House bid, has apparently already decided the modest approach alone won't be enough. She is going after much bigger checks, much sooner, and in a much more aggressive way than her campaign had revealed.

The candidate will be pushing the boundaries of campaign finance law further than any Democratic presidential contender ever has by directly asking donors to give to a friendly "super PAC" that can raise unlimited amounts of campaign cash from donors, according to a person familiar with her plans.

That effort started in California on Wednesday, when Clinton met in San Francisco with potential donors of the organization, Priorities USA Action. She had another meeting in Los Angeles on Thursday.

Clinton's plans to raise money for Priorities USA was first reported by The New York Times. Campaign officials aren't commenting.

Clinton would not be the first contender in this year's race to go after such cash. On the Republican side, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has been soliciting checks for as much as $1 million for his super PAC. Candidates avoided such activity in the 2012 race, adhering to a law that says they cannot coordinate directly with the groups. (Bush, though, has not yet declared his candidacy and is free to work with the group until he does so.)

But the increasingly permissive approach of the Federal Election Commission, whose members are deadlocked over the question of how candidates can and cannot engage with super PACs, is leading the presidential contenders to take ever bolder approaches. Clinton supporters say she is caught up in a campaign arms race and she has no choice but to use the tools her opponents have at their disposal.

Still, the quick shift on fundraising puts Clinton in an awkward position.

"Just three weeks ago, Hillary Clinton decried unaccountable money in politics and even called for amending the Constitution to ban it," said Jeff Bechdel, communications director for America Rising, a conservative research group. "Today, she announced she's going to personally court donors and raise money for her own super PAC. … Clinton's hypocrisy knows no bounds."

The California trip was supposed to be a chance for Clinton to showcase a more modest approach to fundraising, one that squared with what she promised would be a campaign that is humble, lean and focused on the values of everyday Americans. Even though the events were to be held in the homes of billionaires and mega-millionaires, donors were not to give more than $2,700.

Those who want to give more than that can encourage others to give checks, becoming what's known as a campaign bundler. Clinton's campaign calls its bundlers "Hillstarters," and those designated as such get perks that include invites to receptions with the candidate. Clinton is making it much easier to get in this circle of fundraisers than she did eight years ago, when supporters had to raise $100,000. Now, they need only to generate $27,000 for the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton Foundation's Behind-the-Scenes Battle With a Charity Watchdog Group // NY Mag // Gabriel Sherman - May 10, 2015

Last Wednesday, Bill Clinton ratcheted up Clintonworld's counter assault on Clinton Cash, the book by conservative author Peter Schweizer that ignited the latest media frenzy over the former First Couple's $2 billion foundation. "There's just no evidence," Clinton defiantly told CNN's Christiane Amanpour, during an interview at the Foundation's confab in Morocco. "Even the guy that wrote the book apparently had to admit under questioning that we didn't have a shred of evidence for this, we just sort of thought we would throw it out there and see if it flies, and it won't fly."

Clinton's analysis is flawed in at least one regard. As my colleagueJonathan Chait recently wrote, the Clintons' web of murky relationships and opaque finances exacts a political cost whether or not their critics ever find a there there. The Clintons, more than anyone, should know that negative press — true or not — can have potentially catastrophic consequences. Remember, it was David Brock's 1993 American Spectatorarticle alleging that Arkansas State Troopers arranged Bill's trysts which sparked Paula Jones's sexual harassment lawsuit, which led to the Supreme Court case, which led to Monica Lewinsky lying under oath about the affair, which led Linda Tripp to turn the tapes over to Ken Starr, which led to impeachment.

Related Stories

The Disastrous Clinton Post-PresidencyIf This Is the Best Defense of the Clinton Foundation, She's in Trouble

The Clinton Foundation scandal cycle is already spinning off new complications. A case in point: After being the subject of a spate of negative newspaper accounts about potential conflicts of interest and management dysfunction this winter — long before Clinton Cash — the Clinton Foundation wound up on a "watchlist" maintained by the Charity Navigator, the New Jersey-based nonprofit watchdog. The Navigator, dubbed the "most prominent" nonprofit watchdog by the Chronicle of Philanthropy, is a powerful and feared player in the nonprofit world. Founded in 2002, it ranks more than 8,000 charities and is known for its independence. For a while, the Clinton Foundation was happy to promote Charity Navigator's work (back when they were awarded its highest ranking). In September 2014, in fact, the Navigator's then-CEO, Ken Berger, was invited to speak at the Clinton Global Initiative. Of course that was before the Foundation was placed on a list with scandal-plagued charities like Al Sharpton's National Action Network and the Red Cross.

Since March, the Foundation has embarked on an aggressive behind-the-scenes campaign to get removed from the list. Clinton Foundation officials accuse the Navigator of unfairly targeting them, lacking credible evidence of wrongdoing, and blowing off numerous requests for a meeting to present their case. "They're not only punishing us for being transparent but are not being transparent themselves," Maura Pally, the Foundation's acting-CEO, told me by phone from Morocco last week. "Charity Navigator doesn't disclose its donors but we do and yet that means we're suffering the consequences."

Navigator executives counter that the Foundation has demanded they extend the Clintons special treatment. They also allege the Foundation attempted to strong-arm them by calling a Navigator board member. "They felt they were of such importance that we should deviate from our normal process. They were irritated by that," says Berger.

The feud is a microcosm of all that is exhausting about the Clintons' endless public battles. Generally, it goes like this: bad press about their lack of transparency sparks some real world consequence or censure, the Clintons complain that they're being held to an unfair standard while their critics contend that they expect to be able to write their own rules, and the resulting flare-up leads to more bad press.

The trouble with Navigator started on Wednesday morning, March 11. Foundation officials became alarmed when they received an anonymous email from the watchdog's Donor Advisory committee informing them they would be added to the list on Friday, March 13, unless they could provide answers to questions raised in newspaper accounts. Among the press controversies the Navigator cited: A Wall Street Journal report that noted "at least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during [Hillary Clinton's] tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation." Politico, meanwhile, revealed that the Foundation failed to report to the State Department a $500,000 donation from the Algerian government, a violation of the ethics agreement the Clintons had arranged with the Obama White House. Politico also reported that the Foundation's former CEO, Eric Braverman, quit after a "power struggle" with "the coterie of Clinton loyalists who have surrounded the former president for decades."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With the publication of Clinton Cash on the horizon, Clintonworld surely knew landing on the Navigator's watchlist would be a public relations debacle. By early March, Clinton campaign officials were holding regular war room meetings to orchestrate their defense against the book. Over the next few days, Foundation officials desperately attempted to contact Navigator executives to rebut their claims but, inexplicably, couldn't get through to anyone on the phone. On the evening of Friday, March 13, Pally sent a detailed email rebuttal. "All of the other organizations on your watchlist have had substantiated allegations of financial, fiscal or other impropriety," she wrote, according to an email the Foundation provided toNew York. "The stories you cite about the Clinton Foundation merely point to donations, or gossip around our operations, none of which constitute any wrongdoing."

It didn't work. During a tense phone conversation on the afternoon of March 17, Pally and Berger argued over the merits of the media's claims about the Foundation. Pally said they were without substance; Berger insisted that since the newspapers published the articles, they were relevant. "Our whole thing is: if major media outlets say there's something here that you should be aware of, we're not going to be judge and jury on what the media says," Berger later told me. "We felt there had been enough questions." As a matter of practice, the Navigator doesn't conduct its own investigations. On its website, they state: "Charity Navigator…takes no position on allegations made or issues raised by third parties, nor does Charity Navigator seek to confirm or verify the accuracy of allegations made or the merits of issues raised by third parties that may be referred to in the CN Watchlist."

The Navigator invited the Foundation to respond publicly on their website. Instead, Pally asked Berger to meet and review confidential copies of the Foundation's handbook, "Global Code of Conduct," and board bylaws. Berger declined, feeling it was another effort of back-room dealing and spin. "We were not opposed to having a sit-down meeting. The point was, what is it that we're going to cover? We've already been around the block. What's the value of this?"

Last week, after I contacted the Foundation about being on the watchlist, Pally rekindled talks with the Navigator. "I remain at a loss as to what information we can provide to address Charity Navigator's concerns and be removed from the Watchlist," she wrote Tim Gamory, the Navigator's acting CEO. (Berger left the group last month to start his own consulting business.)

Sure enough, the watchlist designation has provided Clinton's antagonists with more ammunition with which to attack Hillary's campaign. Already, critics are citing Charity Navigator's list as a reason to open a federal investigation into the Clintons' finances. For its part, the Clinton camp sees the episode as another reason to feel aggrieved. But even some Clinton advisers have been frustrated that they don't appear to have learned from past self-inflicted wounds. One source told me that last year, a senior adviser lobbied the Foundation to appoint a Republican co-chairman to its board, which was stacked with Clinton loyalists. The adviser submitted a list of GOP names. "It was to shield [the Clintons] from the things they're reading about now," the source said. "It didn't happen."

Unfortunately for Hillary's campaign, the Navigator's policy is that charities that land on the list stay there for a minimum of six months. Sandra Miniutti, the Navigator's spokesperson, told me that, in order to get off the list, the Clintons need to publicly address each of the controversies raised by the media with a convincing response.

The clock is ticking.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under pressure, Clinton Foundation's Canadian arm reveals 21 donors // McClatchy // Greg Gordon - May 10, 2015

WASHINGTON — Under pressure to lift the veil of secrecy over who bankrolled his Canadian charity that's affiliated with the Clinton Foundation, Vancouver-based mining mogul Frank Giustra late Friday released the names of 21 of its largest donors, most with connections to the mining and oil-drilling industries.

The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership (Canada) did not list the amounts of the various donations. It said it only disclosed the identities of those leading contributors who provided written authorization, while releasing a second legal opinion asserting that under Canadian law, the rest of its 1,100 contributors should be kept confidential unless they agree to be identified.

Those named include Giustra, a major Clinton Foundation benefactor who has forged a globetrotting philanthropic partnership with former President Bill Clinton, Giustra's estranged wife, Alison Lawton, and his family foundation.

The partnership's secrecy has triggered controversy because the contributors' money ultimately benefited the U.S.-based foundation that Clinton built into a global force to fight poverty and disease, posing possible undisclosed conflicts of interest for his wife, Hillary Clinton, during her tenure as secretary of state between 2009 and 2013.

Disclosures about these entanglements — and questions about whether some are being concealed — are now dogging Hillary Clinton as she seeks the Democratic presidential nomination.

Before she took office, the Clinton Foundation agreed to disclose all of its donors and to limit donations from foreign governments. On its website, the foundation lists the names of more than 300,000 donors, organizing them by dollar ranges, and says it will update the list quarterly during her presidential candidacy.

The Canadian affiliate said Friday it has taken no donations from foreign governments.

While Giustra says the Canadian partnership turns over all of its revenue to the Clinton Foundation, it operates as a separate entity. Giustra said this week that $16 million of the money was raised at a star-studded 2008 gala on Toronto's waterfront, which was attended by some 1,200 people.

Most of the donors identified Friday fit into a tight ring of Giustra's present and former mining industry friends, associates and financiers.

Prominent among those listed was Ian Telfer, whose company, Uranium One, swallowed Giustra's firm, handing him windfall profits, after it won the right to mine key uranium deposits in Kazakhstan and in the United States. The New York Times has reported that Giustra's UrAsia Energy Inc. consummated a deal for the Kazakhstan deposits in 2005, days after Giustra and Bill Clinton met with the country's president, though Giustra has contended the purchase would have gone forward anyway.

Public records reviewed by McClatchy show that Telfer's Fernwood Foundation, which also was among those named, donated $2.45 million to the Clinton Giustra Canadian partnership over several years.

Sergey Kurzin, a Russian-born engineer who has publicly taken credit for arranging the meeting involving Clinton and Kazakhstan's president, also acknowledged donating. The Toronto Globe and Mail reported in 2008 that Kurzin pledged $1 million at the gala. Kurzin also gave $50,000 to $100,000 directly to the Clinton Foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, the biggest donors to the Canada partnership were Giustra, who has pledged $100 million to the Clinton Foundation and donated more than $30 million directly so far, and his Radcliffe Foundation, which gave more than $18 million between 2007 and 2013, according to public records.

Others on the list include:

—Pacific Rubiales Energy Corp., a Canadian petroleum firm in which Giustra invested and which pursued drilling interests in Colombia.

—Gran Colombia Gold Corp., a Canadian firm with mining interests in the South American nation.

—Endeavour Mining Corp., a Canadian-based gold mining firm, and its chief executive officer, Neil Woodyer.

—Stephen Dattels, a British-based mining industry financier.

—GMP Securities, LP, a Canadian firm that has been instrumental in underwriting mining ventures.

—B2Gold Corp., a Canadian gold-mining firm.

—Sam Magid, a former business Giustra business partner.

—The London-based Dragon Group of companies, which deal in silver, copper and diamonds.

For the Clintons, a big question: What to do with Bill? // WaPo // Phillip Rucker - May 10, 2015

MARRAKESH, Morocco — The scene that unfolded here last week as Bill Clinton convened world leaders for a philanthropic conference was hardly what his wife's champion-for-everyday-Americans campaign would have ordered up.

Gathered in Marrakesh for a Clinton Global Initiative confab, foreign oligarchs and corporate titans mingled amid palm trees, decorative pools and dazzling tiled courtyards with the former president and his traveling delegation of foundation donors — many of whom are also donors to Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign.

When daughter Chelsea moderated a discussion on women's empowerment, the only male panelist was Morocco's richest person, Othman Benjelloun, whose BMCE Bank is a CGI sponsor. For the week's biggest party, guests were chauffeured across the city to an opulent 56-room palace that boasts a private collection of Arabian horses, overlooks the snow-capped Atlas Mountains and serves a fine-dining menu of "biolight" cuisine.

Ahead of that event, Bill Clinton greeted Saudi Prince Turki al-Faisal. "See you tonight, Turki," he told his royal highness.

It was a long way from Hillary Clinton's campaign-trail visits to Chipotle. The luxe week in Morocco highlighted the overarching question facing the Clintons and their coexisting circles of political advisers: What to do with Bill?

The question applies not only to the campaign but also to his role as first gentleman if she gets elected.

In a presidential race that could include two dozen candidates, none has a spouse like Bill Clinton — a former president whose sprawling charitable ventures are rife with potential conflicts of interest; an admired public figure whose common touch propelled his rise but who now charges up to $500,000 to give a speech; a curious ideas man whose penchant for speaking his mind drives news cycles; and a globe-trotting icon whose recognizable tuft of white hair draws onlookers everywhere, from his old Arkansas haunts to the bustling souks around Marrakesh's central square.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill Clinton is a political animal who logged 168,000 miles on the campaign trail in 2014. Yet senior aides say he does not plan to do any campaign activities for his wife in 2015, including fundraisers for her campaign or allied super PACs. He has said privately that she should lead the campaign on her own, aides said.

“He’s completely focused right now on the foundation,” said Tina Flournoy, Bill Clinton’s chief of staff. “That does not mean that he does not realize his wife is running for president. But he is not directly engaged in the campaign. As he has said before, if his advice is asked for, he’s happy to give it.”

But even if he’s off the campaign trail, Bill Clinton is never out of the limelight. He will remain prominent in the public eye with a busy schedule of appearances, including visits this week to a Harlem food festival and next month to Little Rock for a charity ball. In mid-June, he will be in Denver to host CGI America, a domestic-themed spinoff of his foundation conference.

On Tuesday, he’ll be on the “Late Show with David Letterman.”

He will also speak for pay at Univision’s presentation to advertisers in New York on Tuesday. The prominent Spanish-language television network is owned in part by Haim Saban, a foundation and campaign donor who hosted a fundraiser for Hillary Clinton last week at his Beverly Hills mansion.

One strategist said Hillary Clinton, shown here with Bill Clinton and former senator Tom Harkin, should not campaign with her husband: “It’s hard to shine when you’re standing next to the sun.” (Charlie Neibergall/ Associated Press)

“Bill Clinton is like nuclear energy,” said David Axelrod, a strategist on President Obama’s campaigns. “If you use it properly, it can be enormously helpful and proactive. If you misuse it, it can be catastrophic.”

‘A supporting spouse’

Keeping the former president at a distance is one way the 2016 Clinton campaign is trying to prove it has learned from the mistakes of 2008. Although as her aides know well, it is impossible to truly isolate him from her campaign.

“He is a very smart political strategist and practitioner,” said Ann Lewis, a longtime Hillary Clinton adviser. “He has never thought that politics is beneath him. He believes that politics is the way that we govern ourselves.”

Bill Clinton has many assets. He is universally known and unusually popular; 73 percent of voters approved of his job performance as president in a Washington Post-ABC News poll in March, while his personal favorability rating stood at 65 percent in a CNN-ORC poll in March. He also is considered one of the Democratic Party’s most talented communicators; his 2012 convention speech was a standout moment in support of Obama’s reelection.

“Any conversation about Bill Clinton and his impact on the campaign has to start with the fact that Americans like him and they’ve liked him for a long time,” said Geoff Garin, a pollster for Hillary Clinton’s 2008 campaign who now works for Priorities USA, a pro-Clinton super PAC.

But as Bill Clinton showed in 2008, he can be an undisciplined and rogue surrogate. Some of the ugliest episodes in his wife’s campaign were his making, including his stray remarks about Obama that angered black voters in South Carolina and his behind-the-scenes meddling in the campaign’s strategy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), who feuded with Bill Clinton in 2008 over what he saw as race-baiting, said in a recent interview that the former president should be “a supporting spouse” this time around.

“He should refrain from doing anything or saying anything that would take the attention off of her candidacy,” said Clyburn, who has not endorsed anyone in the 2016 race. “It’s got to be about Hillary. It’s got to be about her vision, and he’s got to be supportive of that.”

Axelrod, recalling the Clintons’ joint appearance in the fall at retiring Sen. Tom Harkin’s steak fry in Iowa, said it would be foolish for the them to campaign together regularly. “It’s hard to shine when you’re standing next to the sun,” he said recently. “He’s a luminescent character, and it is diminishing to have him out there at her side.”

Aides insisted that Bill Clinton is not calling up campaign aides, devouring polls or mapping out strategies. The campaign has no “Bill whisperer” tasked with managing him, although Flournoy is in regular contact with top aides at Hillary Clinton’s Brooklyn headquarters. The former president also has long-standing relationships with campaign chairman John D. Podesta and other advisers.

The Clintons speak to each other often, sometimes multiple times a day, but usually about personal matters and rarely about the nity-gritty of her race, aides said. Some days, he doesn’t know where she’s campaigning. And on the Africa trip, he was more attuned to the British elections — glued to the BBC — than to her campaign.

One afternoon in April, Bill Clinton looked up at a television in his midtown Manhattan office and saw the grainy security-camera photo of his wife and her aide, Huma Abedin, at a Chipotle in Ohio, appearing incognito in dark sunglasses. He turned to aides and wondered, “What are she and Huma doing? Are they robbing that place?”

Far away, but still making news

As Hillary Clinton raised money in California last week, Bill Clinton was about as far away as he could get, visiting the family foundation’s projects in Africa and convening the CGI meeting in Morocco.

Yet he was still making big headlines. In an interview with NBC News in Kenya, he appeared testy while defending the foundation’s foreign fundraising. He also said he would continue giving six-figure paid speeches: “I’ve got to pay our bills,” he said, sounding out of touch, considering he has reported earning $105 million in speaking fees over 12 years.

There were other awkward moments as well. As Bill Clinton wrapped up the CGI meeting in Morocco, a top Coca-Cola executive joined him onstage to announce a $4.5 million program to help African youths obtain job skills and career counseling.

Then Curtis A. Ferguson, the company’s regional president, shifted to the sales pitch. “I hope they’re thirsty,” he said, referring to the young Africans. Then he said he wanted to “share a Coke with Bill,” pulling out a Coke bottle inscribed with the former president’s first name in Arabic. They posed for photos holding the bottle, smiling.

But much of the Africa trip — which stretched for 10 days and included stops in Tanzania, Kenya, Liberia and Morocco — was aimed at showcasing the good works of the foundation and its partners.

At a hearing-aid fitting in Kenya, Bill Clinton witnessed a young man hearing the voice of his sister for the first time. In Tanzania, he met farmer Wazia Chawala, a single mother with seven children, who with foundation help has improved crop yields with modern soil, seed and crop-rotation techniques.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also visited a drab Nairobi laboratory, where he listened to a presentation on tracking carbon emissions and rainfall patterns so farmers could improve their yields. When he asked the donors with him if they had any questions, Drew Houston, the chief executive of Dropbox, asked, “What were your biggest technical challenges?”

For Clinton and his staff, it was a proud moment of synergy — the founder of one of the world’s largest cloud-computing companies asking a Kenyan lab technician a question about uploading data to the cloud.

Clinton, who declined a request to be interviewed for this report, is grappling with what the future might hold. He is continuing to raise money for the foundation, where his daughter has assumed a greater leadership role. Last year, the foundation raised a $250 million endowment to provide long-term stability in his absence.

His advisers understand that the foundation’s activities could complicate a Hillary Clinton presidency.

“In his heart and mind, I think he wants there to always be a scenario where his foundation is doing the work that he’s deeply invested in,” Flournoy said. “How does that look, and what does experience and time and history mean you might have to change? We don’t know. But this is his life’s work.”

‘What does she want me to do?’

Bill Clinton says his role would be determined by his wife. “What does she want me to do?” he said in an interview last week with CNN’s Christiane Amanpour. “I have no idea.”

One option is that Hillary Clinton could draft him as a special envoy somewhere or give him a portfolio in her administration. He is continually fascinated by science, aides said, and lately has been thinking about creating a fairer economy. He also has talked about bringing together corporate partners to rebuild Baltimore after last month’s riots.

A return of the Clintons to the White House would also usher in a blurring of traditional gender roles, not to mention titles: Bill Clinton’s aides still refer to him as “the president.”

“Even if he were assigned the responsibility of picking out china, I think others would probably overrule him on taste,” said Skip Rutherford, a longtime adviser and friend. “People used to kid him about picking out his crazy ties. I can’t imagine.”

The closest historical parallel is Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. During Franklin’s presidency, Eleanor earned personal income from paid speeches, newspaper columns and a weekly radio show, which was sponsored by Simmons mattresses, said Carl Anthony, a historian at the National First Ladies’ Library. He said she gave most of her income to the March of Dimes Foundation, which her husband founded to combat polio.

“She made a lot of money on her own, but not without a congressional investigation and media attacks on her commercializing the presidency,” Anthony said.

Fred Wertheimer, president of the reform group Democracy 21, said the couple should completely withdraw from the charity if Hillary Clinton wins: “Change the name of the foundation, and make a clean break.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foundation supporters believe otherwise.

“It would probably be one of the greatest wastes of human talent in the history of the world” for Bill Clinton to withdraw, said Jay Jacobs, a major donor who traveled with him to Africa. “How do you say to these poor farmers, to mothers whose children can’t hear, ‘Sorry, no more because politics can’t abide by it?’ That would be morally wrong.”

Paul: Clinton made Libya a 'jihadist wonderland' // The Hill // Mark Hensch - May 10, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) argued Sunday that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s policies had created a terrorist utopia in Libya.

“Hillary Clinton’s war in Libya, I think, made it less safe,” Paul told host John Catsimatidis on his New York radio show “The Cats Roundtable.”

“It was a big mistake for us to go in there in the first place, because a lot of the times when we topple secular dictators, we’ve gotten chaos and then we’ve gotten the rise of radical Islam,” he said of Clinton’s decision in 2011 to help oust then-Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi.

“It made it a hotbed for jihadists,” Paul added. “And, in fact, I Libya is now a jihadist wonderland.”

Paul’s harsh criticism comes as the 2016 presidential race first heats up.

The Kentucky lawmaker is seeking the GOP nomination, while Clinton is pursuing the Democratic bid.

Paul on Sunday additionally touted his liberty credentials as the best in the entire 2016 field.

“I’m one of the few in the race that thinks that we need to defend the country, but sometimes being involved in foreign war doesn’t help us,” he said.

“And I’m one of the few who thinks we need to talk about defending the entire Bill of Rights, not just a couple of ones cherry-picked here and there,” Paul said.

Paul said among the GOP contenders, he stood out for his opposition to the nation’s current intelligence policies.

“I’m probably the only Republican in the race who thinks that the government shouldn’t be collecting all of our phone records … without a warrant,” he said.

“I want to be a part of the leave-me-alone coalition, which basically says if you’re not hurting anybody, the government, particularly the federal government, ought to stay out of your life,” Paul added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul's remarks followed a federal appeals court ruling Thursday that the bulk warrantless collection of phone records by the National Security Agency was illegal.

The GOP senator hailed that judgment Friday as a "monumental decision for all lovers of liberty."

He vowed Sunday to continue his work on privacy rights while still making progress on what he saw as the average American's real concern.

"The top three issues are the debt, the debt and the debt," Paul said.

Hillary's Immigration // Iowa Starting Line // Pat Rynard - May 10, 2015

Progressives who decry Hillary Clinton as insufficiently liberal have increasingly fewer examples to point to. This week while in Nevada, Clinton staked out very progressive views on immigration, calling for a full pathway to citizenship, supporting executive actions that are to the left of President Obama's stances, and signaled strong protection for DREAMers. Immigration activists were absolutely ecstatic with her remarks. Some in the party's left who distrust Clinton won't believe it, but her words and the forcefulness in which she delivered them is a big deal.

It's also a fascinating look into Clinton's electoral strategy. If she wanted to, she could play it safe on certain issues and run a centrist campaign to win over what's left of America's swing voters. This is clearly a play at building upon the same coalition of young and ethnically diverse people that Obama used for his victories. Her immigration stance could rejuvenate Hispanic support for Democrats, many of whom have felt burned by Obama's presidency, a time during which his administration has deported more people than any one before him. All of this is very, very good news on both the policy side of things, but also on the electoral side of the future of the Democratic Party.

If Clinton wins White House, an uncertain future awaits her family's charitable foundation // AP // Julie Pace – May 11, 2015

WASHINGTON — Hillary Rodham Clinton's family foundation, already the subject of intense scrutiny in the early days of her White House campaign, faces an uncertain future if she is elected president.

Among the unresolved questions: Who would be able to raise money for the Clinton Foundation? Could it begin new projects, both at home and overseas? Is there any way it could operate unburdened by conflicts of interest, real or perceived, while one of its founders sits in the Oval Office?

"I'm not sure the rules have been invented to apply to this situation," said Diana Aviv, president of Independent Sector, a network of nonprofits, foundations and corporate giving programs.

While Clinton stepped down from the foundation's board after launching her 2016 campaign, husband Bill and daughter Chelsea still hold leadership roles. They currently have no plans to stop their fundraising and management activities during the campaign, nor is there a blueprint for their involvement if Hillary Clinton wins the election, people close to the foundation said.

Options being considered include Chelsea Clinton taking the helm, with her father playing a more behind-the-scenes role; fully banning the acceptance of donations from abroad; and implementing a more rigorous vetting process for domestic donors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Neither the foundation nor Clinton's campaign will pledge publicly to give voters answers about the organization's future before the November 2016 election, but some people close to the Clintons want decisions made before Election Day.

The people close to the Clintons and the foundation spoke on condition of anonymity, because they were not authorized to speak publicly about internal planning.

Campaign officials are also pushing the Clinton Foundation to be more aggressive in answering the criticism of its high-dollar fundraising. The organization has raised more than $2 billion since former President Bill Clinton left office, money it uses to run 11 initiatives focused on global health, climate change, economic development, wellness and opportunities for women and girls.

That aggressive fundraising is currently the subject of intense scrutiny, as Republicans and others look for potential conflicts of interests and signs that donors to the foundation sought to influence the Obama administration during Hillary Clinton's four years as secretary of state.

The Clintons deny any improprieties. But the former president has started to hint that if his wife wins the White House, he may have to step down from the organization to avoid blurring the lines between U.S. government policy and the interests of donors.

"I might if I were asked to do something in the public interest that I had an obligation to do. Or I might take less of an executive role," Clinton said in a recent interview with NBC News. "But we'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

Some people close to the Clintons and the foundation say it's unlikely the former president could continue directly raising money if his wife wins election. But they say that could be a slow and difficult realization for him to come to, given how much of his post-White House legacy is linked to the foundation's work.

"The challenge isn't necessarily the organization surviving the founders — it's the founders letting go of the organization," said Steven Lawrence, the research director at the Foundation Center, an organization that collects data on philanthropic organizations.

There is far less certainty about the role Chelsea Clinton might play in the foundation's future. The 35-year-old has taken on a more direct role in recent years and is an obvious choice to take over from her parents. But despite being well-liked by donors, some question whether she would be able to raise the same level of money as her popular father.

Clinton Foundation officials have discussed how to sustain the organization financially if the former president can no longer directly raise money. The conversations with donors and others have focused not just on the prospect of Hillary Clinton becoming president, but also the possibility that Bill Clinton's health leaves him unable to keep up his role as chief fundraiser.

A drive launched in 2013 has endowed a $250 million fund to help keep programs running under those circumstances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donna Shalala, the former Health and Human Services secretary and University of Miami president who takes over as the foundation's president and chief executive next month, is expected to do her own accounting of its activities. Her appointment is also seen as a signal to donors that there would be continuity in leadership if the Clinton family becomes less involved in its operations.

The foundation is also weighing whether new projects, both in the U.S. and abroad, could start during a Clinton presidency, or whether worry about potential conflicts of interest would limit it to its existing work. While the foundation says there were no conflicts during Clinton's four years as the nation's chief diplomat, the potential for such conflicts is far greater should she become president.

The foundation has already agreed to stop taking money from most foreign governments during her campaign, with exceptions for six Western nations.

Campaign officials suggested additional changes to foundation activities are not imminent. Spokesman Brian Fallon said that for now, Clinton is "proud of the foundation's work and glad that her husband and daughter continue to lead its day-to-day mission."

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Sanders: I'm 'most progressive' member of Congress // The Hill // Mark Hensch – May 10, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said on Sunday that he considered himself the most liberal lawmaker in Congress.

“I think it’s fair to say I am perhaps the most progressive member of Congress,” Sanders told host Bob Schieffer on CBS’s “Face the Nation.”

“I am proud of being the longest-serving independent in the history of the United States Congress,” he added.

Sanders, a 2016 Democratic presidential candidate, additionally reiterated his interest in copying some policies from socialist European nations.

“We can learn a whole lot from some of those countries,” he said, citing Austria, Denmark and Germany as examples.

“College education is free in those countries,” Sanders said of those nations’ undergraduate educational programs.

“That makes a lot of sense to me,” he said.

Sanders also advocated eliminating the role of wealthy special interests in political campaign spending.

“Billionaires like the Koch brothers are owning the political process,” he said of businessmen David and Charles Koch.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Billionaires should not be able to buy elections,” he said.

Sanders argued that if elected president, he would additionally vet potential Supreme Court justices by their desire to overturn the landmark Citizens United ruling on campaign contributions.

“That decision has undermined U.S. democracy,” he said of the case, which prohibits restrictions on political expenditures from organizations on the basis of free speech.

Sanders’s rejection of political action committees is a key part of his 2016 campaign.

The Vermont lawmaker argued on Sunday his freedom from wealthy special interests separates him from Hillary Clinton, the other current contender for the Democratic nomination.

“We are going to raise the kind of money to run a strong campaign,” he vowed of contributions he would earn from average Americans.

Why Bernie Sanders Thinks He Can Beat Hillary Clinton // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – May 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders acknowledges he won't outspend Hillary Clinton, but that doesn't mean he can't beat her.

Appearing on CBS's Face the Nation, the Democratic nomination seeker, a self-described independent socialist senator from Vermont was asked if he really thinks he can beat Democratic front runner.

"The answer is yes," Sanders said.

“We've had close to 90,000 contributions.”

His confidence lies in Clinton's ties to billionaires and the dissatisfaction with income inequality throughout the country.

"There is, in my view, massive dissatisfaction in this country today with the corporate establishment and the greed of corporate America in an incredibly unequal distribution of wealth and income, which currently exists," Sanders said.

Sanders said that unlike Clinton, he will not have a super-PAC to raise unlimited funds for his campaign. He pointed out the smaller donations that have been made to his campaign. While he doesn't expect to outspend Clinton, Sanders said that might not matter.

"Look, we announced a week and a half ago," Sanders said. "Since that time, we have had 200,000 people go to BernieSanders.com to sign up for the campaign. We've had close to 90,000 contributions. Do you know what the average contribution was? It's about $43, 43 bucks, from middle-class working families. So I don't think we're going to outspend Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush or anybody else, but I think we are going to raise the kinds of money that we need to run a strong and winning campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm New Hampshire poll, Sanders trails Clinton by 44 points in the Granite State.

Bernie Sanders: I can beat Hillary Clinton // CBS News // Rebecca Kaplan – May 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders, Vermont's independent senator and a self-proclaimed Democratic socialist, says he can beat Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination in 2016.

On CBS' "Face the Nation" on Sunday, Sanders said he thinks he can oust the former secretary of state because, "there is, in my view, massive dissatisfaction in this country today with corporate establishment and the greed of corporate America and the incredibly unequal distribution of wealth and income, which currently exists."

And Sanders said his record on that issue over the past 25 years shows that he has led the way in standing up for working families and taking on "the billionaire class," Wall Street, private insurance companies and drug companies.

Sanders is hesitant to criticize Clinton, saying that he respects and admires her. But pressed on the question of why he would make a better Democratic nominee, he points to three things: his opposition to the Trans Pacific Partnership, a massive Asia-Pacific trade agreement being negotiated, his vote against the war in Iraq and leadership fighting against it, and the work he has done opposing the Keystone XL pipeline.

"I'm not quite sure Hillary Clinton has come out with a position on that," he said.

Political insiders break down the 2016 presidential race

In a separate interview on "Face the Nation," Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter said it is still "pretty likely" Clinton will be the Democratic nominee, but that Sanders "has a role to play" in the debate.

"I think that there's nobody in the race right now who presents a real challenge to her in terms of taking the nomination away. But it's important to remember and we've been through this process many times, that we are many, many months away from the nomination, never mind the election," she said.

Former House Speaker and 2012 presidential candidate Newt Gingrich, who appeared alongside Cutter on the show, seemed to concur, when he said, if "you were betting today, you would say she is overwhelming favorite to be the nominee."

"If she doesn't get the nomination, it will be because 'not Hillary' beats 'Hillary,'" he said. "It won't be because some candidate beats Hillary."

In his "Face the Nation" interview, Sanders reserved the bulk of his criticism for the Supreme Court and its role in opening up a flood of money into politics through the 2010 Citizens United decision.

"As a result of this disastrous Citizens United Supreme Court decision, clearly the billionaires, Koch brothers and others, are owning the political process. They will determine who the candidates are," Sanders said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He pledged that he would use the issue as a litmus test for anyone he would nominate to the Supreme Court as president.

"That nominee will say that we are going to overturn this disastrous opinion on Citizens United because that decision is undermining American democracy. I do not believe that billionaire should be able to buy politicians," Sanders said.

Clinton will help raise money for a super PAC supporting her candidacy during 2016 even though she has pledged to "get unaccountable money out of [the political system] once and for all," even if it takes a constitutional amendment to overturn the court decision.

"With some Republican candidates reportedly setting up and outsourcing their entire campaign to super PACs and the Koch Brothers pledging $1 billion alone for the 2016 campaign, Democrats have to have the resources to fight back," a Clinton aide told CBS News last week. "There is too much at stake for our future for Democrats to unilaterally disarm."

Even that decision didn't draw fire from Sanders.

"I understand where she's coming from," he said, though he added that he will not have a super PAC supporting his campaign. Sanders noted that since he announced his candidacy at the end of April he has received nearly 90,000 donations, and the average is $43.

"I don't think we're going to outspend Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush or anybody else, but I think we are going to raise the kinds of money we need to run a strong and winning campaign," he said.

Gingrich, whose campaign was kept alive in part because of donations from billionaire casino magnate Sheldon Adelson, said that there is "a declining value when you get above a certain number" in campaign cash.

"The key for a candidate, which I failed, was to get above a critical mass," Gingrich said. "If [2012 GOP nominee Mitt] Romney couldn't have outspent me three to one, I might have become the nominee. But there's a point at some time, somewhere between five and 20 to one, where you drown. Nobody who is the nominee in the general election is going to get outspent by a huge number because the country is too polarized on what kind of future it wants and both sides can generate huge amounts of money."

Cutter said that the amount of money in politics has made voters cynical, and people begin to tune out the huge amounts of money and negativity in modern political campaigns.

"We do need to figure out how we take action to get this money out of the system," she said.

Bernie Sanders pledges not to accept super PAC support // Washington Times // Jose A. DelReal – May 10, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) on Sunday reiterated his pledge not to accept super PAC support but stopped short of knocking Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton’s decision to court allied super PAC donors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I understand where she is coming from. [But] I will not have a super PAC,” Sanders, who last month launched a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, said on “Face the Nation” on Sunday. “...I don't think we're going to outspend Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush or anybody else, but I think we are going to raise the kinds of money that we need to run a strong and winning campaign.”

Although Sanders did not criticize Clinton about her tacit support for an allied super PAC, about which The Washington Post’s Matea Gold reported last week, he nonetheless stressed — without naming names — his belief that the American political system gives outsize influence to millionaires and billionaires. He said a central consideration for Supreme Court nominees should be their position on the Citizens United decision.

[Hillary Clinton cements her support for allied super PAC.]

“Let me say it this way: If elected president, I will have a litmus test in terms of my nominee to be a Supreme Court justice, and that nominee will say that we are going to overturn this disastrous Supreme Court decision on Citizens United,” he said. “Because that decision is undermining American democracy. I do not believe that billionaires should be able to buy politicians.”

Asked about the differences between Clinton and him, Sanders — who described himself as "the most progressive member of the United States Senate" — said he has voiced strong opposition to the Trans-Pacific Partnership and the Keystone pipeline while Clinton's positions remain unclear. He also knocked Clinton on her oft-criticized 2002 vote to authorize the use of military force in Iraq.

“In terms of foreign policy, Hillary Clinton voted for the war in Iraq. Not only did I vote against it, I helped lead the effort against what I knew would be a disaster. In terms of climate change, I have helped lead the effort against the Keystone pipeline. I'm not quite sure if Hillary Clinton has come out with a position on that. So those are just some of the areas where we differ.”

Sanders suggested that the “massive dissatisfaction in this country today with the corporate establishment” could give him an edge in the Democratic primary.

"[L]et me say that I have known Hillary Clinton for 25 years. I respect her and I admire her. But I think we're living in a very strange moment in American history," he said.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a White House contender in 2016, is known for his stances on budget issues and war. Here's the Vermont senator's take on Obamacare, Social Security and more, in his own words. (Julie Percha/The Washington Post)

Bernie Sanders challenges Hillary Clinton on trade deal and Iraq war // The Guardian // Martin Pengelly – May 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, on Sunday outlined what he said were differences between his campaign and that of the clear frontrunner, Hillary Clinton.

Sanders again linked the former secretary of state to the “billionaires” he says dominate US politics, but widened his criticisms to include the former secretary of state’s positions on international trade agreements, the Iraq war and the threat of climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders and Clinton are the only candidates so far to have declared on the Democratic side; Clinton leads polls on the issue by more than 50%. Appearing on CBS on Sunday, Sanders was asked what was wrong with Clinton as a Democratic candidate for president.

"Let me give you an example," Sanders said. "Congress is in the midst of a debate on the Trans-Pacific Partnership [TPP, an agreement with 12 Asian countries]. I am strongly opposed to that trade agreement on the grounds that it follows in the footsteps of other disastrous trade agreements that have cost us millions of jobs."

Last month, Sanders wrote an op-ed column for the Guardian on the TPP, the largest trade deal in US history, in which he said: "The TPP is simply the continuation of a failed approach to trade – an approach which benefits large multinational corporations and Wall Street, but which is a disaster for working families. The TPP must be defeated."

TPP is supported by the Obama administration but opposed by many in the Democratic party. In an interview with Yahoo Politics that was published on Saturday, Obama said a prominent voice against TPP, Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, was "absolutely wrong" on the issue.

Clinton has so far handled TPP with extreme care – last month her campaign chief, John Podesta, was caught in private remarks to donors saying: "Can you make it go away?"

On Sunday, Sanders broadened his attack: "On foreign policy, Hillary Clinton voted for the war in Iraq ... Not only I voted against, I helped lead the effort against what I knew would be a disaster.

"On climate change, I have helped lead the effort against the Keystone pipeline. I'm not quite sure Hillary Clinton has come out with a position on that. So those are just some areas where we differ."

Sanders also repeated his determination to overturn the 2010 Citizens United supreme court decision, which gave rise to unrestrained spending on elections.

"As a result of this disastrous Citizens United supreme court decision, clearly the billionaires, the Koch brothers and all this, are owning the political process," he said. "They will determine who the candidates are.

"Let me say this: if elected president, I will have a litmus test in terms of my nominee to be a supreme court justice. And that nominee will say that we are going to overturn this disastrous supreme court decision because that decision is undermining US democracy. I do not believe billionaires should be able to buy politicians."

Clinton has said she will form a super PAC, the type of fundraising body brought into being by Citizens United, to fight her 2016 campaign.

Sanders, who said on Sunday that in two weeks since he declared his candidacy he had received 200,000 website sign-ups to volunteer and close to 90,000 financial contributions at an average of $43 each, said: "I understand where she's coming from. I will not have a super PAC."

Sanders confirmed that though he is a self-described "democratic socialist" – he was again asked to describe what that meant, and again pointed to Scandinavian countries' approaches to healthcare, education, childcare and more – he was running for the White House as a Democrat. He added that he was "perhaps the most progressive member of the Senate".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders's presidential candidacy four decades in the making // Christian Science Monitor // Dave Gram - May 10, 2015

MONTPELIER, VT. — Once a democratic socialist, always a democratic socialist. Once a scold of big money in politics, still a scold....

No one can accuse Sen. Bernie Sanders of flip-flopping over his four decades in public life. Rock steady, he's inhabited the same ideological corner on the left from which he now takes on Hillary Rodham Clinton in an improbable quest for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016.

Here he is in 1974, as the 32-year-old candidate for U.S. Senate of a fledgling leftist party in Vermont called Liberty Union: "A handful of banks and billionaires control the economic and political life of America. ... America is becoming less and less of a democracy and more and more of an oligarchy."

And now, in an Associated Press interview: "This is a rigged economy, which works for the rich and the powerful, and is not working for ordinary Americans. ... You know this country just does not belong to a handful of billionaires."

Some see him as a broken record, others as a person who has been telling the truth all along and just waiting for enough people to listen.

"The fascinating thing about Bernie right now is that the agenda has caught up with Bernie," said Garrison Nelson, a University of Vermont political science professor and longtime Sanders watcher.

During Sanders' near decade as mayor of Burlington, Vermont, in the 1980s, during his eight terms holding Vermont's lone seat in the House of Representatives, and during his near decade in the Senate, the message has stayed the same: The rich are absconding with an immorally large part of the country's wealth, and ordinary people have been getting the short end of the stick.

Clinton has gone from opposing same-sex marriage rights to supporting them. Sanders, now 73, favored gay marriage rights before it became fashionable in Democratic circles. He voted against the Defense of Marriage Act in the mid-1990s signed by Clinton's husband, President Bill Clinton. The law, which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in 2013, allowed states to refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed under the laws of other states.

Early in her primary campaign, Clinton has spoken about the gap between the rich and the middle class, in an appeal to the party's liberal wing. The Republican contenders, too, are taking up the problem of income inequality, although with much different solutions in mind than the Democrats.

Steady-as-he-goes Sanders has been at it for decades. He's admired Canada's single-payer health care system since way back, talking up "nationalized health care" during his unsuccessful run for Congress in 1988. When Republicans charge that Democrats would bring European-style socialism to the U.S., Sanders says bring it on.

"I can hear the Republican attack ad right now: 'He wants America to look more like Scandinavia," George Stephanopoulos said while interviewing Sanders on ABC's "This Week."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders replied, "That's right. That's right. And what's wrong with that? What's wrong when you have more income and wealth equality? What's wrong when they have a stronger middle class in many ways than we do, a higher minimum wage than we do, and they're stronger on the environment?"

If he's undergone any transformation, it's in his political affiliations. He long ago dropped the Liberty Union banner and has run as an Independent in his successful elections in Vermont.

He says he remains one "in my heart," but has caucused with Democrats in Congress. He chose to go for the Democratic nomination and, if he loses the party primaries, says he won't run for president as an Independent. An independent presidential bid could split the liberal vote and help elect the Republican candidate.

Copyright 2015 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed

Bernie Sanders Says He Can Beat Hillary Clinton // Huffington Post // May 10, 2015

Presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is confident that he can beat Hillary Clinton and become the 2016 Democratic presidential candidate.

“In my view, there is a massive dissatisfaction in this country with the corporate establishment, the greed of corporate America, and the incredibly unequal distribution of wealth and income that currently exists,” Sanders said Sunday morning on CBS’s “Face the Nation,” explaining why he thinks he can beat Clinton despite her massive financial advantage.

“We won’t outspend Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush, but we will raise the kind of money needed to run a strong campaign,” he predicted. Sanders promised on Sunday that he would not have a super PAC to raise money for his campaign. According to Sanders, he has received nearly 90,000 contributions, averaging about $43, since announcing his candidacy a week and a half ago.

Sanders, who described himself as “the most progressive member of the U.S. Senate,” vowed that if elected, he would work to overturn the Supreme Court’s Citizens United decision and rein in campaign spending allowances.

While Sanders voiced his respect and admiration for Clinton, he noted that she voted in favor of the 2003 Iraq War and has avoided taking a stance on the Keystone XL pipeline. Sanders, who opposed both, has also led the fight against a bill that would grant the president fast-track authority on trade agreements.

Warren-for-president push waning // Boston Herald // Hillary Chabot – May 11, 2015

Grass-roots efforts to cultivate an Elizabeth Warren presidential run appear to be withering on the vine as the 2016 Democratic primary firms up, with Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders in the race, and erstwhile Warren activists abandoning their labor of love.

“Whether they are slowing down or not, their momentum is slowing,” said Steve McMahon, a Democratic strategist in Washington, D.C., who hasn’t committed to a presidential candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s one thing to support a hypothetical candidate before Hillary gets in, and it’s one thing to support an opponent to Hillary before Bernie gets in,” McMahon said. “But a lot of progressives who like Warren, at this point support Hillary and want her to win and don’t want her to be hurt in a contentious primary.”

Jim Demers, a prominent New Hampshire Democratic strategist who’s backing Clinton, said the Granite State push to draft U.S. Sen. Warren has been missing in action recently.

“It seems like it has lost a lot of attention, at least in New Hampshire. I haven’t seen the organizer out in a couple of weeks,” Demers said, adding that Clinton may be winning over the Warren crowd with recent moves like embracing one hot-button issue that Warren backers wanted on the agenda — immigration.

“We’re already starting to see some of the issues they were hoping would be in the campaign,” he said.

Hard-line progressive groups like Democracy for America and MoveOn are behind the Warren-for-president movement, but Warren’s repeated refusals to run combined with progressive darling U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders’ entrance into the race has impacted their campaign.

But those behind the Ready For Warren and Run Warren Run organizations aren’t ready to give up. One key strategist behind the Ready for Warren push said the group plans to release another round of big-name former President Obama supporters who are asking Warren to jump into the 2016 campaign.

“If anything, we’re stronger now that not just Hillary but Bernie are in the race,” said the strategist, who asked to remain on background.

There’s already evidence of some defectors, however. Artists for Warren recently endorsed Sanders and Carl Gibson, a progressive activist, journalist and former Warren-for-president supporter, wrote a column recently urging the movement to get behind Sanders.

“The quicker her fans stop waiting in vain, the better chance Sanders will have to fight for the values voters associate with Warren,” Gibson wrote.

GOP

For GOP, too much of a good thing? // CNN // Julian Zelizer – May 10, 2015

(CNN)The Republicans are going to have another free-for-all primary season on their hands. Their contest for the presidential nomination is attracting a huge crowd. For a political party that once insisted on order and hierarchy, always making clear who the next deserving nominee was going to be, today the GOP has taken on the character of a political circus.

With the assistance of super Pac donors who have the capacity to singlehandedly finance candidacies and a decentralized political media with many outlets that are searching for fresh stories, a number of candidates -- Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Ben Carson, Mike Huckabee, Marco Rubio, Carly Fiorina, Lindsey Graham -- have formally or informally entered the contest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Julian Zelizer

There are others, including Ohio Gov. John Kasich, Wisconsin's Scott Walker, New Jersey's Chris Christie and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry who may jump in as well. We seem to be seeing a replay of 2012 where the primaries resembled a WWE battle royal with a huge number of contestants packed inside the steel cage.

Is this good for the party? Is this good for democracy? At one level, it is always good for a party to have some real competition for the top spot in a presidential campaign.

The multiplicity of voices will allow the party to showcase a wider range of ideas and to foster a more robust debate about the direction of the party. Many experts would agree that Hillary Clinton will benefit from having a challenge from Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who will pressure her to deal with issues from the left.

Too many candidates means diluted look at issues

But there is difference between a healthy primary competition and an overabundance of candidates.

What kinds of problems might result from the current trend among Republicans? The most important is that of the wide-open entrance system is creating a huge amount of political space for people with super Pacs to exercise influence. The only way that many of these candidates can mount any kind of challenge is to find powerful donors who are willing to provide them with the money that they need.

As Newt Gingrich did in 2012, candidates are turning to people like Sheldon Adelson who are becoming the new kingpins in American politics. Or to Miami billionaire Norman Braman, who the New York Times reported, is providing Marco Rubio with immense financial support. Over the long run, this will certainly have a corrosive effect on our democratic system as the flow of private money into elections intensifies.

Hypercompetitive, unfiltered primaries also result in a dilution of media attention for any single candidate, including competitors to the leading candidates. The media tends to quickly shift its attention the candidate of the week. The result is that we lose the kind of public focus on sustained indepth coverage that is often helpful for voters to better evaluate the choices that they face.

Opinion: What U.S. conservatives can learn from David Cameron

After Jeb Bush started to seriously show is interest in running, there were a number of important investigative reports about his time as governor of Florida. But those stories already seem like the good old days as the press has shifted to Ben Carson and others. There are so many stories about so many candidates, it is extraordinarily difficult for voters to keep their attention on ongoing investigative work amidst all the noise.

When the debates begin, we will once again see events where each candidates has even less time to answer questions. As Peter Beinart argued in The Atlantic, in the Democratic primaries Sanders has a serious chance to gain attention for his economic issues because the competition on the Democratic side is not so flooded.

What happens with extremist views

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A primary system that allows for so many voices to gain high-visibility platforms also allows for fringe views to gain mainstream attention. This was evident in 2012, when Donald Trump entered the race and found that his birther arguments were gaining national attention.

This wasn't good for the GOP, which had to deal with rather extremist views showcased front and center. Already, as Tim Egan recounts, we have seen a number of shocking statements, ranging from Ben Carson saying that people went into prison straight and came out gay as evidence that people choose homosexuality (Carson later apologized for the remark), to Ted Cruz voicing support for Texans who fear a military takeover of their state.

It can also have dangerous implications for civil dialogue if fringe elements gain treatment as legitimate voices of concern.

From the perspective of the party, one of the threats is that this number of candidates creates an abundance of opportunities for each to go for the jugular against their opponents. With such a crowded field, the incentives increase for each person to become more vicious in their treatment of each other. We saw this in 2012 when the most devastating attacks on Mitt Romney came from Newt Gingrich, who characterized him as a wealthy scion of capital who had been willing to burn entire communities in the pursuit of profit at Bain.

The benefit for Republicans is that in contrast to a seemingly predetermined contest in the Democratic Party, the competition could be more compelling for voters, so they will pay closer attention, and create the impression that the GOP is offering greater diversity within its ranks. But the costs to the party could be significant.

Political competition is a good thing. But it is time to think a little bit about the value that political parties used to bring when they helped to filter through the noise, throwing their support behind others and giving fewer opportunities for marginal candidates to consume too much valuable political time and resources.

Of course, there needs to be a balance between a system of gatekeepers and what we have today.

So some competition is a very good thing but too much can be damaging.

GOP Hopefuls Talk Tough on National Security // WSJ // Janet Hook - May 10, 2015

Republicans running for president face an electorate riddled with anxiety about national security and terrorism—a big mood swing from 2012 and a mixed blessing for the GOP in 2016.

As a weekend candidate forum here illustrated, voters' heightened interest in world affairs gives Republicans a fresh opportunity to lambaste President Barack Obama and show some hawkish swagger toward terrorists.

"We will look for you. We will find you. And we will kill you," said Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, borrowing lines from the action movie "Taken" and getting robust applause from the conservative audience of about 2,200.

But the GOP contenders also face pressure to explain how they—governors, senators and political outsiders with little experience managing world affairs—could shoulder the burden of being leader of the free world.

"Commander in chief is not an entry-level position," said former Sen. Rick Santorum, in a line that could cast doubt on the credentials of the entire GOP field, including Mr. Santorum who lost his Senate seat in 2006.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A spirited foreign policy debate allows Republicans to unify in attacking their likely Democratic opponent, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. But it also opens a split within the GOP.

That division is best illustrated by two presidential contenders who didn't attend Saturday's candidate forum: Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, who argues for greater restraint in U.S. military intervention than most Republicans, and Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, one of the most hawkish members of the party.

Mr. Graham, who is expected to announce his bid for the presidency June 1, has drawn his differences with Mr. Paul in unusually personal terms.

"He is one step behind leading-from-behind," Mr. Graham said in a USA Today interview broadcast Sunday. "I think he'd be the worst possible person to send into the ring when it came to foreign policy."

South Carolina is a particularly welcoming place for Republicans staking out a hawkish platform. The state, which hosts the third presidential nominating contest in 2016 after Iowa and New Hampshire, has eight military bases, more than 74,000 military personnel, including nearly 58,000 military retirees, according to a recent report by the University of South Carolina.

But voters' concern about national security isn't just limited to military-connected communities. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found voters nationally are more concerned about security issues than they were four years ago, before the last presidential election. Asked what issues should be the government's top priority, 21% of poll participants said national security and terrorism—up from 6% in 2012. The shift is especially big for Republicans, who made it their No. 1 issue: 27% named it the top priority, up from 8% in 2012.

That could make this the first election since 2004, when the Iraq war weighed on voters, that candidates' foreign affairs credentials and defense policy stands could factor heavily into presidential politics.

Just in the past year, Americans have been rattled by the rise of Islamic State, also known as ISIS, and the beheadings of the militant group's captives, Russia's takeover of part of Ukraine, and hostilities in the Middle East.

Chad Groover, chairman of the Greenville County Republican Party, said those developments have made national security more important than ever among voters here. "If you had asked me a year ago, I would not have said that. I would have said bread-and-butter issues were primary," Mr. Groover said. "But the way the world is going, with the advent of ISIS, we see the need to have a strong focus."

Adding to voter anxiety is the recent episode in Garland, Texas, where two gunman, believed to be inspired by Islamic State, were killed as they prepared to attack a Prophet Muhammad cartoon contest. "When it's right in your backyard, it wakes you up," said Terri Russ, a health-care worker from Columbia, S.C., who attended the Greenville summit.

Republicans, in their speeches, applauded the police officer who foiled the plot by killing the attackers.

"Thankfully, one police officer helped those terrorists meet their virgins," said Sen. Ted Cruz (R.,Texas).

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who spoke at the South Carolina event before traveling to Israel for the first time, acknowledged his need to study up on international issues. "It's something that, even though as a governor I don't deal with it day in and day out, it has increasingly become one of the most important things for me to focus in on," said Mr. Walker, who hasn't yet formally announced his campaign for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina said that as a business woman she had dealt directly with more heads of state—including Russian President Vladimir Putin—than any other GOP candidate. "The world is a more dangerous and a more tragic place when America is not leading," she said.

While few candidates gave many specifics about what policies they would implement, Ms. Fiorina did. She called for a series of steps to flex U.S. military muscle, including rebuilding the Sixth Fleet in Europe, restoring the missile defense program, and conducting military exercises in the Baltics.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush also didn't attend the South Carolina forum Saturday, instead delivering a commencement address at Liberty University in Virginia. But he weighed in Sunday on a question concerning the use of military force that poses a unique challenge to him among GOP candidates, defining his views compared to his brother's, former President George W. Bush.

In an interview with Fox News, Mr. Bush said that he would have authorized the 2003 U.S. war in Iraq, although he acknowledged that it was a mistake that more was not done to guarantee security in Iraq after Saddam Hussein was removed from power. He reminded the interviewer that Mrs. Clinton, then a U.S. senator also supported the Iraq invasion. And he said his brother agreed that mistakes were made after Saddam's fall.

"So just for the news flash to the world, if they're trying to find places where there's big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those," he said.

Mr. Paul didn't attend the GOP summit because he was in California to open a Silicon Valley campaign office. Although Mr. Paul is not an isolationist in the mold of his father, libertarian Ron Paul who ran multiple long-shot campaigns for president, the senator is more cautious about U.S. military intervention than other 2016 candidates. Early polls suggest he is in a weaker position in South Carolina among Republicans than in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Mr. Graham, who didn't attend the summit in his home state because of family obligations, has been, with his hawkish close ally Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a frequent critic of Mr. Paul.

Mr. Paul could not be reached for comment Sunday on the latest Graham criticism, but in an April interview with Fox News about similar criticism, he said Messrs. McCain and Graham were part of a group he considered "lapdogs" for Mr. Obama's military initiatives overseas.

Carly Fiorina breaks with many in GOP on Obama's trade pitch // CNN // Eric Bradner – May 10, 2015

Washington (CNN)Carly Fiorina says she supports free trade -- yet she doesn't want President Barack Obama to have the congressional green light to finalize a massive Pacific Rim deal.

The former Hewlett Packard executive who's seeking the Republican presidential nomination said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" that Obama "does not have a track record of the details matching his selling point."

Therefore, she said, she opposes trade promotion authority -- legislation that would allow Obama to submit the 12-country Trans-Pacific Partnership to Congress for an up-or-down vote with limited debate and no amendments. That authority, trade negotiators say, is key to getting other countries to sign off on a final deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican congressional leaders have strongly backed Obama's request for the authority. But a bill that would grant it is imperiled as liberal Democrats who oppose expanded trade and tea party Republicans who distrust Obama have linked together to oppose it.

"The truth is, we don't know what's in this deal," Fiorina said.

"I think it's important to understand some of the fine print of what's in this deal," she said. "For example, is China allowed to join this Pacific trading agreement in a couple of years, yes or no?"

Obama has pointed to the deal, which includes Japan, Australia, Canada and Mexico, as a way to counter China's growing influence in the Asia-Pacific. But China is not involved in the negotiations, which are ongoing.

"The point is, what exactly is in this agreement?" Fiorina said. "Because this administration unfortunately has a track record of burying things in fine print ... that turn out to be very different from their selling points."

Carly Fiorina fires back at critics of 'Domaingate' // MSNBC // Nisha Chittal – May 10, 2015

Almost immediately after former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina announced she was running for president last week, her staff was dogged by questions about why they had failed to secure the Web domain carlyfiorina.org , which had been purchased by a Democratic activist who used it to post a message about how many people HP had allegedly laid off while Fiorina was the company's chief executive.

As Fiorina made the media rounds over the next week, she responded to questions from the media about the domain gaffe with a sense of humor – and with a few tricks up her sleeve. During a Wednesday appearance on "Late Night With Seth Meyers," Meyers asked Fiorina about the domain, and Fiorina responded by asking Meyers, "Do you know who owns SethMeyers.org?... I do. I just bought it in the green room!" That domain now redirects to Fiorina's campaign website.

On Sunday morning, she appeared on "Meet The Press" with Chuck Todd, and shortly after the show, she revealed on Twitter that her team had also purchased chucktodd.org – which also now redirects to Fiorina's website.

And late on Sunday, reporters began to notice that HillaryClinton.net now redirects to CarlyForPresident.com as well. It might be easy to assume that this was another work of mischief by the Fiorina campaign – but a spokeswoman for Fiorina confirmed to msnbc that, in fact, the Fiorina campaign did not buy the domain. It's unclear who owns it and when it began redirecting visitors to Fiorina's website.

"Many reporters were nearly giddy about what I've affectionately labeled #domaingate when it came to Republicans, but none had bothered to check hillaryclinton.net or hillaryforpresident.com . I'm now looking forward to all the stories similarly labeling this a major gaffe by the Clinton campaign," Fiorina spokeswoman Sarah Isgur Flores said in an email.

Domain gaffes have started to become a regular occurrence on the campaign trail in this still-nascent presidential contest. First, when Ted Cruz announced he was running for president in March, reporters pointed out that his team had not been able to purchase TedCruz.com, which had been owned for several years by another Ted Cruz, and which displayed a pro-President Obama message. Rand Paul's campaign reportedly spent $100,000 securing the rights to RandPaul.com. Now, Hillary Clinton has her own gaffe on her hands with HillaryClinton.net and HillaryForPresident.com, which redirects to theamerican.net , the personal website of a conservative activist.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's missed domains also seem additionally noteworthy given that the Clinton team has staffed up with many of the top tech talent that worked on Barack Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns.

Future candidates, take note: it would be wise to take the time to buy up every permutation of your name on the Web – or risk letting it fall into someone else's hands.

The Pentagon's Response to Ted Cruz Regarding Jade Helm 15 // Huffington Post // Jason Stanford – May 10, 2015

Recently, Senator Ted Cruz from Texas asked the Pentagon to clarify its intentions with military exercises in Central Texas called "Jade Helm 15." The Pentagon's response follows:

Dear Senator Cruz:

Thank you for your inquiry into whether the Jade Helm 15 military exercise is the first wave of a federal takeover of Texas, the Trojan Horse, as it were, of the end of sovereignty in the Lone Star State. Our response, contrary to the long tradition of official correspondence and military bureaucracy, is concise: no.

But that's just what you would expect us to say, isn't it?

Perhaps, then, you would prefer not an official proclamation but a reasoned answer. As a master debater in college (Princeton, right?), you surely appreciate the reliability of logic, your public statements over the past few years notwithstanding. If you are disinclined to take the United States Armed Forces at their word when we promise no ill intentions towards Texas, then perhaps your considerable and vaunted intellectual powers, which once posited the regrowth of hymens as a guard against unauthorized incursions in domestic affairs, could be swayed by incontrovertible fact.

I know you think highly of our capabilities. Why else would you advocate for a short war with Iran? If we are indeed that powerful, we could probably launch an attack from any of the 15 U.S. military bases already within Texas' borders. While Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher may have found it necessary, even attractive, to invade countries that can easily be overrun, the present DoD considers such lopsided contests at best unsporting.

As someone who was not born within the borders of this country, it might interest you to know that Texas is already part of the United States. In fact, Texas has twice joined the Union. The first time your adopted state joined the USA in 1845 it set in motion events that led to the Mexican-American War. Later, when Union troops conquered the Southern rebellion, Texas rejoined the Union. It is not, therefore, farfetched to think that Texas' relationship to the rest of the United States could involve war, but please also keep in mind that when we refer to the United States of America, Texas is being implicitly included. We thought about calling it the United States of America and Texas, but we were afraid people might think Texas was a retrograde backwater of reactionary lunatics who think Moses was a Founding Father and laugh at you. This is way better.

Please also consider there are a great many things about Texas and Texan culture that could be threatened by another unnecessary armed conflict between Texas and the United States. We like Texas barbecue. That Green Beret who carried the flag out for the Texas Longhorn football team? That was pretty cool. The wildflowers along the highways are no joke. The late Texan Chris Kyle, the "American sniper," is a hero to many. Texas gave the world Lyndon Johnson, a staggering gift for which America was perhaps not entirely prepared. Without the Lone Star State, the Western swing band Bob Wills and His Texas Playboys would have appeared under the performing name Robert Wills and His Playboys, which is ghastly, or not have existed at all, a possibility that DoD has officially classified as "too awful to contemplate". And we really dig the self-awareness, the love of self that, while occasionally metastasizing into paranoid delusions such as those that motivated your original query, also make Texas a culture with an indelible sense of place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But, we reiterate, that place is in the United States. On previous visits, we noticed that many of your residents enjoy Social Security and Medicare (you're welcome), volunteer for the armed services, treasure federal parks, wildlife preserves, and wilderness areas, and earn and spend currency backed by the full faith and credit of the United States. With a quick Internet search, I also learned that nearly a third of Texas' total revenue is from Federal funding. In fact, millions of your schoolchildren pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America almost every day. And unlike yourself, they apparently mean it.

There is a fundamental misapprehension that we feel is at the root of your query about our intentions was revealed in a recent comment you made to the press.

We are assured it is a military training exercise. I have no reason to doubt those assurances, but I understand the reason for concern and uncertainty, because when the federal government has not demonstrated itself to be trustworthy in this administration, the natural consequence is that many citizens don't trust what it is saying.

If, Senator Cruz, you believe that the United States military is a political tool of its civilian leadership, you have reached a conclusion unsupported by fact, history and good sense. The troops swear to uphold the Constitution of the United States. To besmirch their loyalty to the country, even in the service of making hackneyed political points in the Republican primary, does not make you a patriot, but a partisan. Even a Princeton and Harvard Law man should know the difference.

Also, it makes you the rudest Canadian we've ever run across.

Sincerely Yours,

Secretary Ashton Carter

Mike Huckabee Defends Endorsement of Diabetes Product // First Draft –NYT // Nicholas Confessore – May 10, 2015

Mike Huckabee, the Republican presidential candidate, defended his endorsement of a dubious diabetes remedy on Sunday, telling an interviewer that “if that’s the worst thing somebody can say to me” then “I’m going to be a heck of a good president.”

The former Arkansas governor, who wrote a book about weight loss after dropping 100 pounds, has more recently appeared in infomercials hawking a “weird spice, kitchen-cabinet cure” for diabetes that consists mostly of dietary supplements. He has also endorsed the treatment, which medical doctors caution against using, through his vast mailing list, along with a cure for cancer said to be hidden in verses of the Bible.

But Mr. Huckabee, appearing on the CBS program “Face the Nation,” downplayed the supplements on Sunday, arguing they were a minor part of the treatment he promoted.

“One of the elements of the plan was dietary supplements, but it’s not the fundamental thing,” Mr. Huckabee said. “The fundamental thing is always, as you and I both know, it’s exercise, it’s good eating habits, it’s maintaining sugar levels, it’s not eating a bunch of junk food, processed food, lots of carbs, sugar, those type of things.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Huckabee, who broke off as a spokesman for the diabetes product not long before announcing he would make another bid for the White House, also suggested it was unfair to press him on the issue.

“I don’t have to defend everything that I’ve ever done,” Mr. Huckabee said. “I’m not doing those infomercials, obviously, now as a candidate for president.”

Mike Huckabee: Nothing wrong with diabetes infomercials // Politico // Eliza Collins – May 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee on Sunday defended his endorsement of a diabetes kit whose effectiveness has been challenged.

“If that’s the worst thing that somebody can say to me, is that I advocated for people who have diabetes to do something to reverse it and stop the incredible pain of that, then I’m going to be a heck of a good president,” the former Arkansas governor said on CBS’ “Face the Nation.”

In an infomercial that had been airing for the Diabetes Solution Kit, Huckabee said he lost 110 pounds and reversed his diabetes.

CBS host Bob Schieffer said National Journal reported that the infomercial for the product was “simply not supported by the medical community.” And Huckabee answered a question from Schieffer, who also has diabetes, about whether the kit included pills.

“No, no, there was not pills — that’s a misnomer. One of the elements of the plan was dietary supplements, but it’s not the fundamental thing,” Huckabee said, explaining the key elements of the plan were healthy eating, exercise and maintaining blood-sugar levels.

Diabetes is one of the top four diseases that are costing Americans in the health care system, Huckabee said, adding that the disease needs to be approached by looking for cures rather than just through treatment.

Huckabee said he’s no longer doing the infomercials now that he is a presidential candidate.

Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson May Play Key Roles in Republican Race // NYT // Albert Hunt – May 10, 2015

None of the three candidates who joined the Republican presidential contest last week — Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson — will win the nomination.

That’s the view of politically smart strategists who nevertheless say that all three, especially Mr. Huckabee, could play important roles in shaping the race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First, here's why these latest entries are unlikely to prevail. The Republican coalition has three pillars, all relatively conservative: economic, national security and social issues. A candidate has to be acceptable to at least two of the three. At this stage, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and perhaps Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky make the grade.

Mr. Huckabee — the populist Baptist preacher, former Arkansas governor and talk-show host — doesn't. He is adored by the social right, hated by economic conservatives and isn't respected by many national security hawks.

Moreover, there's skepticism about his ability to raise the funds to go the distance. In 2008, after winning the initial Iowa caucuses, he lacked the resources to compete through the nominating process. There's a general sense that 2012 was his time. He passed.

Mr. Carson, a prominent physician, and Ms. Fiorina, the former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, are political novices, neither has ever been elected to office. The supposed appeal of nonpoliticians in America is superficial.

In a Wall Street Journal/NBC poll released last week, almost 70 percent said they would be uncomfortable with a presidential candidate who lacks previous experience in government.

Mr. Carson and Ms. Fiorina, both cancer survivors, have appealing narratives. Mr. Carson's résumé is more impressive: He is one of the world's most renowned pediatric neurosurgeons. (He once operated on our son.) Ms. Fiorina was fired as C.E.O. of Hewlett-Packard and generally gets negative reviews for her performance.

The possible import of Mr. Carson, who espouses a hard-right line and has attracted a following in places such as Iowa, is that movement conservatives account for half of the vote in several early contests. Governor Walker and Senator Rubio could get a small slice of those votes, as will Senator Paul, whose basic appeal is to libertarians.

More than 40 percent of the vote is likely to go to a movement right aspirant. In 2012, the Iowa caucus was won with 24 percent of the vote, in a smaller and less capable field.

The difference between Mr. Carson getting 5 percent and 10 percent may well decide if one of the movement right candidates tops 20 percent, which could be first place.

The top two right-wing candidates are Mr. Huckabee and Senator Cruz. A no-holds-barred debate between these tough customers, similar in ideology, vastly different in style, would be worthy of Las Vegas. Senator Cruz, a brilliant lawyer and champion debater, would assail Mr. Huckabee as a tax-increasing governor who commuted the sentences of hardened criminals, including one who went on to commit murder.

The folksy and fiery Mr. Huckabee could attack the Texas senator for supporting President Obama on free trade and for his ties to Wall Street and the Republican donor class.

Ms. Fiorina's corporate background is probably better preparation for politics than brain surgery. She's unlikely to make embarrassing gaffes like Mr. Carson's recent charge, which he later retracted, that people enter prison as heterosexuals and leave gay.

Elements of the Republican establishment welcome Ms. Fiorina's candidacy. She's the only woman, and the party has a gender problem. She's a willing attack dog against Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet if she ever does better than the point or two that she scores in current polls, it would likely be at the expense of an establishment type such as Mr. Bush.

In the most wide open Republican race in the past half-century, there are no certainties, and maybe even no likelihoods. A year from now it's improbable that we'll look back on the events of the past week as seminal, but they may affect how the race looks then.

Lindsey Graham: Hillary Clinton is beatable, but GOP is getting 'creamed' at the polls by non-white voters // RawStory // Tom Boggioni – May 10, 2015

In an interview on USA Today's "Capital Download," South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) said he was "98.6 percent sure" he'll run for the Republican presidential nomination, but admitted that the GOP has a problem with non-white voters where his party is getting "creamed."

Graham said that he will announce his candidacy soon, joining an already crowded field of candidates, all of whom believe they can beat presumptive Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton.

"There's a reason there's a lot of people running on our side," Graham explained. "We all think we can beat Hillary. The world is falling apart. I think I have a good background. Experience and judgement to re-set what I think is radical Islam running wild. We're gonna get hit hard if something doesn't change."

While Graham believes that Clinton is beatable, he doesn't believe that it will be easy.

"I think she's going to be a tough candidate, but I think she represents the third term of a failed presidency," Graham said. "The only way we'd lose this election is if we beat ourselves, and that's very possible. But we're getting creamed with non-white voters."

Talk then turned to the contentious immigration debate within the Republican Party, with Graham taking a softer and more conciliatory approach to undocumented immigrants.

"If I were president of the United States, I would veto any bill that did not have a pathway to citizenship," Graham explained. "You would have a long, hard path to citizenship ... but I want to create that path because I don't like the idea of millions of people living in America for the rest of their lives being the hired help. That's not who we are."

No interview with Graham would be complete without him taking a shot at rival Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, with Graham questioning Paul's foreign policy positions, saying he "is leading from behind."

"At the end of the day, his world view has not stood the test of time and I think he'd be the worst possible person to send into the ring when it came to foreign policy," Graham said, adding that Clinton "could get to his right very easily."

Rand Paul Courts San Francisco's Techies // BuzzFeed // Ellen Cushing – May 10, 2015

The Republican presidential hopeful talks Snapchat and won't take questions In San Francisco.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's a beautiful Saturday afternoon in one of the most liberal cities in America, and Rand Paul — the Republican United States senator from Kentucky running for president — is talking about Snapchat.

"We use Snapchat more than anybody else out there," he brags during a speech in San Francisco. The crowd loves it. It's a Snapchat kind of crowd.

Paul is speaking from a concrete-floored South of Market coworking space, StartupHouse, that will soon become the campaign's home in San Francisco. The audience is made up of more than a hundred Rand fans and at least a dozen reporters. One entire wall is covered in chalkboard paint and pink and blue handwritten messages. Startup-y miscellany clutters nearly every empty surface — papers, all manner of cords and chargers, one $4,400 check, uncashed. One guy is wearing a shirt that says "freelance developer." Another has a laptop sticker that reads "I don't believe the liberal agenda." He's livetweeting. The event is called — and, really, there is nothing else it could be called — Disrupting Democracy. It's all very two point omg.

And it is certainly very new.

As Vincent Harris, a Paul staffer who sat near the back tweeting from the senator's Twitter account, told BuzzFeed News, Paul's campaign is the only one with a tech advisory board, a CTO, a digital strategist, and offices in both San Francisco and Austin, Texas. Another attendee, Matt Shupe, a thirtysomething political consultant, points out that it's rare for a politician on either side of the aisle to treat California as anything other than an ATM, hosting free, open events such as this one.

Paul's commitment to courting Silicon Valley is genuine, if a bit puzzling — California hasn't gone red in a presidential contest since 1988, and as San Francisco Chronicle political columnist Carla Marinucci noted toward the end of the panel, "the tech community voted overwhelmingly for Barack Obama in the last election." But Silicon Valley is nothing if not relentlessly optimistic in the face of mounting obstacles and historic reality. There's a case to be made that liberal San Francisco's backlash against the Google Busses and the Twitter tax breaks have served to alienate the tech community, and that, if pitched right, Paul's particular brand of civil libertarianism could square with Silicon Valley's iconoclastic ethos.

At any rate, the people crowded into StartupHouse seemed to believe it could. "We're here in San Francisco to show that we're a different kind of Republican, and we're here to compete for every vote," Paul said at the end of his short speech, to positively thunderous applause.

After the event — a clean 38 minutes, including opening remarks and a panel discussion — he was mobbed by people requesting selfies and autographs; one fan, a youngish guy in a corduroy blazer, chased the Senator about his startup, a voter engagement app. Think Rand Paul as VC. And then, he was out.

Outside on the sidewalk past the scrum of picture-takers and startup-pitchers, I chased Paul down. Although he'd fielded questions from attendees, he had dodged the press. I wanted to see if I could ask him a quick question. But he wasn't having it. This stop was but one of many.

So the Senator from Kentucky trotted off into the sun, surrounded by aides and bodyguards. I squinted after them, trying to see the car he got into — look for the tell-tale Uber sticker or Lyft mustache — but no luck; he had already turned a corner.

Rand Paul Talks About Appealing to Young People on Tech Issues // National Journal // Eric Garcia - May 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a speech in San Francisco, presidential candidate Rand Paul told Silicon Valley conservatives that he could win over Californians and other voters not normally associated with the Republican Party largely on issues of civil liberties and technology.

At the Disrupting Democracy speaker series hosted by Lincoln Labs, a tech-friendly conservative organization, Paul made the case for appealing to younger voters by way of ending mass data collection, an activity he said went against one of the main reasons young people voted for Barack Obama in 2008.

"I also think people who voted for President Obama was because they thought he was a civil libertarian," Paul said.

Saturday's speech was part of Paul's message of reaching to nontraditional GOP voters. Last year, he spoke at the University of California at Berkeley, which is not viewed as a conservative bastion.

Paul made the case that criminal justice reform could be a way to appeal to voters, noting that the Republican Party often touts itself as the party of the Second Amendment.

"I want to also be the party of the First Amendment, the Fourth Amendment but also the Fifth and Sixth Amendment," Paul said. As part of this, Paul talked about restoring the right to vote for convicted felons.

Paul also held firm to his opposition to net neutrality, saying he had not seen concerns about internet monopolies that could control rates being manifested.

"I don't think there is yet evidence that there's absolute control of rates," adding if there was any organization involved with monopolies, it was government monopolies. Paul also dismissed the idea that it would make it harder for small startup companies to succeed.

"The government didn't create Facebook and the government didn't create Google," he said.

Another issue to which Paul stated his opposition was the refinancing student loans, an idea championed by some progressives, such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

"It'd lead to chaos," he said, also criticizing the White House proposal for free community college as "absurd," and instead suggested his proposal to make college tuition tax-deductible.

"People said there wouldn't be enough money for government; well, government would have to be smaller," Paul said.

Meanwhile, Paul pushed back on an idea being promoted by the California secretary of state to make voter registration automatic.

"I am of the belief that getting off your sofa to participate is required," Paul said, adding that he did not like the idea of having ballots mailed to voters, even though some have posited that Republicans are more likely to vote by mail, while Democrats are likely to vote early and in person.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul Plays Down Comments on Military Exercise After Mockery // First Draft – NYT // Jeremy Peters – May 10, 2015

SAN FRANCISCO — Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky has been mocked by liberal pundits who accused him of fanning conspiracy theories about a military exercise along the Texas border, an event that some on the far right believe is a covert effort to impose martial law.

But in an interview this weekend, Mr. Paul said he had no idea what the training exercise — known as Jade Helm — was when he was first asked about it last month on an Iowa radio program.

“Someone on a radio program asked me what it was. I didn’t know,” Mr. Paul said after he christened a new work space for his presidential campaign in the Bay Area. He expressed befuddlement at how his comments about “that ridiculous Jade something” had been blown out of proportion.

“I said sure, I’ll ask my staff to look into it because I didn’t know what it was,” he said.

The comments that drew ridicule by people like Bill Maher, who accused Mr. Paul of pandering to the right-wing fringe, occurred on the Jan Mickelson program. Mr. Mickelson brought up the exercise, telling the senator, “I’d like to know what the rest of the story is on that.”

Mr. Paul replied, “We’ll look at that also.”

Other Republicans, like Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, have gone further. Mr. Cruz said he had no reason to doubt the military’s motives, but added that the paranoia was expected because the Obama administration has stoked questions about its honesty. “I understand the reason for concern and uncertainty because the federal government has not demonstrated itself to be trustworthy in this administration.”

Hillaryclinton.Net Redirects To Carly Fiorina Campaign Website // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer - May 10, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina has launched #DomainGate on Twitter. She is seemingly buying up celebrity domains to push her campaign message. Those going to hillaryclinton.net , for example, find themselves at Fiornia’s campaign Website.

Breitbart News previously reported Fiorina schooled Seth Meyers on his show, Late Night with Seth Meyers by buying SethMeyers.org.

Meyers noted that someone had purchased CarlyFiorina.org using it to bash Fiorina as former CEO of Hewlett Packard.

“Carly Fiorina failed to register this domain. So I’m using it to tell you how many people she laid off at Hewlett-Packard,” read a note on CarlyFiorina.org.

The site displays a page of frowning faces, captioned by: “That’s 30,000 people she laid off. People with families.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It appears Fiorina didn't stop with SethMeyers.org. She appeared on Meet The Press Sunday and redirected ChuckTodd.org to her site as well.

If you got to any of the three sites, you are redirected to her campaign site, CarlyforPresident.com.

Waiting for Jeb to jump // Politico // Glenn Thrush – May 10, 2015

By the end of last week, almost everyone had jumped into the pool. Almost everyone except John Ellis Bush, who still sits at the water's edge of the 2016 presidential campaign, suit dry except for the stray splash thrown his way by his jostling Republican rivals Mike Huckabee, Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz and Rand Paul.

It wasn't clear at the time, but is increasingly so now, that Jeb Bush's decision last December to signal, but not formally announce, his candidacy was a short-term logistical masterstroke befitting his family's reputation for mastering the mechanics of elections. His undeclared status has freed him to raise what aides are saying will be as much as $100 million from rich patrons and outside groups (the second he files presidential paperwork, he's prevented from requesting big super PAC checks), and it has temporarily shielded him from being the target of shots many of his would-be opponents are leveling at Hillary Clinton. (Aside, that is, from lots of hand-wringing about the increasingly hereditary nature of American politics, and mockery of his insistence that he'll be his "own man" on foreign policy.)

This inversion — building a campaign on the back of a super PAC instead of vice versa — is novel and could be a model for the future, but it also puts a lot of pressure on an opaque candidate who publicly has done little more than a set of sporadic, low-octane speeches with few specifics to offer. Given his fundraising focus, he's already dogged by the notion, eagerly pushed by his enemies among the party's tea party hard-liners, that he's a bankroll in search of a soul.

Which is why we'll see the media coverage of the Republican presidential race coalesce, and soon, around a single question: Is Bush actually the front-runner, or just a guy with a lot of money trying to buy the nomination?

A dozen or so Republican operatives and donors I spoke with last week, most of them open to a Bush candidacy, didn't have a clue how that question will be ultimately be answered, but it's a decisive one, and they are antsy to find out. The early polls, which show Jeb getting clobbered in Iowa, barely ahead — if at all — in New Hampshire, and trading a narrow lead nationally with his fellow Floridian Marco Rubio, are predicting a ferociously competitive campaign. But who knows how it will play out when Bush actually announces? "A month ago, the whole story was that Hillary was rusty, that she hadn't been out there doing anything," said a veteran GOP operative who worked on one of George W. Bush's campaigns. "Well, she's been out there taking hits for a month. Jeb hasn't. It's time to get this thing going."

Nicolle Wallace, a White House communications director to George W. Bush who started her political life as a 25-year-old adviser to Jeb Bush in Florida, also sees undeniable parallels with the Democrats' presumptive nominee, Hillary Clinton. "I think some of their strengths are parallel. Some of their strengths are on the policy side, not the retail political side. I think some of their strengths are in a room, not on a stage," she told me during a taping of last week's POLITICO podcast.

"I think they have some of the same weaknesses, too. They're both in a constituent-free zone. Neither of them represents anybody right now. Neither of them is advocating on anyone's behalf, except their own campaigns. And I think it's awkward, frankly, for both of them."

Bush's campaign is slowly, inevitably pushing him into the water, nudging him into more high-stakes situations ahead of a formal announcement that could come as early as mid-June. People close to the campaign tell me he plans to do some press-the-flesh retail campaigning on a trip to New Hampshire in late May — and his Liberty University commencement address on Saturday was a risky operation, considering the rock-star reception conservative fire breather Ted Cruz received at the Jerry Falwell-founded school when he announced his candidacy there in March.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, a midlife convert to Roman Catholicism, used the speech to emphasize that he is a man of deep belief — a key signifier in a party that values faith. But he also sought to differentiate himself from other candidates who more explicitly bring their religious fervor to their politics, namely Huckabee and Cruz, warning against feeding into Democratic arguments that the GOP is turning into a party of religious rigidity. “The mistake is to confuse points of theology with moral principles that are knowable to reason as well as by faith,” Bush said, pointedly refusing to bash the move toward legalizing same-sex marriage that Cruz has embraced as an affront to his faith. “And this confusion is all part of a false narrative that casts religious Americans as intolerant scolds, running around trying to impose their views on everyone.”

The timing of the Liberty address also spoke to Bush’s conflict-avoidance strategy. He skipped the crowded, potentially more contentious venue of the South Carolina Freedom Summit in Greenville attended by just about every other candidate in the field except Rand Paul and Chris Christie.

The Republican most unconstrained in his willingness to attack Bush declared his intention to run last Wednesday. Huckabee, the roly-poly former Arkansas governor who reportedly made a fortune selling a dubious diabetes cure, is viewed by most of the news media as comic relief (he once quipped that “Jesus was too smart to ever run for public office,” when asked what his savior would say about the death penalty), but he could prove to be a very dangerous foil for a patrician candidate with the last name Bush.

No candidate in the race on either side is more comfortable throwing around the populist economic rhetoric than Huckabee, who, despite his $3 million mansion on the Gulf Coast and affection for private jet travel, seems genuinely irked that his party keeps pushing fancy-pants plutocrats to the top, and he appears to relish taking on Bush. The signature rhetorical move of the early 2016 Republican primary is the dual-purpose swipe: a shot at Hillary Clinton that doubles as a Bush diss. (Rubio, lumping Clinton and Bush together, recently declared, “I think the 21st century is going to be better than the 20th century.”)

Huckabee’s swipes at Bush are even less thinly veiled than that — and they are aimed directly at Bush’s big-money donor base, in mid-American populist language that could have come from leftist hero Elizabeth Warren — or William Jennings Bryan for that matter. “The Dodd-Frank banking bill was written to punish the banks that supposedly got us in trouble,” he told a small audience in South Carolina on Friday. “They are bigger now than they ever were.”

He has a knack for making personal attacks seem folksy and somehow not out of line. Back in 2008, he went on Jay Leno’s show to poke fun at Mitt Romney, who had emerged as a serious challenger to eventual GOP nominee John McCain. “People are looking for a presidential candidate who reminds them of the guy they work with rather than the guy who laid them off,” Huckabee said, a soundbite studied, amplified and broadcast to much effect by President Barack Obama’s 2012 reelection campaign against Romney.

Huckabee is already at it again this year, with the unrestrained zeal of a man aiming less for real power than one last folk-hero turn on the national stage. “I don’t come from a family dynasty, but a working family. I grew up blue collar, not blue blood,” he said during his campaign kick-off announcement last week, with special emphasis on the final two words of the sentence. Everyone knew he was talking about Bush.

Will it matter? Huckabee’s impressive victory in the 2008 Iowa caucuses makes him a force to be reckoned with, but he isn’t doing quite as well in Iowa this time — in part because voters have seen his act before, in part because Cruz is making a harder-edged appeal for evangelicals — he’s currently a middle-of-the-pack 11 percent in recent polls. But Bush is in far worse shape — at 5 percent with disapproval ratings north of 50 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, on the map of 2016, New Hampshire looms even larger, just as it did for Romney four years ago, but even this won't be an easy one for Bush. A WMUR Granite State poll taken earlier this month showed him leading the increasingly packed pack with 15 percent of the vote, but Rubio is a close second at 12 percent.

That Bush is increasingly, inevitably, becoming a focal point of 2016 came as welcome news in the utilitarian, poorly air-conditioned warren of re-purposed bank back offices that serves as Hillary Clinton's headquarters in Brooklyn. There was a clear feeling, for the first time, among Clinton's inner circle last week that she won't be alone on the firing line for long. "The whole dynamic of the race changes when the Republicans start attacking each other, when Jeb gets in," Tom Nides, a former Clinton State Department aide close to the campaign, told me.

Indeed, while Bush-bashing is likely to become a favored new sport among the 20 Republicans clamoring for attention, Clinton's cardinal advantage as a candidate — the absence of deep intraparty division over her candidacy — might have actually paid real dividends for the first time last week.

To the uninitiated in Clinton world, it was a week awash in badish news: Bill Clinton was on NBC during an Africa trip defending his foundation's multiple mistakes in hyperdefensive, cringe-inducing 1990s legalese (his staff had done nothing "knowingly improper," he said); Hillary Clinton agreed to testify in public session during House Republican hearings on Benghazi; and she drew her first declared primary opponent, Vermont independent Bernie Sanders.

But none of those hits seemed to faze the Clinton people who have begun their slow, steady occupation of the bars and brew pubs of nearby Brooklyn Heights. For the first time in her month-old candidacy, Clinton went on the offensive and pitched something bold: a promise not only to support but also to expand President Barack Obama's immigration reform executive order, which has offered 5 million undocumented immigrants a path to citizenship.

"I would do everything possible under the law to go even further," Clinton told a predominantly Hispanic audience in Las Vegas on Tuesday, signaling the possibility of halting deportations for parents of "Dreamers," children whose parents brought them to the U.S. illegally.

The national media was still chewing over the implications of the Clinton speech two days later, on Thursday, when Sanders made his formal announcement, which was easily overshadowed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and some other Republicans blasting Clinton's idea as "amnesty," Bush and Chris Christie dodging the question, and White House officials griping that Clinton didn't give Obama enough credit.

No doubt, Sanders' core case against Clinton, that she is just another defender — and major financial beneficiary — of a system that protects the ultrawealthy at the expense of everybody else will have its day when Sanders scores points in a debate or surges in an Iowa poll. "There will be a time this fall, mark my words, when Bernie Sanders or [former Maryland governor and possible Democratic presidential candidate] Martin O'Malley will have his moment," one senior Clinton aide told me. "But it's not going to be because we haven't addressed issues like economic inequality."

How much does Clinton's left flank need protecting? Not quite as much as last time. Clinton's people have been aggressively promoting the storyline that she is a looser, more relaxed, more authentic candidate than in 2008, but for now it's not personality but the absence of a threatening progressive challenger — armed with an issue as damaging as her 'yes' vote on the Iraq War — that is allowing Clinton to go on offense. More importantly, the Clinton team believes she won't have too much trouble debunking the notion she's not a true liberal: Clinton will take her hits from the Warren-Sanders wing of the party for her associations with Wall Street, they say, but she is completely in step with the broader progressive agenda on jobs, unions, the environment, social issues and especially immigration.

Indeed, as Sanders was entering the race, some Clinton surrogates were making the case that the wild-haired

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brooklyn native was to the right of Clinton on gun control — helpfully reminding reporters that Sanders, while representing liberal but gun-loving Vermont, has sided with the National Rifle Association on many gun-control measures, including Bill Clinton's Brady Law.

Yet the challenges posed by Huckabee to Bush and by Sanders to Clinton are real, and rooted in a deep dissatisfaction with the status quo, a dissatisfaction that can't help but be a liability for perhaps the two candidates in modern history most representative of the dynastic political establishment.

If they somehow manage to make it to the general election, voters will witness a multibillion-dollar dual-rebranding initiative designed to turn two American royals into commoners.

It's already begun: Hillary's first political act as a 2016 candidate was visiting a Chipotle, incognito, in her "Scooby Van" to order a chicken burrito bowl.

Not to be outdone, Jeb — with, no doubt, the devastating 1992 image of his father standing dumbstruck before a New Hampshire supermarket scanner — insisted upon a public rebuttal. I go to Chipotle, too, Jeb insisted. Then he paused. "Drive my own car. Park my own car. Get out of my own car."

Choices, choices: Republicans ponder crowded field // USA Today // David Jackson – May 10, 2015

Republican primary voters face an unusual test in 2016.

Multiple choice.

The party that usually features well-established favorites in its primary races is now looking at a free-for-all with more than a dozen aspirants, each of whom facing his — and her — own unique test: standing out in a very crowded field.

"It feels like anybody can just jump in!" said Kirstin Griffin, 43, a Greenville preschool teacher's aide who listened to some of the candidates at a weekend forum in upstate South Carolina.

"I think it's good," she added. "Everyone has to prove themselves."

That's what brought Scott Walker, Ted Cruz, Rick Santorum, Rick Perry, Bobby Jindal, Ben Carson, John Bolton, George Pataki, Carly Fiorina and Donald Trump to a weekend "Freedom Summit" in downtown Greenville. It's why Jeb Bush delivered a commencement address at Virginia's Liberty University, the religious school founded by Jerry Falwell.

In the coming months, candidates such as Rand Paul and Mike Huckabee — and perhaps Chris Christie, Lindsey Graham and John Kasich, as well — will travel to Pizza Ranches in Iowa, high schools in New Hampshire and barbecue pits in South Carolina.

They'll be giving interviews to local media, making online sales pitches, and — for those who can afford it — cutting spots for local radio and television ads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In August, the crowded Republican field will try to draw contrasts in what likely will be the most important encounters: debates.

All this activity has a single goal: getting attention from voters in early caucus and primary states.

"I am looking for charisma in a candidate," said Dan Herren, 43, an advertising account manager for radio stations in South Carolina. "You have to communicate effectively."

Herren and other South Carolina Republicans who watched candidates at the Peace Center for the performing arts said they want a nominee who can forcefully carry the conservative message on issues like immigration, reducing the federal debt and fighting terrorism.

They're also looking for someone who can actually win the general election in 2016, probably against Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton.

"Let's face it," Herren said. "Hillary Clinton is a lot like her husband. ... She can communicate very well."

Katie Stoddard, 31, a public relations specialist from Greenwood, S.C., said that, right now, the Republican candidates are stuck on "talking points" and giving people "a lot of the same-old-same-old." At some point, she said, the GOP contenders will have to start giving voters more specifics.

"Fundraising is going to be big," she added.

Also big is the series of Republican Party-sponsored debates expected to begin in August.

"That's going to separate the men from the boys, as they say," said Peggy James, 78, a retired retail manager from Mauldin, S.C.

Sipping a Pepsi in the lobby the of the Peace Center, James said candidates have to prove to GOP voters they have sufficient "fire in the belly" to make a successful race.

"They show it by conviction (voters) can feel," she said. "You can see it."

The Republicans will be looking for votes in what may be the most wide-open GOP race in seven decades.

In years past, Republicans have tended to bestow presidential nominations on the next one in line.

Think Richard Nixon in 1960 (and 1968), or Ronald Reagan in 1980, George H.W. Bush in 1988, or Bob Dole in 1996. Even John McCain, after faltering early in the 2008 campaign, rallied in part because of his status as a political veteran. Mitt Romney played the role of heir apparent in the 2012 race.

Republicans have also had well-funded "establishment" candidates at the start of races. Early support helped George W. Bush stave off McCain's "maverick" challenge in 2000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even when the Republicans have competitive races, they tend to be smallish affairs. Dwight Eisenhower overtook conservative stalwart Robert Taft in 1952. Another conservative leader, Barry Goldwater, held off a series of more moderate challengers to claim the GOP nomination in 1964.

This time around, "it's no one's turn," said Bruce Haynes, a Republican consultant who hails from South Carolina.

"We're shopping in the new car lot," he said.

One model is Jeb Bush, the son and brother of Republican presidents, who is likely to be the best-funded candidate. But party members in South Carolina and elsewhere question the former Florida's governor's commitment to conservatism, as well as the prospects of a "third Bush" seeking the presidency.

Other candidates are also stressing their gubernatorial experience. This group includes current state executives Walker (Wisconsin), Christie (New Jersey) and Jindal (Louisiana), as well as ex-governors Perry (Texas) and Huckabee (Arkansas). Another sitting governor — John Kasich of Ohio — may also join the GOP fray in the coming weeks.

A group of senators is also pursuing the Republican nomination. Rubio of Florida, Cruz of Texas and Paul of Kentucky have formally declared their candidacies, and Graham of South Carolina may soon follow suit.

The Republican field also includes non-officeholders who are campaigning against what they call "professional politicians." The outsider group includes businesswoman Carly Fiorina and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson. Businessman and television personality Donald Trump is again flirting with a Republican presidential bid.

As voting time approaches early next year, candidates will begin staking out early states best suited to them. The Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary are expected to be in early in February; Nevada and South Carolina figure to hold contests in late February.

"You pick your spots," said Republican analyst Rich Galen.

Right now, Republican voters are still in the "flavor of the month" stage, said Linda Slaton, 67, a retired speech therapist from Greenville.

"They'll weed out," she said. "It's nice to have choices."

Jeb Bush says he, Hillary Clinton would have backed Iraq invasion // Fox News // May 10, 2015

Former Florida GOP Gov. Jeb Bush says that he would have authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq but acknowledges that mistakes were made after Saddam Hussein had been removed from power, in an exclusive interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly.

"I would have [authorized the invasion], and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody. And so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got," Bush told Kelly in a wide-ranging interview that will be aired Monday night.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush says the United States failed to focus on security first, which he argues led Iraqis to turn on the military because there was no protection for families. However, he challenged the idea that the security issue was a point disagreement between him and his brother, President George W. Bush, who ordered the invasion.

“By the way, guess who thinks that those mistakes took place as well? George W. Bush,” Jeb Bush said. “Yes, I mean, so just for the news flash to the world, if they’re trying to find places where there’s big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those.”

Bush also talked about his views on immigration reform and whether he could get his ideas through a GOP primary should he decide to run for president.

“I mean, there’s got to be a point where we fix this system so that legal immigration is easier than illegal immigration and show some respect for people,” he said. To “a kid that might have been here 10 years, that might be a valedictorian of their high school, to say, 'No, no, no, you’re not allowed to go to college,' I just think there’s a point passed which we’re over the line. “

On the issue of whether he could persuade people in the conservative wing of the party to agree with him, Bush said that he believed he could but that standing by his beliefs at the same time is equally important.

“But here’s the deal, Megyn, if I go beyond the consideration of running to be an actual candidate, do you want people to just bend with the wind, to mirror people’s sentiment whoever is in front of you? ‘Oh, yes, I used to be for that but now, I’m for this.’ Is that the way we want to elect presidents?”

Can Rubio or Bush help Republicans finally win Latino vote in 2016? // LAT // Mark Z. Barabak - May 10, 2015

Once an afterthought, Latino voters have moved to the center of the 2016 presidential campaign, the object of early and unprecedented courtship by candidates on both sides.

The efforts, both substantive and symbolic, reflect a political map that has changed dramatically with the transformation of states such as Nevada, Colorado and others that are no longer the white, Republican bastions of old.

President Obama twice carried Nevada, Colorado, Virginia and Florida, thanks in good part to strong support among their growing Latino populations; in Nevada, the Latino share of the vote has tripled in the last 20 years.

All four are once more expected to be among the few competitive states in 2016.

Jeb Bush

“I know about the immigrant experience because I married a beautiful girl from Mexico. My children are bicultural and bilingual,” Republican Jeb Bush points out. (Alex Wong / Getty Images)

A key question is whether the eventual Democratic nominee can cement those gains for elections to come, or Republicans can reverse their dismal performance of the last two presidential contests and, by doing so, expand their narrow path to the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans seem to stand their best chance in years of harvesting Latino support with the candidacy of Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants; and the expected run by the state's former governor, Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican-born and who is fluent in both the Spanish language and Latino culture.

Every week seemingly brings a new Bush appearance before Latino voters — a town hall in Puerto Rico, a speech to evangelical leaders in Houston — where he delivers, in English and Spanish, a message unlike any heard from previous Republican presidential hopefuls.

First, though, he and Rubio have to navigate their party's nominating process, a course dominated by white conservatives who favor a hard-line approach to immigration reform, the very issue that has driven so many Latinos into the arms of Democrats.

"In essence, Hispanic voters tell us our party's position ... has become a litmus test, measuring whether we are meeting them with a welcome mat or a closed door," members of a Republican task force wrote in a postmortem after the party's nominee, Mitt Romney, won fewer than 3 in 10 Latino votes in 2012.

The most specific policy recommendation in the 97-page autopsy was support for comprehensive immigration reform, which, translated, means going beyond the law enforcement remedies favored by the party's bedrock supporters. Of the top-tier candidates, only Bush and Rubio have embraced that approach.

It was hardly coincidental that Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton last week unveiled her immigration policy in Las Vegas or that, in doing so, she checked off much of the wish list of Latino activists, including a path to citizenship for millions of people in the country illegally and more compassionate enforcement of the country's border laws.

Nevada enjoys a prominent place on the nominating calendar, now slotted as the third to vote after contests in Iowa and New Hampshire. But more than that, the state mirrors the broad demographic changes that are reshaping politics across the country by the day.

In 1994, more than 90% of Nevada voters were white, a number that shrank to 67% in 2012. Over the same period, the Latino share of voters grew from 5% to 15%, a percentage expected to increase further by 2016.

(Nationally, Latinos accounted for 10% of the vote in the last presidential race. They are expected to account for nearly half of the growth in the eligible electorate between now and 2030, according to research by the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center.)

If a Democrat hopes to be president, he or she must not only reassemble Obama's winning coalition, which included Latinos and other minorities, but ensure that those voters turn out in robust numbers. Clinton's immigration proposals seem calculated to do just that, leaving Republicans the unpalatable choice of seconding her views — and alienating their conservative base — or rejecting them and risking further estrangement from Latino voters.

Nevada offers an object lesson.

Last year, with a virtually uncontested governor's race and little effort by state Democrats to spur turnout, Latino voters stayed home in droves. As a result, Republicans not only swept every statewide constitutional office, they knocked off a supposedly safe Democratic House member here in Las Vegas and seized control of the state Legislature for the first time since the 1920s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Democrats can't take those voters for granted," said David Damore, a University of Nevada, Las Vegas, expert on Latino political participation. "They need to spend money on outreach, get-out-the-vote, Spanish-language advertising. Without them, Democrats don't win."

Marco Rubio enters 2016 race touting youth, avoiding messy issues

Marco Rubio enters 2016 race touting youth, avoiding messy issues

Clinton apparently got the message: Two of her first Nevada hires, campaign director Emmy Ruiz and organizing director Jorge Neri, helped Obama win 70% of the state's Latino vote in 2012.

For Republicans, the imperative is less urgent, given their overwhelming support among white male voters. But their nominee can't afford a Romney-style blowout.

Whit Ayres, a veteran GOP pollster working for Rubio, believes the party's eventual nominee will need to win more than 40% of the Latino vote to carry the White House, a performance only two Republicans — Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush — have approached in the last 35 years. (Obama won 67% of the Latino vote in 2008 and 71% in 2012.)

This time Bush's brother, Jeb, has been most conspicuous in his courtship of Latino support. "We're an immigrant nation and we should be proud," he recently told supporters during a stop in Puerto Rico. "I know about the immigrant experience because I married a beautiful girl from Mexico. My children are bicultural and bilingual."

Rubio, of course, needn't reach to make that cultural connection. If anything, he seems to downplay his Latino heritage as he appeals to white conservative audiences.

But implicit in his very candidacy is the chance for Republicans to make history by nominating their first-ever minority standard-bearer, who, as a youthful Latino, reflects the demographic wave inexorably remaking the country, state by state.

For decades, Latinos were characterized — patronized, some said — as a slumbering giant: large in number, potentially powerful but largely apathetic and politically impotent. No more.

Now voters such as Santos Garcia have become highly sought-after.

"They're going to want our support," said Garcia, a 59-year-old kitchen worker at Harrah's casino on the Las Vegas Strip. "Without the Spanish vote they know they can't win. So they're going to come look for us."

Why Carly Fiorina was fired, according to Carly Fiorina // MSNBC // Anna Brand - May 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina on Sunday once again defended her tenure — and firing — as the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive, saying that “it is a leader’s job to challenge the status quo, and when you do, you make enemies.”

Fiorina during an interview on “Meet the Press” pointed to the rocky recession that led to layoffs at the technology company.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When pressed by host Chuck Todd, who flat out asked “So, why were you fired?” Fiorina responded as she has before, even using identical phrasing.

“Well, they did fire me. I’ve been very open about that. I was fired in a boardroom brawl,” Fiorina said. “We had board members who were leaking information out of the boardroom.”

On why the stock at HP, on the day she was fired, went up nearly 7%, Fiorina fired back, “the stock has gone down during my tenure, as did every other single technology company.”

Related: Fiorina on CarlyFiorina.org: ‘You can’t buy every domain name’

After Fiorina officially declared her candidacy for president in 2016 last Monday, the URL carlyfiorina.org illustrated via endless sad-faced emojis the number of people laid off at HP. “Carly Fiorina failed to register this domain. So I’m using it to tell you how many people she laid off at Hewlett-Packard. It was this many,” the site read, followed by 30,000 unhappy faces.

“What people fail to comment on is the fact that we doubled the size of the company,” Fiorina hit back on Sunday.

For the past six days, Fiorina has been all over the media largely attempting to set her record straight at HP, gain much-needed face recognition, and criticize Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

In her announcement video, Fiorina showed a clip of Clinton before even showing herself. It was a move that let her essential role in the election be known as the anti-Hillary.

Earlier this weekend, Fiorina spoke at the South Carolina Freedom Summit — alongside other Republican presidential hopefuls — to again pit herself against Clinton.

“Like Hillary Clinton, I too am running for president of the United States. But unlike Hillary Clinton, I’m not afraid to answer questions about my track record or my accomplishments or my principles,” Fiorina said, adding that Clinton doesn’t have a “record of accomplishment.”

On Sunday, Florina reiterated this sentiment. “I understand the executive decision making, which is making a tough call in a tough time, for which you are prepared to be held accountable,” she told Chuck Todd. “Something that at least Hillary Clinton doesn’t have a track record of.”

Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson May Play Key Roles in Republican Race // NYT // Al Hunt - May 10, 2015

WASHINGTON — None of the three candidates who joined the Republican presidential contest last week — Mike Huckabee, Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson — will win the nomination.

That’s the view of politically smart strategists who nevertheless say that all three, especially Mr. Huckabee, could play important roles in shaping the race.

First, here’s why these latest entries are unlikely to prevail. The Republican coalition has three pillars, all relatively conservative: economic, national security and social issues. A candidate has to be acceptable to at least two of the three. At this stage, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and perhaps Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky make the grade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Huckabee — the populist Baptist preacher, former Arkansas governor and talk-show host — doesn't. He is adored by the social right, hated by economic conservatives and isn't respected by many national security hawks.

Moreover, there's skepticism about his ability to raise the funds to go the distance. In 2008, after winning the initial Iowa caucuses, he lacked the resources to compete through the nominating process. There's a general sense that 2012 was his time. He passed.

Mr. Carson, a prominent physician, and Ms. Fiorina, the former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, are political novices, neither has ever been elected to office. The supposed appeal of nonpoliticians in America is superficial.

In a Wall Street Journal/NBC poll released last week, almost 70 percent said they would be uncomfortable with a presidential candidate who lacks previous experience in government.

Mr. Carson and Ms. Fiorina, both cancer survivors, have appealing narratives. Mr. Carson's résumé is more impressive: He is one of the world's most renowned pediatric neurosurgeons. (He once operated on our son.) Ms. Fiorina was fired as C.E.O. of Hewlett-Packard and generally gets negative reviews for her performance.

The possible import of Mr. Carson, who espouses a hard-right line and has attracted a following in places such as Iowa, is that movement conservatives account for half of the vote in several early contests. Governor Walker and Senator Rubio could get a small slice of those votes, as will Senator Paul, whose basic appeal is to libertarians.

More than 40 percent of the vote is likely to go to a movement right aspirant. In 2012, the Iowa caucus was won with 24 percent of the vote, in a smaller and less capable field.

The difference between Mr. Carson getting 5 percent and 10 percent may well decide if one of the movement right candidates tops 20 percent, which could be first place.

The top two right-wing candidates are Mr. Huckabee and Senator Cruz. A no-holds-barred debate between these tough customers, similar in ideology, vastly different in style, would be worthy of Las Vegas. Senator Cruz, a brilliant lawyer and champion debater, would assail Mr. Huckabee as a tax-increasing governor who commuted the sentences of hardened criminals, including one who went on to commit murder.

Continue reading the main story

The folksy and fiery Mr. Huckabee could attack the Texas senator for supporting President Obama on free trade and for his ties to Wall Street and the Republican donor class.

Ms. Fiorina's corporate background is probably better preparation for politics than brain surgery. She's unlikely to make embarrassing gaffes like Mr. Carson's recent charge, which he later retracted, that people enter prison as heterosexuals and leave gay.

Elements of the Republican establishment welcome Ms. Fiorina's candidacy. She's the only woman, and the party has a gender problem. She's a willing attack dog against Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet if she ever does better than the point or two that she scores in current polls, it would likely be at the expense of an establishment type such as Mr. Bush.

In the most wide open Republican race in the past half-century, there are no certainties, and maybe even no likelihoods. A year from now it's improbable that we'll look back on the events of the past week as seminal, but they may affect how the race looks then.

Paul Tells Tech-Heavy Crowd He's Against NSA Data Collection // AP // Ellen Kickmeyer - May 10, 2015

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul sparked applause from a tech-heavy audience Saturday when he criticized the government's bulk collection of data but drew a more tepid response for his opposition to so-called net neutrality.

Appearing at a tech start-up office space in the South of Mission district, Paul reiterated his stance against the National Security Agency collecting and storing data on nearly every American's phone calls. The practice, aimed at preventing terrorism, has divided Republican presidential candidates.

Tech entrepreneurs, typically zealous in guarding their online privacy, welcomed Paul's pledge to rein in U.S. intelligence agencies' broad data captures of phone calls and Internet use.

"The NSA doesn't need to be recording all of our phone calls," said Paul, a Republican senator from Kentucky. He added, "There's not one other candidate ... willing to say, 'On Day One, I'd stop it all. I'd end all bulk collection of records.'"

Congress is debating the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act, which is set to expire on June 1. Supporters of the surveillance law, including presidential candidate Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., say it's critical to anti-terrorism efforts. Paul and fellow Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, see the law as a privacy infringement.

Net neutrality opposes an Internet fast lane, with speedier connections at higher prices, for those who can afford to pay more. Paul, however, argued that market forces demand that if wealthier people are willing to pay more, they get the chance. He also asserted that mandated same-speed Internet for all is a market distortion akin to subsidized bread in the Soviet Union.

When a moderator of a panel said Paul's proposal to let graduates deduct their college costs on their taxes over their lifetime would only benefit the wealthy, Paul responded, "Poor kids go to Harvard, too."

Paul's appearance in a liberal bastion of a liberal state is part of his effort to expand the traditional boundaries of support for a Republican presidential campaign.

"Some people want to know what the hell is a Republican doing in San Francisco," he said. "I would say, it's about time."

Ben Carson outlines flat-tax proposal // POLITICO // Eliza Collins - May 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Low-income taxpayers can — and want — to pay taxes, Ben Carson said on Sunday.

The retired neurosurgeon who is seeking the Republican presidential nomination, said on “Fox News Sunday” he had adopted a flat-tax proposal from tithing in the Bible, citing a 10 percent rate as an example.

It’s “very condescending,” he said, to say that poor people can’t pay at the same tax rate as the wealthy.

“I can tell you that poor people have pride too,” said Carson, who grew up in a low-income family in inner-city Detroit.

Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky. speaks during the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) in National Harbor, Md., Friday, Feb. 27, 2015. (AP Photo/Carolyn Kaster)

Carson rejected host Chris Wallace’s information from the Tax Policy Center that in order for the government to raise as much money as it does now the flat tax rate would have to higher than 20 percent.

“If you eliminate the loopholes and the deductions, then you’re really talking about a rate between 10 and 15 percent,” Carson said his experts’ research has shown. “Let’s have a battle of the experts.”

A flat tax would help the government run like a business rather than the “great inefficient behemouth that we have now,” he said.

“If everybody is paying, it makes it very difficult for these politicians to come along and raise taxes” Carson said of his proposal for a new streamlined, flat-tax system.

In South Carolina, a Republican Scramble to Stand Out // AP // Bill Barrow and Mitch Weiss - May 10, 2015

GREENVILLE, S.C. (AP) -- Republicans making their pitch to be the party's 2016 presidential nominee aimed to out-do each other Saturday in arguing that President Barack Obama is a failed leader.

But hitting Obama with the usual critiques - from his 2010 health care overhaul to allegations of missteps on foreign policy to the rise in the national debt during his time in office - also made it hard for the gaggle of White House aspirants to stand out during a forum in South Carolina hosted by the conservative group Citizens United.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker tried by touting his ability to beat whomever is nominated by the Democratic Party, reminding activists that he won three statewide elections in four years in a state twice carried by Obama.

"The last time a Republican carried the state for president was 1984," he said. "That's a tough state."

He even took the crowd back to his decision to run for county executive in heavily Democratic Milwaukee County. "Never ever had there been a Republican in that spot before," he said.

Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard CEO, continued her tactic of going straight at Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic favorite for 2016. "She is not trustworthy, and she does not have a record of accomplishment," Fiorina said.

In an interview before his turn on stage, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal pointed to his work on policy, saying he's the only potential candidate in the field who has "spent the last 18 months coming up with detailed ideas on health care, on foreign policy, on energy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Once on stage, Jindal spent considerable time touting his credentials as a social conservative, including his pushback against criticism from some in the business community over "religious liberty" laws that have become a flashpoint in the national debate over same-sex marriage.

"Don't even waste your breath trying to bully the governor of Louisiana," Jindal said, repeating what he said was his message to corporate leaders.

Rick Santorum, who won the Iowa caucuses in 2012 before fizzling out against eventual nominee Mitt Romney, warned that Republicans eager to retake the White House after Obama's two terms in office must stay focused on reaching working-class voters.

"We have to be a pro-worker party," he said. "We have to be the party for a rising tide lifting all boats. There are millions and millions of Americans who have holes in those boats."

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio took a hard line on foreign policy, saying the nation must get tougher with terrorists. Adapting a line from the movie "Taken," he said: "We will look for you. We will find you. And we will kill you."

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz trumpeted his unapologetic approach on Capitol Hill, where he helped engineer a partial government shutdown in 2013. And he told activists that they should compare his style with his rivals, all of whom insist they are conservative.

"Have you had anyone up here today say, 'I'm an establishment moderate who stands for nothing?'" he said. "So how do you tell the difference? The scriptures tell us, 'You shall know them by their fruits." That means, he said, asking candidates, "You say you believe these principles. When have you fought for them?"

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry let loose a series of broadsides at Obama and his policies, drawing cheers from the crowd for a withering critique that covered immigration, the Affordable Care Act, the Islamic State militant group and the federal budget.

His bottom line: "We've seen gross incompetence. We're here to declare that we're not going to take it anymore."

Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon who, like Fiorina, announced his candidacy earlier this week, is running as the outsider. "I'm not a politician," he said. "That's what sets me apart."

Those not in South Carolina on Saturday included former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who delivered the commencement address at Liberty University in Virginia; Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, who was campaigning in northern California; and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who was in South Carolina on Friday.

Citizens United President David Bossie dismissed the idea that the large number of GOP candidates muddled their messages and called the wide field an advantage.

"These men and women all believe in American exceptionalism," Bossie said. He added that along with criticizing Obama, Republicans should focus their ire on Clinton - a point on which many in the crowd agreed.

"Any one of them would be better than the disaster we've got now," said Gary Gunderson of Abbeville, South

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carolina. His wife, Margaret, chimed in: "Or Hillary."

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Hillary Clinton Uses Mother's Day To Talk About Paid Family Leave // Jezebel // Stassa Edwardsd – May 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton's latest campaign video is a Mother's Day themed affair. In it Clinton pays homage to her own mother, celebrates the birth of her granddaughter, and shifts into the issue of paid family leave. "It's outrageous that America is the only country in the developed world that doesn't guarantee paid leave," Clinton says.

It's a typical campaign video in many respects, she plays on the old cliché of politicians kissing babies. And the language is also familiar political-speak: "When women are strong, families are strong," Clinton says in a voice over.

While some (ahem, Maureen Dowd) have criticized Clinton for using both her daughter and granddaughter to cynically "soften" her image, the campaign video is an interesting study in a relatively new type of political populism and, however faux it may be, it's nice at least to see that reframed around issues that are deeply important to many American women.

Whether or not you love Clinton or hate her (or feel deeply ambivalent about her), her candidacy seems to be rooted in pushing so-called "women's issues" to the forefront. And maybe I'm soft because it's Mother's Day and I'm typing this post with one hand and a two-year-old on my knee, but if the only way we can talk about issues like paid leave or equal pay is with familiar clichés and sappy music, then I'll take it for now.

How Hillary Is Winning // NYT // Frank Bruni - May 9, 2015

As fleetly as Hillary Clinton vacuums up the money, she piles up the paradoxes.

She showed fatal weaknesses the last time she chased the presidency and her inevitability evaporated like a California puddle, but she's somehow inevitable all over again. Invincible, even. Journalists have to remind themselves daily not to type or say "presumptive Democratic nominee" before her name.

She's fashioning herself as someone uniquely attuned to "everyday Americans" while her husband fashions $500,000 speeches as amulets against the bill collector. Someone's got to pay for the burrito bowls.

And her Republican rivals convince themselves that "I'm not Hillary" is their strongest argument and best bet, although the reverse holds true. At least for now, not being any one of them is her ace in the hole.

The 2016 race in its adolescence is between the dependably messy, perpetually maddening spectacle of the Clintons and a party with a brand-decimating profusion of mad hatters like the two who announced their bids and grabbed the spotlight last week, Mike Huckabee and Ben Carson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Advantage: Hillary Clinton.

That's a clear takeaway from several surveys of voters released last week. They showed that despite her email shenanigans, despite the ethical muddle known as the Clinton Foundation, despite the growing confusion about whether the Hillary Clinton of 2016 will be of an ideological piece with the Hillary Clintons of yesteryear, voters will gladly take her, considering the alternatives.

According to an NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, she was six points ahead of Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio in head-to-head contests with either. She was 10 points ahead of Scott Walker.

Inexplicably and rather alarmingly, she was only three ahead of Rand Paul. The mysteries of the American electorate are boundless.

Meanwhile a New York Times/CBS News poll found that over the past month and a half, during which she weathered a veritable hurricane of negative news coverage, her favorability rating improved, and the percentage of voters who see her as a strong leader rose to 65 from 57. Nearly 80 percent of the Democrats surveyed deemed her honest and trustworthy.

Hillary Rodham Clinton at Columbia University in New York last week.Hillary Clinton's Appeal Survives Scrutiny, Poll SaysMAY 5, 2015

There are many explanations. For starters, the hurricane I mentioned was experienced as a drizzle, if that, by many Americans, who aren't exactly riveted by political news. Inasmuch as they notice journalists pouncing on the Clintons, they're apt to shrug. The substance of the accusations is eclipsed by the familiarity of the tussle. It's like lions on an impala: bloody, yes, but the natural order.

And the Clintons are being accused of what? Greed? There's plenty of that to go around. Just ask Huckabee, a self-styled man of God and slave to Mammon.

As recounted by Trip Gabriel in The Times, Ron Fournier in the National Journal and Max Brantley in Salon, he's a case study in financial high jinks, a master class in shamelessness. He reportedly used the Arkansas governor's office "as a personal ATM," in Fournier's description, channeling public money toward private expenditures (a doghouse, Taco Bell) and accepting tens of thousands of dollars in highly questionable gifts, some from people who later received prominent political appointments.

More recently he did an infomercial hawking dietary supplements as a diabetes cure, even though reputable physicians and medical associations call it poppycock. Only three of the following four adjectives correctly describe that decision: tacky, mercenary, irresponsible and presidential.

Clinton benefits from not being Huckabee, who described Obamacare's contraception provision as a big-government sop to women who can't "control their libido," blamed an absence of God in schools for the deadly shooting rampage in Newtown, Conn., in 2012 and then proceeded to write a book with a title that put firearms on a comforting par with breakfast food. Run, don't walk, to pick up your copy of "God, Guns, Grits, and Gravy."

Clinton also benefits mightily from not being Carson, who has lumped together homosexuality and bestiality and has likened Obamacare to slavery, President Obama to a psychopath and the United States under President Obama to Nazi Germany. It is said that Carson is a talented brain surgeon. I'm taking my cerebellum elsewhere if it ever comes to that.

And Clinton benefits as well from not being Carly Fiorina, who also declared a candidacy for the presidency last week. When Americans look askance at professional politicians, it doesn't mean that they long for the polar opposite and are poised to award the presidency to someone who, in Fiorina's case, has never held elected office, routinely failed to vote in the past, bungled her role as a surrogate for John McCain in 2008, had a miserable showing in her 2010 race for the United States Senate against Barbara Boxer, and claims a business expertise that's long been in vigorous dispute. Her campaign will be powered by hubris, not logic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REPUBLICANS crow about their deep bench. And they do have some formidable candidates, including Marco Rubio, who is an anti-Hillary in ways that could indeed work for him, and Jeb Bush. But Rubio and Bush share the bench with an unruly crowd that pulls them and the party too far to the right.

Republicans also take heart from their majority in the Senate and their greater number of governors. But voters behave somewhat differently in presidential elections than in other ones, which is one reason Wisconsin has remained blue even during Walker's red reign.

The party's image hasn't gone through the intended upgrade after its defeat in 2012. According to the Times/CBS poll, just 29 percent of Americans now view Republicans favorably, though 43 percent feel that way about Democrats. That number is unlikely to improve much with the likes of Huckabee, Carson, Ted Cruz and Rick Santorum roaming Iowa and foaming at the mouth.

Besides, these two words come into play: Supreme Court. I know voters who'd give more consideration to Rubio, Bush, Chris Christie or John Kasich if they didn't fear the kind of jurist one of them might nominate at the behest of the religious right. And the next president could easily wind up filling two vacancies on the high court.

That thought is the soil in which love for Hillary Clinton flowers. It's a prompt for people who otherwise suffer bone-wearying Clinton fatigue to focus on her unquestioned smarts over her questionable scruples, her experience over her i.o.u.s, her sturdiness over her slipperiness. There's a case to be made for her, and there's motivation to make that case.

In another recent poll, by CNBC, she was the preferred candidate of voters with a net worth of $1 million or more. Apparently they, too, have made peace with her. Or maybe they just recognize a kindred spirit.

Clinton: Direct Evidence vs. Facts // WSJ // Mike Carroll – May 10, 2015

May 10, 2015 4:13 p.m. ET

Regarding Kimberley Strassel's "The Clinton Scandal Manual" (Potomac Watch, April 24): I'm a former judge. Let me pose this hypothetical: I am soon to hear a big case involving various parties. One of the parties offers a lucrative fee to my spouse for a speech, or they donate a large amount of money to my beloved charitable foundation.

If I go ahead and hear the case, and people later complain I was compromised and violated my fiduciary duty to the public, could I simply reply, as almost every Hillary Clinton defender has done, "there's just no evidence."

Of course, there are almost always no "direct evidence facts" because there is no overt quid pro quo. It's a covert wink-and-nod sort of thing where there's plausible deniability (you know, "there's just no evidence"). Many people are in prison today based on circumstantial evidence. Circumstantial evidence—being indirect facts that tend to inferentially prove other vital facts—is legal evidence. Clinton apologists are purposely trying to equate "evidence" with only direct evidence.

It is such an inherently corrupt practice and betrayal of one's fiduciary duty to receive any benefit of any value to any family member from a subject your principal has entrusted you to administer, that if a judge does it, he or she will be removed. The rules are clear. They recognize that the obvious corruption that flows from such obvious influence peddling is a violation of the canon of ethics. The judicial ethics board doesn't need any "evidence" showing that you actually were swayed by the benefit conferred. No. The mere receipt is sufficient for removal from office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There's just no evidence" doesn't cut it as a defense.

Mike Carroll

Tuscola, Ill.

George Clooney gushes over Hillary Clinton and his new life with Amal // Woman's Day - May 11, 2015

Outspoken Democrat George Clooney has thrown his support behind the US party's new Presidential candidate, Hillary Clinton as he continues to gush about his new bride Amal and how she changed his outlook on life.

"I think that she's a tremendous candidate," George said of the new Democratic Presidential nominee in an interview with Fusion TV.

He continued: "I know her and I think the world of her and I think that I would be very happy if she was president"

When he was asked if he could consider campaigning on Hillary's behalf, George said: "Sure, whatever she wants. In whatever way I can help."

George, 54, was quite a vocal supporter of the last Democratic candidate and current President, Barack Obama, hosting a fundraiser for him in 2012 that brought in over $15 million.

With Hillary's campaign advisors having set an initial fundraising target of $100 million, an endorsement from the charming movie star could prove quite a boon to the party.

George's endorsement for Hillary comes just days after a hugely positive endorsement of his new wife, Amal, 37, whom he sheepishly admitted he was intimidated by as he first asked her out, in an interview with Access Hollywood.

"It's always intimidating. She's an incredibly warm, wonderful person so it's always intimidating. I think everyone gets intimidated," George said of the pressure involved when asking the stunning Human Rights lawyer out.

It reportedly didn't take long for Tomorrowland star George to realise that the stunning British beauty with the impressive C.V. was in fact "the one".

"I think it was about three days in, I knew she was the one," George said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I knew when I met her that she was super-extraordinary. I wondered if I would ever get a chance to date her. We were friends for a while and luckily she said, 'yes'."

Like any couple though, George admits that they don't see eye to eye on everything.

"I watch sports, and it kills her," George said in an interview with Extra.

"I got her into March Madness a little, I'm a huge Kentucky fan, so she got into that, but it was enough."

Amal, who tied the knot with George in a lavish ceremony in Venice last year, attended the premiere of the dashing star's latest flick Tomorrowland in Hollywood over the weekend. The pair played happy families with her 13-year-old lookalike niece Mia Alamuddin in tow. Amal of course looked as glamorous as ever.

George gushed about his wife even further at the premiere, going as far as to say Amal "changed everything" about his world view.

"All I know is that it sort of changed everything in terms of what I thought my future – my personal future – was going to be," he told People magazine at the event.

"But I've always been an optimist about the world," the actor, 54, continued.

"I wasn't always completely optimistic about how it was going to work out personally for me. But now I am."

In Britain, an electoral earthquake shatters pre-election assumptions // WaPo // Dan Balz - May 10, 2015

LONDON — It was both energizing and bracing to watch the election returns roll in here Thursday night and into the early hours of Friday — energizing because the unfolding story bore little resemblance to the polls and forecasts; bracing for the very same reason and for what that said about all the pre-election analysis.

Public polls — and they were many and often — predicted a wholly different result. What the country was told to expect was the second hung Parliament in a row, and the prospect of tortuous negotiations and maneuvering to construct a new government.

Dan Balz is Chief Correspondent at The Washington Post. He has served as the paper's National Editor, Political Editor, White House correspondent and Southwest correspondent. View Archive

Instead, the Conservative Party under Prime Minister David Cameron produced a stunning victory, giving his party its first outright majority since the Tories yielded power to Tony Blair's New Labor Party in 1997. Cameron didn't call it the "sweetest victory" of all for him and the Conservatives for no reason. Rather than falling back in strength after five years in power as the head of a coalition government as might be expected, Cameron was able to enlarge his party's numbers, to 331 seats in the 650-seat Parliament.

Cameron emerged politically and personally strengthened, if nonetheless left to deal with the huge challenges the election so aptly defined and highlighted, from the place of Scotland in what could be an increasingly divided United Kingdom, to Britain's future place in the European Union and the world. With a slender majority and a potentially rebellious back bench, his leadership could be constantly tested as he tries to sort these out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In contrast to the Conservatives, the Labor Party was left shattered by the final results, with a 99-seat deficit in Parliament, its traditional stronghold in Scotland in the grip of the Scottish National Party and its top two leaders now on the sidelines.

TOP NEWS

Domestic

Jimmy Carter falls ill in Guyana, returns to U.S. early // LAT // Kurtis Lee - May 10, 2015

Former President Jimmy Carter returned to the United States from Guyana on Sunday after becoming ill.

A statement released by Carter's nonprofit foundation, the Carter Center, did not offer much about the 39th president's condition. It said he "was not feeling well" and needed to return to Atlanta.

Carter, 90, was in the South American country to observe its general election, which is scheduled for Monday.

For the most part, Carter has remained in good health recently, and he has been active in traveling. Earlier this month, he visited the Middle East.

Former President George H.W. Bush, the oldest living president, has had several hospital visits in recent years. In December, Bush, also 90, spent nearly a week in a Houston-area hospital after experiencing shortness of breath.

Carter's visit to Guyana was part of an ongoing effort by the Carter Center to observe peaceful elections around the world.

"President Carter is hopeful about Guyana's election and expressed his commitment and that of the Carter Center to supporting Guyana in the days ahead, stressing the need for a peaceful process before, during and after the election," the center said.

Networks Fret as Ad Dollars Flow to Digital Media // NYT // Emily Steel and Sydney Ember - May 10, 2015

Beginning Monday, television networks will roll out the red carpet for marketers during the annual bazaar known as the upfronts, trying to lure them into committing tens of billions of ad dollars for the coming TV season. If things go well, the networks will sell as much as 75 percent of their advertising time in the negotiations that follow a week of flashy presentations and star-studded parties.

But behind that lavish veneer, the mood at some television networks is nervous and the sales pitch urgent.

That is because broadcast and cable companies are asking marketers to open their wallets at a time of great anxiety in the industry, when TV ratings have collapsed and networks are fending off fierce competition from digital outlets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Television viewing has plummeted 9 percent so far this season compared with the previous season, according to MoffettNathanson Research. To explain the drop, some industry executives and analysts point to the rapid increase in the amount of time people spend watching Netflix and other streaming alternatives. Netflix viewing accounted for about 43 percent of the decline in traditional TV viewing in the first quarter of this year, according to MoffettNathanson.

In the past, a decline in ratings did not always damage the networks during the upfronts. As audiences fragmented, conventional television remained the best approach for reaching huge numbers of viewers. Even as digital media grew, advertisers kept pouring more money into TV. They dipped into their print advertising budgets to fuel spending on digital ads.

But now even traditional television is splintering, especially as the major broadcast networks make their programming available for streaming. With the number of digital alternatives growing quickly, and with marketers seeking greater flexibility in how they allocate their spending, the industry is bracing for what many expect to be an anemic upfront market. That would follow a soft market last year, which was one of the weakest the industry has seen, said Michael Nathanson, an analyst for MoffettNathanson.

“The story around the ratings decline has been a persistent drumbeat that’s reached a fever pitch this year, to the point where marketers are thinking, ‘We need to seriously think about alternatives,’ ” said Amanda Richman, president for investment and activation at Starcom USA, a Publicis Groupe-owned media buying agency whose clients include large advertisers like Kellogg’s, Kraft Foods and Procter & Gamble.

“It feels like this is a pivotal year,” she said.

The total amount of money advertisers commit during the upfronts this year is expected to tumble 7 percent, according to Magna Global, an ad-buying group owned by the Interpublic Group. That represents a 10 percent drop in spending committed to broadcast networks and a 5 percent drop for cable networks.

John Janedis, a media analyst at Jefferies, is predicting total ad spending commitments to drop about 6 percent, to about $20 billion, with ad rates flat or up 3 percent.

“Clearly, we’re going through a transition here,” Chase Carey, chief operating officer of 21st Century Fox, said during an earnings call last week. “Advertisers, without a doubt, have more choices. They want more flexibility in some ways. You could say the upfront we’re about to go into, while important, is probably a bit of an antiquated practice, given where the world is heading.”

For the advertising world, that direction is toward digital, and more of that money is likely to come from the share that has gone to the networks. While some streaming services like Netflix do not accept advertising, marketers are increasingly seeking out other new digital outlets that do, like Snapchat, Vine and YouTube, where viewers — especially younger ones — are spending an increasing amount of time.

“We’re at the tipping point now where the very role of TV in our mix is under consideration,” said Ivan Pollard, a top marketing executive at Coca-Cola North America. “Ten years ago, they held a much stronger hand than they hold today, but they all know that. They’re talking differently to us.”

Magna Global predicts that total TV ad revenues will be flat over the whole year, even as spending on digital media increases 19.1 percent. The group forecasts that digital media ad revenues will match television ad revenues by the end of 2016, each accounting for about $67.5 billion in spending and about 38 percent of the total ad market.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There’s no question that we’re seeing a new advertising reality here, because money definitely has migrated out of traditional media into new media,” Robert A. Iger, chief executive of the Walt Disney Company, said during an earnings call last week. He added that he expected his company’s networks, which include ABC, ESPN and the Disney Channel, to fare “just fine” during the upfronts.

To compete, television networks are featuring a host of their own digital offerings during this year’s upfronts, along with more data and targeting capabilities, qualities that are extremely important to marketers as they seek to increase the effectiveness of their ads. Executives are also highlighting television’s ability to reach broad audiences, and big events, like sports and awards shows, also dominate.

Rivalries among TV networks are becoming ever more cutthroat as they compete for their share of the ad-spending pie. That puts even more pressure on the networks to produce attention-grabbing hits.

“There are certain networks that have done very well this year, certain networks that haven’t done so well,” Leslie R. Moonves, chief executive of CBS, said during an earnings call last week. “I’m not going to go into great detail, but you could figure that out yourselves. So we are up, and we expect it to be a good marketplace.”

Some analysts warn against predicting TV’s demise just yet. “It is less impactful than it was, but it so dwarfs everything else,” said Brian Wieser, a media analyst with Pivotal Research. “We’re getting closer to the point when the world changes. We just haven’t seen it yet.”

Nuclear plant to clean up oil spill in Hudson River // USA Today // Matt Spillane - May 10, 2015

BUCHANAN, N.Y. – The owners of the Indian Point nuclear power plant plan to clean up what may be several thousand gallons of oil that spilled into the Hudson River following a transformer fire that shut down part of the plant, a federal official said Sunday.

Gov. Andrew Cuomo was scheduled to discuss the cleanup at a news conference Sunday at the plant, which is located across the Hudson River from Stony Point in Rockland County.

The fire, which began at 5:50 p.m. Saturday, sent smoke billowing into the air and oil overflowing the plant's moat, said Neil Sheehan, a spokesman for the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

"The plant's fire suppression system automatically sprayed water on the transformer fire," Sheehan said. "Oil made its way into the drains and into the water. Several thousand gallons may have overflowed the transformer moat."

Sheehan said Entergy Corp. is hiring an environmental contractor for the clean up. A strong odor of oil could be smelled Sunday across from the plant.

The fire didn't cause the release of any radiation and didn't pose a threat to workers or the public, according to a statement on Entergy Corp's website.

The fire was first declared out at about 6:15 p.m. Saturday, but flames rekindled at 6:37 p.m., Sheehan said. Firefighters from Verplanck and Buchanan entered the plant and used foam to put out the blaze, which was extinguished by 8:05 p.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Transformer fire shuts down N.Y. nuclear power plant

Nuclear Regulatory Commission inspectors went to the plant Saturday night and will be reviewing what caused the transformer fire. Sheehan said the initial inspection found the plant's procedures and fire-suppression system worked.

Indian Point classified the explosion and fire as an "unusual event," the lowest of four levels of emergency classification used by the regulatory agency, Sheehan said. He said the explosion and fire was considered "unusual" because it occurred within the plant's fenced in protected area.

The transformers are used to step up power produced by the plant before it is transmitted to the grid, Sheehan said. The facility opened in September 1962.

On Saturday evening, Cuomo said officials and commercial crews — supervised by the state Department of Conservation — were working to prevent oil from seeping into the Hudson River.

"This was a relatively minor situation, but when you're talking about a nuclear power plant there are no really minor situations," Cuomo said Saturday night, calling the plant "controversial" because it is "a stone's throw from one of the most densely populated urban areas on the planet."

International

Saudi Arabia Says King Won't Attend Meetings in U.S. // NYT // Helene Cooper - May 10, 2015

WASHINGTON — Saudi Arabia announced on Sunday that its new monarch, King Salman, would not be attending meetings at the White House with President Obama or a summit gathering at Camp David this week, in an apparent signal of its continued displeasure with the administration over United States relations with Iran, its rising regional adversary.

As recently as Friday, the White House said that King Salman would be coming to "resume consultations on a wide range of regional and bilateral issues," according to Eric Schultz, a White House spokesman.

But on Sunday, the state-run Saudi Press Agency said that the king would instead send Crown Prince Mohammed bin Nayef, the Saudi interior minister, and Deputy Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman, the defense minister. The agency said the summit meeting would overlap with a five-day cease-fire in Yemen that is scheduled to start on Tuesday to allow for the delivery of humanitarian aid.

Arab officials said they viewed the king's failure to attend the meeting as a sign of disappointment with what the White House was willing to offer as reassurance that the United States would back its Arab allies against a rising Iran.

Crown Prince Mohammed bin Nayef, the Saudi interior minister.

King Salman is expected to call President Obama on Monday to talk about his decision not to attend the summit meeting, a senior administration official said on Sunday.

The official said that when the king met Secretary of State John Kerry in Riyadh last week, he indicated that he was looking forward to coming to the meeting. But on Friday night, after the White House put out a statement saying Mr. Obama would be meeting with King Salman in Washington next week, administration officials received a call from the Saudi foreign minister that the king would not be coming after all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There was “no expression of disappointment” from the Saudis, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly. “If one wants to snub you, they let you know it in different ways,” the official said.

Another senior administration official said the White House did not believe that King Salman’s absence was because of any disagreement.

Jon Alterman, senior vice president at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said King Salman’s absence was both a blessing and a snub.

“It holds within it a hidden opportunity, because senior U.S. officials will have an unusual opportunity to take the measure of Mohammed bin Salman, the very young Saudi defense minister and deputy crown prince, with whom few have any experience.”

But, Mr. Alterman added: “For the White House though, it sends an unmistakable signal when a close partner essentially says he has better things to do than go to Camp David with the president, just a few days after the White House announced he’d have a private meeting before everything got underway.”

Mr. Kerry met on Friday in Paris with his counterparts from the Arab nations that were invited to the summit meeting — Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Kuwait, Bahrain, and Oman — to discuss what they were expecting from the summit meeting, and to signal what the United States was prepared to offer at Camp David.

But administration officials said that the Arab officials had pressed for a defense treaty with the United States pledging to defend them if they came under external attack. But that was always going to be difficult, as such treaties — similar to what the United States has with Japan — must be ratified by Congress.

Instead Mr. Obama is prepared to offer a presidential statement, one administration official said, which is not as binding and which future presidents may not have to honor.

The Arab nations are also angry, officials and experts said, about comments Mr. Obama recently made in an interview with The New York Times, in which he said allies like Saudi Arabia should be worried about internal threats — “populations that, in some cases, are alienated, youth that are underemployed, an ideology that is destructive and nihilistic, and in some cases, just a belief that there are no legitimate political outlets for grievances.”

At a time when American officials were supposed to be reassuring those same countries that the United States would support them, the comments were viewed by officials in the gulf as poorly timed, foreign policy experts said.

In addition, the Arab countries would like to buy more weapons from the United States, but that also faces a big obstacle — maintaining Israel’s military edge. The United States has long put restrictions on the types of weapons that American defense firms can sell to Arab nations, in an effort to ensure that Israel keeps a military advantage against its traditional adversaries in the region.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That is why, for instance, the administration has not allowed Lockheed Martin to sell the F-35 fighter jet, considered to be the jewel of America's future arsenal, to Arab countries. The plane, the world's most expensive weapons project, has stealth capabilities and has been approved for sale to Israel.

In Paris on Friday, Mr. Kerry said that the United States and its Arab allies, which constitute the Gulf Cooperation Council, were "fleshing out a series of new commitments that will create between the U.S. and G.C.C. a new security understanding, a new set of security initiatives that will take us beyond anything that we have had before."

The king is the latest top Arab official who will not be attending the summit meeting for delegations from members of the Gulf Cooperation Council.

The United Arab Emirates is also sending its crown prince to the meetings, the officials said. The Emirati president, Khalifa bin Zayed al Nahyan, was never expected to attend, because of health reasons, American and Arab officials said. The sultan of Oman, Qaboos bin Said al Said, also will not be attending because of health reasons, officials said.

Yousef Al Otaiba, the United Arab Emirates ambassador to the United States, declined to say exactly what his government was pushing for from the United States when he spoke at a conference in Washington on Thursday.

"The last thing I want to say is 'here's what we need,'" he said at a panel discussion sponsored by the Atlantic Council in Washington. "That's not the right approach. The approach is, let's come here, let's figure out what the problems are, how we can work together to address our needs."

King Salman's decision to skip the summit meeting does not mean that the Saudis are giving up on the United States — they do not have many other options, said Karim Sadjadpour, an Iran expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "As upset as the Saudis are, they don't really have a viable alternative strategic partnership in Moscow or Beijing," Mr. Sadjadpour said.

But, he added, "there's a growing perception at the White House that the U.S. and Saudi Arabia are friends but not allies, while the U.S. and Iran are allies but not friends."

Chasing a rainbow party // Economist // May 10, 2015

SOUTH AFRICA'S main opposition party has elected its first black leader, a step rightly thought necessary for the Democratic Alliance (DA) to shake its image as a "white party" and challenge the mighty African National Congress (ANC). Mmusi Maimane, aged just 34, won his election by a landslide at a weekend DA party congress in the coastal city of Port Elizabeth. The only other candidate was Wilmot James, aged 61. Mr James is a mixed-race, respected elder statesman of the party, but is seen as lacking the dynamism needed to give the party a boost and attract new voters.

Mr Maimane, who was raised in Soweto, is the DA's parliamentary leader—he will keep this post—and on weekends a pastor at a Christian church in Cosmo City, a Johannesburg suburb. He has the oratory of a preacher, too, and is widely praised for his ability to hold a crowd. Helen Zille, the outgoing DA leader, avoided openly backing a candidate but had previously described Mr Maimane as symbolising the party's future. But some doubt his ability to sell dubious voters on the DA. "I don't think they have an ideal candidate," said Eusebius McKaiser, a political analyst and author of a book titled "Could I Vote DA? A Voter's Dilemma". "The fact that Mmusi is black helps," but, he said, it won't by itself attract black votes. Mr Maimane will need to go beyond feel-good tales about his own rise from Soweto and abstract notions of a rainbow, "non-racial" party, and address the hard issues facing South Africa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The liberal DA portrays itself as a party of competency and efficiency, with its Western Cape base considered the best-run province in South Africa. Its congress was a well-organised, slickly run affair, in contrast to the ANC's chaotic last elective congress, in Mangaung (though the DA had far more white people awkwardly dancing to the music of Brenda Fassie, a famed anti-apartheid singer). There were many tributes to Miss Zille, who during her term increased the DA's share of the vote from 17%, in 2009, to 22% in last year's election.

With Mr Maimane as leader, the party's biggest challenge now will be to speak to a broader range of voters, in particular to black South Africans in the ANC's rural heartland. His first test will be the 2016 local elections, with a close race expected in the battleground municipalities of Johannesburg, Pretoria and Nelson Mandela Bay, which includes Port Elizabeth.

While the DA remains the main opposition party, it has been overshadowed in recent months by the leftist Economic Freedom Fighters (EFF), led by Julius Malema, a former ANC Youth League leader who, like Mr Maimane, is 34. The attention-grabbing, radical EFF has found support among young black voters, frustrated with the lack of change and opportunity in South Africa. When Mr Maimane was asked by The Economist how he planned to tackle the EFF, he dodged the question. Instead, he spoke about the party's presence at universities and touted the DA's recent surprise victory in student-council elections at Fort Hare, Nelson Mandela's alma mater in the Eastern Cape. That was indeed a win for the party, but the work ahead will be a good deal tougher.

--
Alexandria Phillips
Communications | Press Assistant
Hillary for America
https://www.hillaryclinton.com

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	johnson_lo <johnson_lo@mail2000.com.tw>
To:
Date:	12/12/2008 9:21:42 AM
Subject:	Fw: ((Russia Photographer Zenin's masterpiece) [!]
Attachments:	00.txt 01 _Zenin.pps

(Russia Photographer Zenin's masterpiece) [!]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 3/25/2015 4:19:54 AM
Subject: Re: Israel and Hillary

Can we talk at 12:30?

On Mar 25, 2015, at 10:47 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Jake,

The Obama White House-Bibi relationship is obviously deteriorating to the point of no return. It is more poisonous than US-Israeli relationship in my lifetime. Even during the Nixon/Kissinger flaps with Prime Minister Meir and then Rabin after the Yom Kippur War, including Kissinger's threat of a "reassessment" of U.S. policy; the George H.W. Bush/James Baker-Shamir period, when there was an effort to freeze loan guarantees; the Carter-Begin relationship leading up to Camp David and the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty; or the several "reassessments" by Reagan as a result of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and other actions, there was nothing like the public personal animosity that exists now. The Prime Minister's efforts to back-off his immediate pre-election statements about Israeli Arab voting and opposition to a two-state solution have not only been rebuffed by both the President, and most recently, White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough, but they have effectively questioned the Prime Minister's candidness. Olive branches have been spurned. Fuel was added to the fire with the allegation of Israeli intelligence intervention in the Iran talks. There is a distinct possibility that the Administration may seek a new UN Security Council Resolution embodying the two-state solution, with 1967 lines and agreed land swaps, and some vague statements about Jerusalem.

If and when an Iran framework agreement is announced this week, this combustible situation will explode. I sent you a lengthy memo March 17 on the Iran nuclear talks, based upon my chairmanship of the Atlantic Council's Iran Task Force.

This obviously places Hillary in an extremely difficult position, caught between the President she served and the organized parts of the Jewish community, I have talked several times recently, including yesterday afternoon, with Malcolm Honlein, president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations. They have refrained from directly criticizing the President, but he told me that he and most of his organizations are extraordinarily concerned about the situation, and highly desirous of Hillary making some statement to calm the turbulent waters. At the same time, more liberal Jews are incensed at Bibi. However, as the NYT reports today, the vehemence of the President's reaction, even to Bibi's "peace offering", is turning the tide in Israel in the Prime Minister's favor, and may do so here, as well.

Permit me to suggest some points she might make. By way of background, I have very deep connections to the State of Israel and to its elected officials and leading academics. I go to Israel two to three times a year, perhaps 50 times since my first visit in 1965. My grandfather and great-grandfather are buried in Israel, and I have scores of relatives and friends there. During the Clinton Administration, I was responsible for the economic dimension of the peace process, working with Yasir Arafat, the Jordanians and the Israeli government on initiatives like Qualifying Industrial Zones (QIZs) in Gaza and Jordan; construction of the airport in Gaza; facilitating some 50,000 Palestinian workers coming to Israel daily, and 20,000 trusted Palestinian businessmen who could enter Israel with their own cars. I co-chair with Dennis Ross the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem(JPPI), a think tank funded by the Jewish Agency and major American Jewish federations and foundations, focusing on strategic challenges facing Israel and the Diaspora around the world.

First, she should stress the need to "lower the temperature level" of rhetoric on all sides. The overall political, military, defense relationship with Israel is too important to allow personal differences to intrude on the future direction of U.S. policy. It is time to look to the future and not fixate on campaign statements, which often in all democracies can be excessive, as they were here. Moreover, we must respect the democratic process in Israel, just as we would expect Israeli leaders to accept the election and re-election of our President. It is time to put the election behind us, and roll-up our collective sleeves and get back to work on rebuilding confidence and trying to develop the parameters to return to the negotiating table.

Second, she should stress the enduring commitment of the United States to Israel's security interests, not only direct military threats, but attacks against Israel in the form of the Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions (BDS) campaign, on campuses in the U.S. and Europe. She should express grave concern for the increase in anti-Semitism in Europe and violent attacks by radical Islamic terrorists (Obama refuses to use this term; she will need to decide what language to use and then stick with it) against Jews in Europe (Paris, Toulouse, Malmo) which conflate their hatred of Israel with Jews in their country.

Third, and critically, she should express a strong feeling that Israel MUST remain a bipartisan issue, as it has been since its formation. She should sharply criticize those in the U.S. and in Israel who are injecting Israel into a partisan context. The invitation to Bibi was not only done without prior notice to the President, but also to the Democratic leadership.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fourth, she should reiterate the long-standing support for the two-state solution, as the only one which will ensure Israel remains a majority Jewish democratic state. Indefinite control over two million Palestinians is not in Israel's interests nor theirs. This will require compromises neither side has been willing to make, despite Secretary Kerry's herculean efforts. It is important for her to remind people that in both the year 2000 with Prime Minister Barak and in 2008 with Prime Minster Olmert, Israel offered to withdraw from 95% of the West Bank, make East Jerusalem the capital of a Palestinian state, and to allow up to 50,000 Palestinians to return to Israel for family reunions, and it was not accepted. No Palestinian leader is willing to forego their "right of return". At the same time, settlement expansion under Bibi and his insistence that Palestinians accept not just the "State of Israel" but "the Jewish State of Israel", does not create an environment for mutual sacrifice.

Fifth, she should call for all sides to avoid unilateral actions, like the Palestinian effort to seek a "war crimes" investigation against Israel in the International Criminal Court (interestingly, just this week, the ICC indicated it would also investigate Hamas); settlement expansion; and efforts to seek a new UN Resolution to supersede UN Resolution 242, with the consent of neither Israel or the Palestinians (this would be controversial with the Obama Administration, as they would see this as a preemptive action by Hillary to preempt their effort; thus she might hold her powder on this until there is more certainty what the Administration will do; still, at some point, she may have to take a position; this would not negate the need for her to advise against unilateral actions). It is time to get back to the negotiating table.

Sixth, realistically, there is no clear way to break the current impasse. Thus, she should suggest the following (I call it the diplomatic equivalent of the medical Hippocratic oath: "do no harm"; do not do anything that makes a two-state solution less possible) :

(1) There will be an expansion of settlements because couples have babies. But these should be within established settlement blocks, which in the Clinton Parameters and other plans, would be part of Israel in any peace agreement. In fact, over 80% of all settlement expansion is within the footprint of these major blocks. She should call for the Israeli government to remove settlement outposts which are illegal under their own law, and project deeper and deeper into Palestinian territory and make a two-state solution impossible. There has never been a mapping exercise with the Israelis on what they consider the parameters of the existing blocks. This should be jointly done.

(2) There should be an expansion of Israeli-Palestinian cooperation, which is important for Israel in working with the Palestinians on intelligence sharing against terrorists, and avoids an unsustainable military takeover of the whole West Bank. This could take the following forms:

(a) Establish several QIZs in the West Bank. This allows duty-free treatment of products within the QIZ into the U.S., if there is as little as 10% Israeli content. I visited the QIZ in Gaza in July 2000, and it was a beautiful thing to see. There were 30 plants employing over 1000 Gazans, and a second phase was being built. The only Israeli presence, was an unarmed Israeli soldier, who watched the products being loaded onto trucks, where they were whisked through the border and to the airport in Gaza. I also visited a QIZ in Irbid, Jordan. There are some dozen in Jordan and, I believe, around four to six in Egypt. Astonishingly, there are none in the West Bank. In late January, at the World Economic Forum in Davos, I met with the deputy prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, and raised this possibility; he was very positive.

(b) Restore the $400 million in tax revenues, the Israeli government is withholding in response to the Palestinians going to the ICC.

(c) Begin to carefully allow vetted Palestinians to work in Israel. Again, at its peak, it was well over 50,000; some estimates were as high as 100,000.

(d) Increase the territory in the West Bank under control of the Palestinian Authority.

(e) Reduce the number of check points within the West Bank, given the security fence. I have a close friend in Israel (David Harman, the son of former Israeli Ambassador to the US Abe Harman), who teaches at Bard College, Hebrew University, and al-Quds university in the West Bank. He has told me it takes up to 2 hours or more each way for some of his Palestinian students to get to class. This only increases anger in the Palestinian community.

(f) Allow carefully vetted Gazans to travel to and from the West Bank, if the PA controls the passages, along with Israelis. Also, increase the range of products that can be imported and exported from Gaza, and the range of fishing rights off the Gaza coast.

Jake, she may not wish to have all of this in one statement, and limit herself to the First through Fifth points. But she needs to say enough to be substantive.

I have sent you separately, at your request, Jewish leaders to whom she should reach out. She needs to make a statement sooner rather than later, as things are spiraling out of control.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Stuart Eizenstat

Covington & Burling LLP
One CityCenter, 850 Tenth Street, NW
Washington, DC 20001
(202) 662 5519 (tel) | (202) 778-5519 (fax)
seizenstat@cov.com
www.cov.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nelson W. Cunningham" <ncunningham@maglobal.com>
To: "Nelson W. Cunningham" <ncunningham@maglobal.com>
Date: 6/25/2014 12:19:57 PM
Subject: Reception for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (N.H.) -- Tuesday July 22d

Friends:

My cohosts and I hope that you can join us for one more reception featuring not only a marquee Senate race but a terrific woman candidate – this time, U.S. Senator Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire.

I've had the opportunity to get to know Senator Shaheen since she arrived in Washington in 2009, and have been impressed by her exceptional leadership and her commitment to getting results for her constituents—the same dedication that she displayed during her three terms as Governor of New Hampshire.

She faces a challenge from former [Massachusetts] Senator Scott Brown. Though I suspect the good people of New Hampshire are not easily taken in, Scott Brown will have considerable funding from outside conservative groups bent on portraying him as a genuine New Hampshire article. It is incumbent on us to help her gather the resources to withstand the GOP attacks. Sen. Shaheen is the first Democratic Senator from New Hampshire elected since 1980 – and she deserves a second term.

She serves on the Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Small Business Committees.

The reception will be held on Tuesday, July 22nd from 6:00-7:30 PM at my home in Georgetown, at 3417 P Street NW.

Further background on Senator Shaheen can be found below, and event details are below and in the attached invitation.

Bain & Paige Ennis, Paige Reffe, and Damon Wilson and I hope you can join us on July 22nd.

All the best,

Nelson

Please join

Nelson Cunningham, Bain & Paige Ennis
Paige Reffe, and Damon Wilson

for a reception honoring

Senator Jeanne Shaheen (D-NH)

Tuesday July 22, 2014
6:00 PM – 7:30 PM

The Home of Nelson Cunningham
3417 P. St NW
Washington, DC 20007

Host: $2,600
Sponsor: $1000

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Individual: $500

To RSVP, contact Tony Yost at 202-547-5797 or Tony@bhstrategiesllc.com
Paid for by Shaheen for Senate

About Jeanne Shaheen

The only woman in U.S. history to be elected both a Governor and a United States Senator, Jeanne Shaheen has been committed to serving the citizens of New Hampshire and is known for her common-sense leadership, hard work and dedication to improving the lives of the middle class. She has served in the United States Senate since 2009 and is a member of the Senate Committees on Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Small Business and Entrepreneurship.

As a former small business owner, Senator Shaheen has worked to keep the U.S. economy competitive in the global marketplace through her efforts on the Small Business Committee and through legislation such as the Small Business Jobs Act and the Small Business Innovation Research program. The first New Hampshire Governor to lead trade missions outside North America, Senator Shaheen has also co-sponsored legislation to help small businesses sell their products overseas. Her annual "Experience New Hampshire" event in Washington, D.C., gives New Hampshire businesses a forum to showcase their products and services.

Senator Shaheen has become a champion for families facing hardship during the recession. She led Senate efforts to pass a critical extension of unemployment benefits to help struggling families. Her state staff has made it a priority to help out-of-work families navigate the federal bureaucracy, including thousands of families facing foreclosure.

To strengthen the economy in the long term, Senator Shaheen is committed to addressing the federal government's long-term deficits. In the Senate, energy efficiency has remained a priority for Shaheen and she has introduced a bipartisan debt-reduction plan, and has introduced bills to reform our budget process, and to phase out unnecessary subsidies for U.S.sugar growers and for gold and silver mining. She cosponsored measures to cut government spending on vehicles by 20 percent and to eliminate unneeded tax breaks for major oil companies and ethanol production.

As a long-standing advocate for energy efficiency, Shaheen created programs while Governor that saved New Hampshire families and businesses over $1 billion through energy efficiency. In the Senate, Shaheen introduced bipartisan legislation that would create a national energy efficiency strategy to foster job creation, save businesses and consumers money and reduce pollution. She was successful in passing several provisions of her energy efficiency plan that will help businesses create jobs and consumers reduce energy costs. According to a study by the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy (ACEEE) Shaheen-Portman is estimated to create more than 190,000 jobs, save consumers $16.2 billion a year, and cut CO2 emissions and other air pollutants by the equivalent of taking 22 million cars off the road – all by 2030.

As the former chair of the Foreign Relations Subcommittee on European Affairs, Senator Shaheen was an outspoken proponent of the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (New START). She helped to secure its ratification, enabling the U.S. to resume critical inspections of Russia's nuclear arsenal.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, Shaheen has also continued the work she began as Governor to protect jobs at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, Pease International Tradeport and New Hampshire's defense-related companies. She has worked to ensure that policies supporting our active-duty troops are accessible to our National Guard forces and their families as well. Shaheen is the Chair of the Subcommittee on Readiness and Management Support, a position that puts her in a strong position to advocate for military families and programs that are important to New Hampshire and the nation – including the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard and Pease Air National Guard Base.

Shaheen also serves on the Senate Appropriations Committee, where she chairs the Subcommittee on the Legislative Branch. After balancing a budget as a mother, small business owner, and governor, Senator Shaheen understands that every dollar we spend must deliver results. She is committed to fiscal responsibility and knows that public officials have a fundamental duty to make sure taxpayer money is used effectively and efficiently.

Shaheen served as Governor of New Hampshire from 1997 to 2003. During her time in the statehouse, she helped create nearly 67,000 new jobs while keeping New Hampshire's tax burden the lowest in the country. (Learn more about Jeanne Shaheen's three terms as Governor.)

Between her time as Governor and election to the U.S. Senate, Shaheen served as the Director of Harvard University's Institute of Politics at the Kennedy School of Government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shaheen was born in Saint Charles, Missouri. Her father worked his way up to a management position in a shoe company and her mother worked as a secretary in their local church. After attending public schools, Shaheen received a bachelor's degree from Shippensburg University in Pennsylvania and a master's degree from the University of Mississippi. She and her husband, Bill, live in Madbury and have three daughters, Stefany, Stacey and Molly, and seven grandchildren.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 7/30/2014 7:36:41 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday July 30, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday July 30, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: "If you gaze too deeply at Correct the Record, you start to wonder if you've been too critical of the Clintons." http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/politics/2014/07/david_brock_s_correct_the_record_the_former_right_wing_operative_is_hillary.single.html … [7/30/14, 12:42 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: "Journalism," conservative-style! Step 1: Cry foul. Step 2: Investigate. Step 3: Find nothing. Step 4: Cry foul. http://correctrecord.org/shame-on-america-rising-judicial-watch-right-wing-groups-cry-foul-when-attacks-proven-empty/ … [7/30/14, 11:35 a.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: Shame on @AmericaRising and shame on @JudicialWatch for yelling "fire" when there isn't even smoke. http://correctrecord.org/shame-on-america-rising-judicial-watch-right-wing-groups-cry-foul-when-attacks-proven-empty/ … [7/3014,11:10 a.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton worked to promote trade, investment, economic opportunities between US & Africa #HRC365http://1.usa.gov/1jPbmCi [7/29/14, 4:30 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Media Matters for America: "Chris Cillizza's Fixation On Hillary Clinton's Wealth"

[Subtitle:] "The Fix Has Devoted At Least 13 Posts To Clinton Wealth In Just 2 Months"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Daily Beast: "Elizabeth Warren's Biggest Donors Warn Her Not to Run for President"

[Subtitle:] "As speculation about the Massachusetts senator's presidential ambitions swells, her biggest donors have one thing to say: There's no way on earth they're backing her over Hillary Clinton."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Jeb Bush isn't the Hillary Clinton of the 2016 GOP field. Not even close."

"Bush is on the wrong side of the party's base on two of the issues that stoke the most passion: immigration and Common Core."

NPR: "'Hard Choices' Tour Put Spotlight On Clinton's Strengths, Weaknesses"

"While there once was a spirited debate about whether she would or wouldn't run, there's now a consensus, which the book tour only cemented — Hillary Clinton is running for president."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "$5 million, $50 million or even more – just how rich is Hillary Clinton? Here's why we don't know."

"'It's hard really to come up with much more specifics than what [the documents] give,' said Tim Miller, who as executive director of America Rising PAC, a Republican opposition research group, is in charge of helping to shape GOPattacks on Clinton."

Fox News politics: "Head of Benghazi probe says no witnesses off limits, including Clinton"

"Asked whether he wants Hillary Clinton to testify, Gowdy said, 'I want everyone who has access to relevant information, and it is, I think, impossible to argue that the secretary of State at the time would not have access to relevant information...'"

CNBC: John Harwood: "She's gone from Foggy Bottom, but global chaos still hurts Hillary"

"The chaos enveloping international relations this year has taken its toll on President Barack Obama's approval rating and midterm election prospects for his party. But it also hurts Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Baltimore Sun opinion: Bush Ambassador William L. Jacobsen Jr.: "President Hillary Clinton"

"The first few days of this Clinton presidency promise another historic photo opportunity as newly inaugurated head of state, an attractive blond woman taking care of the nation's business at her desk in the Oval Office — a radiant, self-confident smile on her face."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Ryan will wait until 2015 to decide on presidential run"

"Rep. Paul Ryan said Wednesday that he is currently 'focusing on policy,' rather than his own political ambitions, and that he will wait until next year to decide whether to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 2016."

The Onion [Satire]: "Hillary Clinton Spends Busy Day Fueling Speculation, Not Ruling Things Out"

"Capping off a packed week of weighing options and giving serious thought, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton spent a busy day in Washington fueling speculation and not ruling things out, her spokesman confirmed today."

Articles:

Media Matters for America: "Chris Cillizza's Fixation On Hillary Clinton's Wealth"

By Alexandrea Boguhn & Jeremy Holden

July 30, 2014

[Subtitle:] The Fix Has Devoted At Least 13 Posts To Clinton Wealth In Just 2 Months

In the past two months, Washington Post political reporter Chris Cillizza has used his platform at The Fix to obsess over the question of whether Hillary Clinton has sufficiently explained her family's wealth, dismissing Clinton's comments on income inequality while offering conflicting advice on how she should answer the question in a way that satisfies Chris Cillizza and The Washington Post.

Cillizza's latest post came in response to an interview Hillary Clinton gave to Fusion TV host Jorge Ramos that aired July 29. "Hillary Clinton still hasn't found a good answer to questions about her wealth," according to the July 29 headline over at The Fix. After crediting GOPopposition research firm American Rising with focusing his attention on Clinton's wealth, Cillizza concluded: "Until she finds three sentences (or so) to button up any/all questions about her wealth, those questions will keep coming. And that's not the way Clinton wants to run-up to her now all-but-certain presidential bid."

This is the third time in two months that Cillizza has posted a column fixated on Clinton's wealth and his belief that she is struggling to explain it -- and the third time since June 22 that The Fix has turned to America Rising to help define Hillary Clinton. Meanwhile, a June NBC News/Wall Street Journal/Annenberg poll found that 55 percent of Americans say that Clinton relates to and understands average Americans.

"The Clintons are not 'average' people," Cillizza warned just a week before that poll came out. He concluded by advising Clinton to stop talking about her wealth and move on: "Instead of spending her time litigating just how wealthy she is, Clinton should acknowledge her wealth and then spend the vast majority of her rhetorical time making the case that through the policies she has advocated and pursued, she has never lost sight of the middle class."

The reality is that Clinton has already done exactly what Cillizza advises; he just largely chooses to dismiss it. When Clinton has been asked about her wealth, she has consistently paired her personal finances with discussing her lifelong advocacy and work on behalf of the poor and middle class.

"I want to create a level playing field so that once again, you can look a child in the eye and you can tell them the truth, whether they're born in a wealthy suburb or an inner city or a poor country community, you can point out the realistic possibility that they will have a better life," Clinton told The Guardian in June.

Cillizza actually acknowledged that Clinton "effectively" addressed questions about her family's wealth by discussing her desire to "create more ladders of opportunities for more Americans" during the very interview he's criticizing. He just immediately dismissed her response as insufficient to quiet the questions he insists will continue to plague her.

In early June, Cillizza chided Clinton for what he called a "slip up" after she said she and her husband were "dead broke" after leaving the White House. Comparing it to a moment during the 2008 presidential campaign when Sen. John McCain struggled to recall how many homes his family owned, Cillizza observed: "unless she does it again, it will likely be forgotten in a week."

Since that time, The Fix has published at least 13 posts obsessing over Clinton's wealth and the perception that she's struggling to explain it.

The Fix's obsession over Clinton's wealth is in line with a larger pattern at The Washington Post. Since pointing to Clinton's comments on her family's wealth as evidence that Clinton's book tour was "off to a bumpy start" in a June 11 article, the Post has worked to create a perception that Clinton has struggled to explain the question it keeps asking. "Clinton's rarefied life could be a liability in campaign" a June 23 Post headline warned in an article detailing how many homes Bill and Hillary Clinton have while letting a George W. Bush advisor claim that Hillary Clinton sounds "completely inauthentic."

Less than a week later, in an 1,800-word page 1 news article documenting how much money Bill and Hillary Clinton have earned in speaking fees, the Post claimed that the Clinton wealth "is now seen as a potential political liability if she runs for president in 2016."

"You have a money problem," Washington Post columnist Ruth Marcus argued on June 27. Marcus claimed that Clinton's "money problem" was rooted both in how she talks about it and the fact that she was "still frenetically collecting it."

"It's doubtful that the public holds the Clinton's wealth against them," Post columnist Dan Balz offered a day later, "so why was she so defensive when the topic was raised?"

A better question is, if the public isn't concerned with the Clinton wealth, why is the Post obsessed with it?

The Daily Beast: "Elizabeth Warren's Biggest Donors Warn Her Not to Run for President"

By David Freedlander

July 30, 2014

[Subtitle:] As speculation about the Massachusetts senator's presidential ambitions swells, her biggest donors have one thing to say: There's no way on earth they're backing her over Hillary Clinton.

She "lit up" a gathering of liberal activists earlier this month with a barn-burner of a speech calling on Democrats to push back hard as thousands of attendees waved signs and chanted "Run, Liz, Run!" Her every denial that she will not run for president is parsed down to the verb tense for evidence that the door is open even a crack. She embarked on the kind of nationwide book tour that candidates-in-waiting always do as they drum up interest for a potential bid, and a "Ready for Elizabeth" draft movement is preparing to launch satellite chapters in states and cities around the country.

But if Elizabeth Warren does in fact reverse her repeated denials of interest and decides to run for president, she will have to do so virtually alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's because almost to a person, her earliest and most devoted backers do not want her to challenge Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination.

"If Elizabeth called me up and said, 'I am thinking of running for president,' I would say, 'Elizabeth, are you out of your goddamn mind?'" said one New York-based donor who has hosted Warren in his living room. "I really like Elizabeth, but if Hillary is in the race it just makes no sense."

This conversation was echoed again and again in more than a dozen interviews with big-ticket Democratic donors in Warren's hometown of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and in cities that operate as ATMs for the Democratic money machine, like New York, Washington, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. Over and over again, the message was the same: Stay in the Senate, Liz, stay in the Senate.

There are many reasons why Warren would want to mount a campaign. The primary animating force of her political career—that the economy is unfairly tilted toward the rich, and that the Wall Street banks are rigging the game—has struck a chord with the activist wing of her party. And that same activist wing doesn't believe that Hillary Clinton, with her six-figure speeches to Goldman Sachs and her ties to the triangulating policies of her husband, can carry that banner for them. Warren has become a top Democratic surrogate in red states like Kentucky and West Virginia, and in races across the country, "The Warren Wing" appears to be on the march.

"There is a rising economic populist tide in America, and Elizabeth Warren is the personification of that tide," said Adam Green, the co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, which has been organizing to make sure every presidential candidate is asked whether they agree with Warren. "In the Democratic Party there is a battle between the economic populist wing that fights for the little guy against the corporate wing, and she represents the populist wing."

Were she to run, Warren would face enormous challenges, mainly in that Hillary Clinton remains historically popular with Democrats. But the fact that the network of Democratic insiders who helped Warren raise a record $42 million for her 2012 Senate bid want her to stand down in deference to Clinton should all but end speculation that she will be a candidate.

"I think she is outstanding. She is articulate. She is persuasive. She can hit a piece of bullshit from a hundred yards away," said Victor A. Kovner, a Manhattan lawyer who hosted Warren for a fundraiser way back in 2011. But, he added, "I will be supporting Hillary in 2016. No question about that."

Some Democrats who say they support Hillary still want Warren in the race, under the theory that it will give a platform to Warren's ideas on the economy that she cannot achieve while serving as one of 100 senators.

But Kovner, echoing other members of the Democratic donor class, rejects this view. "People should run to win," he said. "They shouldn't run to have a voice. That is what Herman Cain did."

To be clear, the world of Warren-backers isn't entirely ready for Hillary, and some are holding out hope that the Massachusetts senator joins the race.

"I think it would be very good if she were the nominee," said Marc Weiss, a tech entrepreneur who helped fund a nascent Warren for Senate campaign soon after she announced. "She is closer to my views on almost every issue. I would be very enthusiastic if she decided to run."

Clinton, Weiss said, was a good senator and secretary of state, but "the problem I have with her is as a potential president is that she is too comfortable with many of the forces that are with Wall Street. It is hard to see how she would really be a voice for the middle class."

Erica Sagrans, the campaign manager at Ready for Warren, dismissed the notion that Warren would struggle to raise money if her fundraising network went with Clinton. "She has proven to be a pretty successful fundraiser for herself and for other candidates. I don't see that as being a huge challenge for her should she run."

There is an argument to be made that a Warren candidacy would benefit Clinton, even if the former secretary of state prevailed at the end. It would, for one thing, give the Democratic Party a primary worth watching, at a time when much of the action appears to be on the Republican side—and Democrats who remember 2008 can recall how galvanizing that campaign was for the party. Democrats maintain a sizeable demographic advantage, and the GOP appears as if it may be on the verge of making the same mistakes it made in the clownish 2012 nominating process.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But few of Warren's biggest supporters want to risk it.

"I am not sure what value it would bring to have her run," said Wayne Shields, CEO of the Association for Reproductive Health Professionals, who, along with Warren's husband, hosted Warren at his house earlier in her Senate candidacy. "She would be such a target for conservatives, it may end up having a paradoxical effect on Democrats."

One Massachusetts Democrat, who helped lay the groundwork for Warren's Senate run back when Warren was a Harvard professor mostly known as a thwarted nominee to the newly created Consumer Finance Protection Bureau, agreed:

"If she ran, it would tear apart the Democratic base even worse than Hillary and Obama did. Whoever is pushing this is not doing the Democratic Party any favors, and I wish it would stop."

That feeling, and it is one echoed in other conversations among the donor class, is that a Warren run would expose divisions in the Democratic Party—between, in Adam Green's words, the populist and the corporate wings—that have lain largely dormant on the national level as Democrats fear a Tea Party-controlled executive branch.

"It would galvanize a part of the left, and then the question becomes, how do you keep them motivated for a general election?" said one Warren donor. "She is a fresh face. She would get a lot of attention, which could hurt Hillary."

If Hillary decided not to run, even Warren's most devoted supporters doubt that she could win the presidency.

"If Hillary comes out tomorrow and says, 'I'm not running,' obviously, this becomes a difference question, but I still think she shouldn't run," said one New York-based financial supporter. "She has so many holes in her resume. Even Obama had more experience than she does."

Added another California-based donor who has given thousands of dollars to Warren's political action committee, PAC for a Level Playing Field, "I don't think she would be a very good president. Two years ago she was a college professor, for goodness sakes. She has one issue and she is a great advocate for that one issue. She doesn't have the breadth of experience necessary to be president."

And even those who say they would be the first to line up behind a Warren candidacy say that part of them hopes she doesn't do it. "Of course I would be with her," said one Massachusetts Democrat who was one of Warren's earliest supporters. "But this is Ted Kennedy's seat. We know what can be accomplished in a long Senate career—it is almost as much as can be accomplished in the White House."

Most of the Democratic donors interviewed for this article were quick to point out that at that moment this is largely an academic discussion. Warren has said repeatedly—and in some cases to these donors personally—that she is not running for president. Those who have spoken to Warren recently say that she seems quite content in the Senate, and they doubt that she is ready to give up her life to run for president.

"I hear the chatter, but I also hear what Elizabeth Warren is saying, and she has been pretty firm in answer to that question," said Dennis Mehiel, a New York-based donor who hosted Warren early on in her Senate campaign.

And if the answer to that question ever changed?

"I love Elizabeth. But I go back a very long way with Hillary."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Jeb Bush isn't the Hillary Clinton of the 2016 GOP field. Not even close."

By Chris Cillizza

July 30, 2014, 9:00 a.m. EDT

There's a tendency in political circles to equate Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush when it comes to the 2016 presidential race. The thinking goes like this: Both are popular members of political dynasties with deep policy and political chops. And, if they both run for president, each has the inside track to be their party's nominee.

That is absolutely true for Clinton. It is not true for Bush.

CNN and the Opinion Research Corporation asked some 2016 horse-race questions in their latest poll, which was released Sunday.

Clinton led the Democratic field with 67 percent of the vote. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who has said repeatedly that she isn't running, took 10 percent. Joe Biden, who, not for nothing, is the Vice President of the United States, received 8 percent.

Compare Clinton's massive edge with Bush's standing relative to the rest of the GOP presidential contenders in the CNN/ORC survey. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is at the front of the pack with 13 percent, followed by Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul at 12 percent and Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Wisconsin Rep. Paul Ryan at 11 percent each. Bush is at 8 percent, tied with Texas Sen. Ted Cruz in fifth place.

The Bush number in the CNN poll is even more unimpressive when you consider that 2016 horse-race polling at this point is mostly a measure of name identification. (No regular people are following the campaign and the candidates -- such as they exist -- at the moment.) Bush, whose brother and father have both been presidents of the United States, has the single most recognizable last name in the Republican Party at the moment. And he still sits in the middle of the pack.

But, the problems with the Bush-as-clear-frontrunner idea go deeper than just the horse race. Dig into the CNN/ORC poll and you see that, among self-identified conservatives, Bush gets just 7 percent -- behind six other candidates: Paul, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, Ryan, Perry, Christie and Cruz.

And, it's not just first impressions -- as measured by the CNN/ORC poll -- either. Bush is on the wrong side of the party's base on two of the issues that stoke the most passion: immigration and Common Core.

On immigration, Bush has been publicly supportive of the bipartisan comprehensive reform bill; he called the legislation a "good effort." And he drew headlines around the country -- and fury in some parts of the conservative base -- when he argued that many people who enter the U.S. illegally do so out of an "act of love." Recently, Bush penned an editorial in the Wall Street Journal urging Republicans not to use the crisis of undocumented children entering the country as an "excuse" to not pass immigration reform.

The base of the Republican Party -- as fellow Floridian and potential 2016er Marco Rubio learned when he spearheaded the Senate bill -- is vehemently opposed to any legislation that offers a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants. Such efforts are widely described as "amnesty" by the GOP base.

On Common Core, a series of standardized national testing standards, Bush is again out of step with the GOP base. That group loathes Common Core as an example of federal government overreach -- a.k.a. Washington telling the states what to do. Bush, on the other hand, views it as a necessary step to get American kids competitive with the rest of the world. As the Miami Herald's Marc Caputo wrote in March:

"Bush has repeatedly explained the standards, implemented and controlled by the states, are designed to make the United States more competitive with the rest of the world. He said those who oppose the standards support the 'status quo,' oppose testing and are worried too much about children's self-esteem."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's stance on Common Core has already led to an effort in some conservative circles to oppose his possible presidential bid. As the Wall Street Journal's Beth Reinhard reported, protesters touting the hashtag "#stopjebnow" parked themselves outside of a Bush fundraiser for the Republican National Committee in Cincinnati last month.

As we learned in the 2012 presidential race, the Republican base demands/expects purity on the issues it most cares about -- ("Self deportation", anyone?) -- and punishes those who veer from party orthodoxy. On not one but two of the major issues, Bush stands not only apart from the party base but also from many of the people who he would likely face in the GOP presidential race. You can be sure Bush's opponents would bring up his stances on immigration and Common Core. A lot.

(Worth noting: Clinton is out of line with the Democratic base in term of her general positioning on economic inequality but, No. 1, there is no one willing to run who can really challenge her there and, No. 2, her numbers among liberals suggest she is plenty beloved to weather that criticism.)

All of the above is not to say that Bush couldn't be the Republican nominee for president. He could be. The establishment of the GOP -- major donors, the consultant class, the D.C. crowd -- all see him as the party's strongest candidate. That view would translate to successes in fundraising, staff recruitment and overall buzz.

But the idea that Bush would either a) clear the field or b) emerge as the un-questioned frontrunner -- ala Clinton -- simply isn't born out in the polling or the policy positions.

Bush is a strong potential candidate for president, but he is nowhere close to Clinton's status as a shoo-in if he runs.

NPR: "'Hard Choices' Tour Put Spotlight On Clinton's Strengths, Weaknesses"

By Mara Liasson

July 30, 2014, 4:59 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton's book tour is over. Although it wasn't a campaign rollout, it did offer a peek at the strengths and weaknesses of a possible Clinton candidacy.

One thing was clear: The former first lady, senator, presidential candidate and secretary of state may be readier to be president than to run for president.

She was surprisingly unprepared to talk about her wealth. Her "dead broke" comment on ABC showed a real defensiveness about the debt-to-riches trajectory of her family after she and Bill left the White House — not to mention the $12 million she's made in six-figure speaking fees since she left the State Department a year and a half ago. We weren't "truly well off," she said. "It was not easy" to raise money for "mortgages for houses." It's never a good thing when a politician talks about houses, plural. Remember when John McCain couldn't remember how many houses he owned?

It's not clear whether this will be a long-term problem. Clinton managed, eventually, to pivot to talking about the good fortune she and Bill have had compared to the lack of opportunity for ordinary people. But the "out of touch" meme has been launched: The RNC started a website called poorhillaryclinton.com .

Another lesson from the tour: Clinton will have to get used to the brave new world of the relentless and instantaneous media cycle and a press corps less deferential — and substantive — than the state department correspondents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She will be covered like no other candidate — certainly not in the same way Republican hopefuls Marco Rubio, Rand Paul or even Jeb Bush will be covered. Hillary Clinton is the most prominent female politician in America and she's the prohibitive front runner for her party's nomination. And, let's face it, she's a Clinton. So she won't have a chance to test out sound bites or ideas in Des Moines or Manchester in front of small groups of reporters: Everything she does and says will be covered and dissected as if it's national news.

Now, her poll numbers did not drop, and her book is still in the top ten on the New York Times best-seller list. The tour also put to rest questions about her health and stamina — she showed no signs of the "traumatic brain injury" Karl Rove suggested she's suffered. And the issue of Benghazi, while not gone completely, seems to have receded a bit.

But she still hasn't come up with an answer to the most important question for any campaign: Why her?

She's trying. She told Charlie Rose, "What you need if you're going to run for president is to be absolutely clear about what you will do and to make the case relentlessly about that."

There are the green shoots of a big idea. There's the title of the book itself — Hard Choices — intended to frame her leadership style as tough, ready and competent. (A subtle rebuke or contrast, perhaps, to the man she hopes to succeed?)

And she said that she plans to run a "specific" campaign about economic growth and inequality — a sign she intends to bridge the left- center divide in her party on these issues.

After all of this, it's probably a good idea that Clinton is going on vacation. She'll be back in public in the late fall when she campaigns for Democratic Senate candidates. Then she'll have just a few months to make a decision and put together the structure of a presidential campaign. While there once was a spirited debate about whether she would or wouldn't run, there's now a consensus, which the book tour only cemented — Hillary Clinton is running for president.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "$5 million, $50 million or even more – just how rich is Hillary Clinton? Here's why we don't know."

By Alexander Becker

July 30, 2014, 11:19 a.m. EDT

Ever since Hillary Clinton drew attention to her finances by claiming her family was "dead broke" when they left the White House, speculation has focused on a seemingly simple question: Exactly how rich are the Clintons?

The answer, at least for the time being, is that there's no way for the public to know.

The couple's wealth since Bill Clinton's presidency ended in early 2001 has been generated largely from paid speeches, lucrative book deals and successful investments.

Some of that wealth has been detailed over the years in the financial disclosure forms Hillary Clinton was required to file as a senator and as secretary of state, as well as in tax returns she released as part of her 2008 presidential run. These forms record income from both Clintons jointly.

But loose federal disclosure rules, requiring that officials report the value of their holdings using only wide ranges, leave much room for interpretation. And while Hillary Clinton's past tax returns offer more data points than exist for most other potential presidential candidates, the information is incomplete - and out of date.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2010, then-Secretary Clinton's financial disclosures revealed a net worth totaling between roughly $10 and $50 million. In 2012, the last year for which she disclosed finances, Clinton's net worth was estimated to be between $5 million and $25 million.

Clinton deflected a question about her net worth during an interview with Fusion's Jorge Ramos that aired Tuesday night. Asked if she knew the figure, Clinton replied, "Within a range, yeah. I mean, we have two very nice houses, which we're very proud of and not selling anytime soon." When Ramos asked if it was millions, she said, "Yes indeed."

A spokesman for Clinton did not respond to requests for comment or to specific e-mail questions about her net worth.

Lawyers and government ethics officials say federal personal financial disclosure rules are vague for a reason. The rules are designed to prevent conflicts of interest between those in office and their investments, not to provide values for specific holdings.

Assets such as mutual funds and stocks, and liabilities like credit card debt must be disclosed by name if their worth exceeds a certain amount.

"These governmental personal financial disclosure forms are not intended to represent either in general or specifically net worth," said Jan Baran, a partner at law firm Wiley Rein with experience in government ethics law.

In 2010 for example, Clinton disclosed two JP Morgan accounts each worth between $5 million and $25 million. Her 2011 and 2012 disclosures show only one JP Morgan account worth between $5 million and $25 million. It's unknown whether Clinton's net worth during this period actually decreased, or if assets were simply consolidated into one account that remained within the $5 million to $25 million range.

Also unclear is how the Clintons' income factored into their reported net worth. The tax returns Hillary Clinton released during her 2008 campaign show that the Clintons made $87.3 million in joint adjusted gross income between 2001 and 2006. Full tax returns for years beyond 2006 have not been made public, but a recent Washington Post report on Bill Clinton's paid speeches shows $49.2 million in further earnings from appearances alone between 2007 and 2012. Adding those figures together shows that the Clintons' confirmed income between 2001 and 2012 was at least $136.5 million.

The result is that Americans knew relatively little about Clinton's total wealth while in office - and probably know even less now, as there are no publicly available documents showing income or net worth for the period since she left the State Department.

That said, it's clear that both Clintons have been paid handsomely during that time, from continued speeches and for Hillary Clinton's recently released book.

Some have attempted to estimate the extent of the couple's recent financial fortunes. Bloomberg News reported, for example, that Clinton "earned at least $12 million in 16 months since leaving the State Department," though the report acknowledged that the information was based on incomplete estimates.

The lack of specific information has led to uncertainty among Clinton's rivals and backers, all of whom would like to know to what degree her personal wealth might play a role in an election in which populism and income inequality seem likely to be factors. After all, Democrats were successful in using Mitt Romney's riches against him in 2012. Romney's net worth was reported to be as high as $250 million.

"It's hard really to come up with much more specifics than what [the documents] give," said Tim Miller, who as executive director of America Rising PAC, a Republican opposition research group, is in charge of helping to shape GOPattacks on Clinton.

If Clinton decides to run for president, she would have to file another financial disclosure form - and she would almost certainly be pressured to release more up-to-date tax returns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Only then will anyone know how rich she really is.

Fox News politics: "Head of Benghazi probe says no witnesses off limits, including Clinton"

By Catherine Herridge

July 29, 2014

The Republican head of the Benghazi Select Committee warned Tuesday that no witnesses would be off limits in its upcoming probe and that he would consider going to court, if necessary, to compel testimony.

"I can't skip over a witness that I think we ought to talk to simply because there is an assertion of either privilege or immunity," Chairman Trey Gowdy of South Carolina told Fox News in an exclusive interview.

He said that while he has received good cooperation to date, and the issue had not yet arisen, "if you mean to say that 'not only can they not talk, they don't have to come,' you have to litigate that."

Gowdy said the investigation will be driven by facts, characterizing as strongly bipartisan his work with the committee's ranking Democrat, Elijah Cummings of Maryland, to review documents and identify witnesses.

He also said he anticipates the first public hearing will be held in September and will focus on the State Department investigation into the 2012 attack and whether its recommendations have been implemented.

Asked whether he wants Hillary Clinton to testify, Gowdy said, "I want everyone who has access to relevant information, and it is, I think, impossible to argue that the secretary of State at the time would not have access to relevant information..."

Gowdy said he was not trying to single out any particular witness. He insisted he was just as interested in the former acting director of the CIA, Michael Morell, who was accused of misleading Congress over the flawed "talking points" that blamed a protest for the assault, as he was in the unnamed CIA public information officer who made a significant edit of the points.

"Either talk to all of them," Gowdy said, "Or concede you are not interested in getting all the facts."

Gowdy also said he hoped former CIA Director David Petraeus, who remains under FBI investigation nearly two years after he resigned, would participate voluntarily.

"This is going to be serious, fact-centric. There are not going to be leaks. There are not going to be selective releases," he said. "Hopefully, if the investigation is still ongoing, he (Petraeus) may conclude, he has an absolute right to conclude, that he is still going to participate."

Asked if the scope would extend to other current and former government and Congressional figures, including presidential adviser Ben Rhodes, former UN ambassador Susan Rice, and D.C.consulting group Beacon Global Strategies, Gowdy replied, "how can I run an investigation and at the end say that it was thorough and complete and fact-centric and fair if I began to rule out people that we're going to talk to?"

Beacon Global Strategies members include Clinton's principal gatekeeper, Philippe Reines, her former adviser for political and military affairs at State, Andrew Shapiro, the former chief of staff to Leon Panetta at CIA and the defense department, Jeremy Bash, as well as Michael Allen, the former staff director for the Republican-led House Intelligence Committee that investigated Benghazi.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The online bios of its founders and managing directors suggest no group knows more about the terrorist attack and the Obama administration's response as well as having a vested interested in the scandal's impact on Clinton's presidential ambitions.

Gowdy said the fact-driven approach has derailed any attempts to minimize the importance of the committee's work. "The initial efforts to marginalize us as just a political exercise dedicated to drumming up the base, those efforts were not successful...Democrats are not only cooperating. They are suggesting, in some instances, other ideas for hearings. "

While the committee, which now stands at 13 staff but should reach its target of 20 by September, is focused on a detailed timeline to identify gaps in the facts, Gowdy said he believes closed or private depositions of witnesses as opposed to open hearings would provide the most information.

"Five minutes has proven time and time again to be an inadequate amount of time to get to the truth,"Gowdy explained. "I'm certainly not good enough in five minutes to unlock all the mysteries in the world. I might not be doing five hours but I would rather use whatever investigatory tool allows me the most amount of time with a witness or potential witness and I think that will be depositions as opposed to public hearings."

On Tuesday, the committee members met behind closed doors with the victims' relatives including Pat Smith, the mother of foreign service officer Sean Smith.

"It's the one thing that I wanted was this investigation to get the answers," Smith said. "And the people say that they're gonna do their best so this is what I'm hoping for."

CNBC: John Harwood: "She's gone from Foggy Bottom, but global chaos still hurts Hillary"

By John Harwood

July 30, 2014

The chaos enveloping international relations this year has taken its toll on President Barack Obama's approval rating and midterm election prospects for his party. But it also hurts Hillary Rodham Clinton.

By serving as Obama's secretary of state, the former first lady forged an independent political identity that has made her the front-runner to succeed him in 2016. At the same time, that tenure ties her political standing to the condition of American foreign policy even after she has departed Foggy Bottom.

I asked Clinton, in an interview last week for National Public Radio, how much responsibility she bears for turmoil in Ukraine, Gaza, Iraq and Syria. "It doesn't do us much good to point fingers at each other," she said. Her 2016 rivals are already pointing.

In particular, she can expect they'll point at what she told me about relations with Vladimir Putin's Russia, which she and Obama famously tried to "reset" when they took office after the presidency of George W. Bush.

"The reset worked," she said. Clinton pointed to Russia's cooperation on an arms treaty, pressure on Iran, and the war in Afghanistan early in the Obama administration. But that statement may sound jarring to voters unsettled by Russian aggression now.

"Every party in the White House has the responsibility during the time it's there to do the best we can, to lead and manage the many problems we face, and I think we did that in the first term," she said. The distinction between Obama's first and second terms is unlikely to be so clear in a 2016 campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the diplomatic memoir "Hard Choices" that she's currently promoting, Clinton notes that a secretary of state must serve as CEO of a large diplomatic apparatus. I asked whether any of the problems the administration now faces abroad or at home—think Veterans Administration, the IRS and the NSA—stem from a "management deficit." Governors often tout the value of their executive experience as better preparation for the White House than the legislative experience of members of Congress. The three leading players of the Obama presidency so far are former senators Obama, Biden and Clinton.

"Oh, you don't expect me to agree with that, do you?" she responded with a chuckle. It may not be the last time she gets that question.

Clinton was upbeat during the interview, which hasn't always been the case in her relations with the press. Former New York Times editor Jill Abramson recently noted that the ex-secretary of state has unrealistically high expectations for her portrayal in the media.

"I do sometimes expect more than perhaps I should," Clinton told me. As robust as her political standing appears right now, she should expect a difficult campaign if she decides to launch one.

Baltimore Sun opinion: Bush Ambassador William L. Jacobsen Jr.: "President Hillary Clinton"

By William L. Jacobson Jr., ambassador to the Republic of Guinea-Bissau from 1989 to 1992

July 30, 2014, 12:35 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton — imagine if she runs and wins!

In America, moms and dads of daughters will throw their arms around their girls' shoulders and say, "OK honey, now that the highest and seemingly most impervious glass ceiling is gone, in terms of your future, the sky's the limit!" Grandpas and grandmas will do the same with their granddaughters.

Expect wide approval from American women of any age and enthusiastic response from women worldwide who will welcome the news that the charismatic, eloquent and tireless campaigner for women's welfare, rights and opportunities also is the new leader of the free world.

Governments of our north Atlantic partners will applaud the election's outcome. Some might even add, "About time!" That same response might be expected from those Latin American nations that have promoted women to important leadership positions.

Despots and leaders of countries that treat females according to medieval standards will shudder at the prospect that the new U.S. president's admonishment about treatment of women carries even more authority than before.

Within the U.S., suddenly having a woman as head of state, expect there to be a surge in female confidence. More will seek election to office — at the city, county and state levels as well as to Congress. If two fellows can organize a startup business using their garage, why can't a couple of enterprising women follow their dreams and establish a startup business using the basement or spare bedroom, or even their own garage for that matter? All it takes is some imagination, seed money and self-confidence.

At the university level, more women students may elect to study economics and business courses to take advantage of widening opportunities for females in finance and business (see the Federal Reserve; see General Motors).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A female commander in chief is unlikely to tolerate the military's ho-hum response to the outrageous record of rape and sexual assault perpetrated by servicemen against their female service counterparts.

In short, election of our first woman as president will be to politics what sports writers term a "game changer!" Events will begin to be judged by "before HRC" and "after HRC."

While she sits in the Oval Office, President Clinton may expect to hear from citizen groups pressing for issues concerning women such as what compensation is paid men compared with what women receive for doing the same job. Other interest groups will attempt to enlist her as an ally in the campaign to provide more and better day care facilities to assist working mothers.

Americans may recall the first few days of the John F. Kennedy presidency when JFK was photographed in the Oval Office with his children playing around the president's desk.

The first few days of this Clinton presidency promise another historic photo opportunity as newly inaugurated head of state, an attractive blond woman taking care of the nation's business at her desk in the Oval Office — a radiant, self-confident smile on her face.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Ryan will wait until 2015 to decide on presidential run"

By Lori Montgomery

July 30, 2014, 10:08 a.m. EDT

Rep. Paul Ryan said Wednesday that he is currently "focusing on policy," rather than his own political ambitions, and that he will wait until next year to decide whether to seek the Republican presidential nomination in 2016.

"There really aren't any deliberations" about a presidential run, Ryan (R-Wisc.) said at a breakfast hosted by the Christian Science Monitor. "I've been doing my job, focusing on the here and now, 2014. I've consciously decided not to think about my personal ambitions or personal career moves or how I can think about something after 2014."

Ryan, who ran on the 2012 presidential ticket with Mitt Romney, is angling to chair the powerful House Ways and Means Committee in the next Congress. He recently unveiled an ambitious plan to reform federal anti-poverty programs.

Ryan said he will sit down with his wife in 2015 to decide whether to seek national office once again.

The Onion [Satire]: "Hillary Clinton Spends Busy Day Fueling Speculation, Not Ruling Things Out"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 30, 2014

WASHINGTON—Capping off a packed week of weighing options and giving serious thought, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton spent a busy day in Washington fueling speculation and not ruling things out, her spokesman confirmed today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“After dedicating a few hours in the morning to drawing a lot of focus, laying groundwork, and calculating risks, Mrs. Clinton conducted a full afternoon of taking stock of and thinking it through, as well as several hours of careful considering,” Clinton press aide Nick Merrill said of the 66-year-old’s breakneck schedule of entertaining various possibilities and seeing all sides.

“Between looking ahead and setting the stage, Mrs. Clinton has been putting in 18-hour days of late. No sooner has she finished up an evening’s worth of hinting at than she has to wake up the next morning at 6 a.m. and resume being touted as.” At press time, sources reported that Clinton was trying to squeeze in several more minutes of not rushing to decisions before sparking rumors and generating buzz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: petition@kirkpatrickforarizona.com <info@kirkpatrickforarizona.com>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 12/12/2014 11:33:29 AM
Subject: SIGNATURE REQUESTED: [Grand Canyon]

KIRKPATRICK FOR ★ ARIZONA

Click here to demand Congress ban new uranium mining at the Grand Canyon >>

Uranium mining around the Canyon poses a real threat to our natural treasure. This practice could contaminate our water supply, pollute our communities and destroy our local economy. We must protect the Grand Canyon.

Please sign your name demanding Congress ban new uranium mining at the Grand Canyon >>

Name: John Podesta
Signature: PENDING

SIGN YOUR NAME >>

John -- The Grand Canyon is incredibly valuable to the Arizona economy. Just take a look:

6,000: Jobs created by the Grand Canyon.
$476,000,000: Yearly income the Grand Canyon provides to our local economy.
46,650: Number of people who have signed our petition to save the Grand Canyon.

Look John, the Grand Canyon is our district's own personal Wonder of the World.

But more uranium mining around the Canyon poses a real threat to our natural treasure. This practice could contaminate our water supply, pollute our communities and destroy our local economy.

It's absolutely critical we seek a long-term solution to protect the Grand Canyon.

So far, over 46,000 people in Arizona and around the country have stepped up to demand Congress ban new uranium mining at the Grand Canyon. We need to get 50,000 strong demanding Congress take action immediately.

Will you join Ann in calling on Congress to permanently protect the Canyon?

Thanks,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Team Kirkpatrick

Paid for by Kirkpatrick for Arizona

This message was sent to: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Change or update your email address by clicking here .

We believe that emails are a crucial way for our campaign to stay in touch with supporters like you. However, if you'd prefer to take a break from emails, click here . If you'd just like to receive fewer emails, you can click here .

Our campaign is powered by supporters like you. Your grassroots support is critical to helping Ann fight back against Republican lies. If you'd still like to unsubscribe from our emails, click here . If you'd like to donate to our campaign, please click here . Thanks for having Ann's back!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/20/2015 12:11:38 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: Bernie's base problems

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

An irritated Bernie Sanders tries to speak as he is shouted down by minority protesters Saturday at a Netroots Nation town hall meeting in Phoenix. (AP Photo/Ross D. Franklin)

BY JAMES HOHMANN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE BIG IDEA:

PHOENIX—Bernie Sanders is unaccustomed to being heckled by protesters. The self-identified democratic socialist was caught off guard here Saturday when African-American and Latino activists jeered him at Netroots Nation. Sanders' inability to control the audience – he tried to shut them up and then he tried to yell over them – underscores his broader struggle to expand his appeal and highlights why his summer surge is unlikely to last.

The huge crowds Sanders draws are overwhelmingly white, and polling consistently shows that virtually all of his support comes from whites. After Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two contests on the calendar, Latinos and African-Americans represent a massive share of the Democratic primary electorate in the next two: Nevada and South Carolina.

The senator's standard stump speech – a call for political revolution – does not include much specifically aimed at Latino or African-American voters. Asked specifically what he's done for black Americans Saturday, he cited his vote for Obamacare. Asked to offer concrete proposals on what he'd do to help blacks if elected, he initially responded: "We're going to transform the economic system so we create millions of new jobs." The generalities only made the protesters angrier. "I want Bernie Sanders to say my name," they chanted as the senator tried to speak. The event went so off the rails that the moderator abruptly ended it 15 minutes early. "Okay, good," said a peeved Sanders. He then skipped a scheduled meeting with black activists.

Sanders aides' point out that he attended the March on Washington, endorsed Jesse Jackson Jr.'s 1988 presidential campaign and has a 100 percent rating from the NAACP. "Black lives, of course, matter," Sanders told the crowd here. But if Sanders cannot bring African-Americans into his coalition, his support in the nominating contest will be decidedly limited.

STRUGGLING TO SCALE UP—Will the Summer of Sanders be followed by the Fall of Sanders? One of his own strategists mused on that question to a Boston Globe reporter. "Already the Sanders campaign infrastructure is creaking under the weight of the unexpected interest in his candidacy," reports Annie Linskey, who traveled with the senator on his weekend campaign swing. "Tens of thousands of bumper stickers were on back order. Venues for rallies need to be changed multiple times as the RSVPs pile high … He revels in this relative lack of professional help. To make his point, he briefly commandeered an interview with a reporter last week in Washington. 'Ask me who my campaign finance director is,' he said over coffee in a Senate cafeteria. 'We don't have one. Ask me who my pollster is,' he said. 'We don't have one.' He said he writes his own direct mail."

Watch a 13-minute clip of Sanders' give-and-take with the hecklers in Phoenix on YouTube:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WEAK ON IMMIGRATION—Sanders helped kill comprehensive reform in 2007, siding with labor over Latinos. Some Latino activists have complained that Sanders does not talk about the issue as much as Hillary Clinton, something else that will prevent him from forming an enduring and viable bulwark of support. At the town hall, moderator Jose Antonio Vargas (an undocumented immigrant who formerly wrote for The Washington Post) pressed Sanders on his vote opposing the 2007 immigration bill, which Clinton supported. Sanders explained that, while he backs a pathway to citizenship, he worries about a flood of cheap labor entering the country and taking jobs from blue-collar Americans. Back then, he spoke about his "strong support" for "securing our borders" and "to hold employers accountable for hiring illegal immigrants." But he voted for the 2013 immigration bill that passed the Senate after getting money to help affected workers.

SOFT ON GUNS—The National Rifle Association played a pivotal role getting Sanders elected to the House. David A. Fahrenthold reports on the front page of today's Post that the NRA actively opposed the reelection of a Republican incumbent after he sponsored an assault weapons ban: "As a candidate in 1990, Sanders won over gun rights groups by promising to oppose one bill they hated — a measure that would establish a waiting period for handgun sales. In Congress, he kept that promise. The dynamic served as an early demonstration that, despite his pure-leftist persona, Sanders was at his core a pragmatic politician, calculating that he couldn't win in rural Vermont without doing something for gun owners." Amazing quote: "Bernie Sanders is a more honorable choice for Vermont sportsmen than Peter Smith," Wayne LaPierre, who was — and still is — a top official at the national NRA wrote members that year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders supporters see him as a modern-day Robin Hood. (Photo by Charlie Leight/Getty Images)

— FIRST LOOK — The first ad from the Chris Christie super PAC focuses on the New Jersey governor's opposition to the Iran deal. America Leads will put $1.1 million behind the spot in New Hampshire between tomorrow and August 6, including an ad buy on Boston TV and a strong digital component. The 30-second ad shows Christie at a town hall meeting in Sandown, New Hampshire. "This president is allowing Iran, the largest state sponsor of terrorism in the world, to have a glide path towards a nuclear weapon," the Republican tells the crowd. "A strong American military is not built to wage war; it is built to prevent war. I am the only candidate who has actually been responsible for fighting terrorism and has prosecuted terrorists and put them in jail. And if I become president, we're going to protect the homeland, not lower our defenses against them."

The group, led by former Republican Governors Association executive director Phil Cox, reported raising $11 million last week. America Leads has also reserved $2.8 million worth of airtime during the three months leading up to next February's New Hampshire primary.

This is part of a broader strategy to "let Christie be Christie" and go positive from the start. With a cameraman at every town hall, the super PAC is developing a library of footage of the governor taking on every issue out there so that when an issue moves to the forefront, like Iran, they can quickly get up on the air with Christie in his own voice saying where he stands. “Christie’s persona and authenticity lend itself to this kind of approach,” a strategist for the group explained. Watch the 30-second spot here :

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost ’s morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions by Elise Viebeck .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— Hillary Clinton’s campaign floated details of a revamp in capital-gains tax rates that she will propose later this week. The Wall Street Journal reports on its front page that her plan “would hit some short-term investors with higher rates … to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth.” The paper says the details of the plan are being finalized, but she “would create a sliding scale with at least three new rates that change depending on how long an investment is held.” And there’s a nod to the Elizabeth Warren wing: “The Clinton campaign hasn’t ruled out taxing such investments at the regular income-tax rate.”

— Cuba’s embassy in Washington officially reopened at midnight after being closed for five decades. There will be a flag raising ceremony later this morning with 500 guests, including a 30-member delegation of Cubans. The foreign minister is scheduled to meet with John Kerry later today. Kerry is slated to go to Havana next month to raise our flag over the U.S. Interests Section.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Greek banks reopened this morning after being closed for three weeks, "but new austerity taxes meant that most everything was more expensive — from coffee to taxis to cooking oil." The Associated Press reports from downtown Athens that "people queued up in an orderly fashion as the banks unlocked their doors at 8 a.m., but restrictions on most transactions remained. The daily cash withdrawal limit stayed at 60 euros ($65) but the government added a weekly limit of 420 euros ($455)."

Customers at a bank branch in Athens this morning. (Photo by Matthew Lloyd/Bloomberg)

GET SMART FAST:

1. Secretary of State John Kerry and Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz pulled off a Full Ginsburg on Sunday, appearing on all five Sunday shows to defend the Iran nuclear deal, as Defense Secretary Ash Carter flew to the Middle East to reassur e to Israel, Saudi Arabia and Jordan.
2. Some lawmakers, including top Democrats, express frustration that the U.N. Security Council gets the chance to vote on the deal this week, signaling the international community's intention to dismantle the sanctions against Iran before Congress votes on it. (NYT)
3. Members of both the Ku Klux Klan and Black Panthers protested at the South Carolina state house on Saturday, but then local churches gathered peacefully on the grounds Sunday to pray for peace in the state. (The State)
4. Mitsubishi apologized for using U.S. prisoners of war as forced labor in mines during World War II, the first such apology by a Japanese company. (BBC)
5. The widow of Eric Garner and hundreds of protesters rallied to call on federal prosecutors to indict the white police officer who put the black New York City man in a fatal chokehold exactly a year ago, per the New York Post .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. George H.W. Bush, 91, was discharged from a Maine hospital yesterday after falling at home and fracturing a bone in his neck last week.
2. Scott Walker said he does not know whether being gay is a choice: "I don't have an opinion on every single issue out there … I don't know the answer to that question." (CNN)
3. Rick Perry came out against the Boy Scouts of America's decision to allow openly gay leaders: "I believe that scouting would be better off if they didn't have openly gay scoutmasters." (NBC 's "Meet the Press")
4. Rand Paul apparently threatened to filibuster the highway bill in a bid to defund Planned Parenthood.
5. Ron Paul, breaking with his son, endorsed the Iran deal in a column posted on his institute's web site.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— "Angry protesters in Chattanooga: When's the government going to do something?" by Greg Jaffe and Thomas Gibbons-Neff: "The attack in Chattanooga, and the raw anger it has provoked here, illustrate the increasingly daunting odds that U.S. counterterrorism agencies face in an era marked by surging Islamist propaganda and a proliferation of disparate, self-radicalized, one-off threats. The FBI and the Department of Homeland Security have launched sweeping initiatives aimed at shoring up their ties to Muslim communities across the country…But in many ways the bureau is working against itself. Arrests of suspects accused of planning travel to Syria, sting operations and expanded surveillance have at times alienated the Muslim communities that security agencies depend on for cooperation."

— "California drought makes quest for water a consuming grind, " by Eli Saslow: "For a few days now, they had been without running water in the fifth year of a California drought that had finally come to them. First it had devastated the orchards where Gamboa and his wife had once picked grapes. Then it drained the rivers where they had fished and the shallow wells in rural migrant communities… 'Come live your California dream in this cute ranchette!' the real estate listing had read, but now the ranchette was another California house with no running water. In a county where half of all residents depend on well water, their well was the 1,352nd to go dry."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: TRUMP'S TIPPING POINT CAME SATURDAY. "It was only a matter of time before Donald Trump crossed the kind of line he did on Saturday, when he questioned the heroism of Sen. John McCain, a Vietnam War POW," Dan Balz writes in this morning's paper. "The question now is whether Candidate Trump is immune from the laws of political gravity or soon will be isolated and regarded as an object of scorn or curiosity rather than of presidential seriousness … Many Republicans said Sunday that they think his attack on McCain (R-Ariz.) marks a turning point for Trump the politician." Here's a great graphical representation from our partners at Zignal Labs of what a difference one day can make in presidential politics–

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

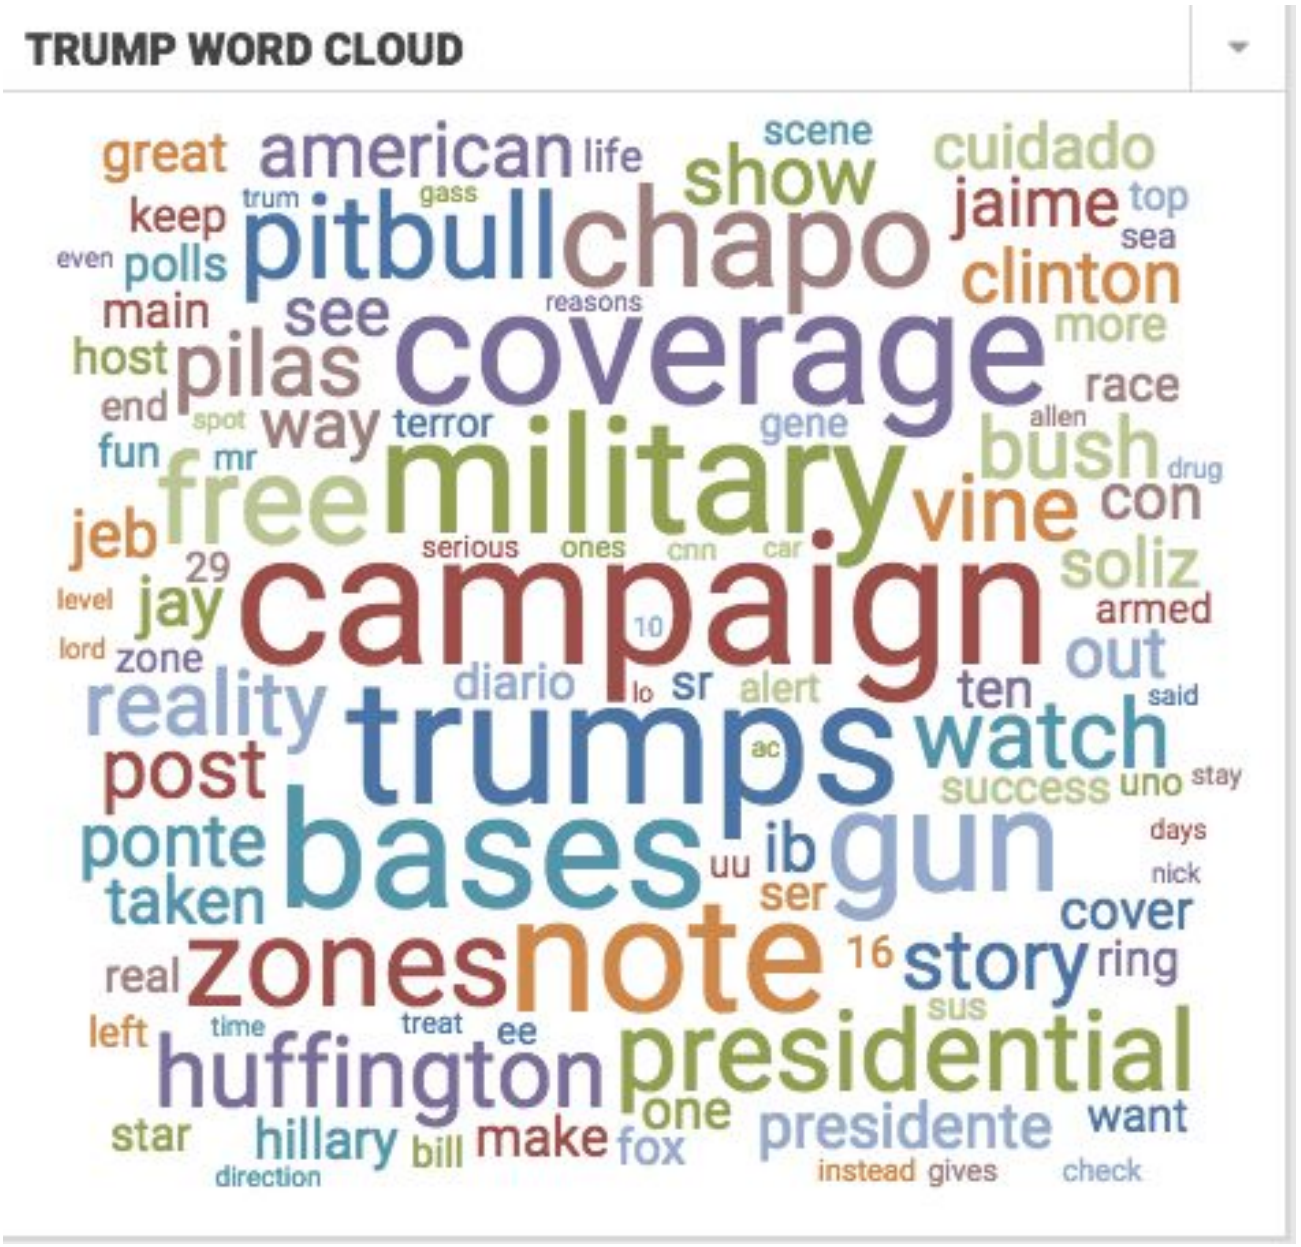
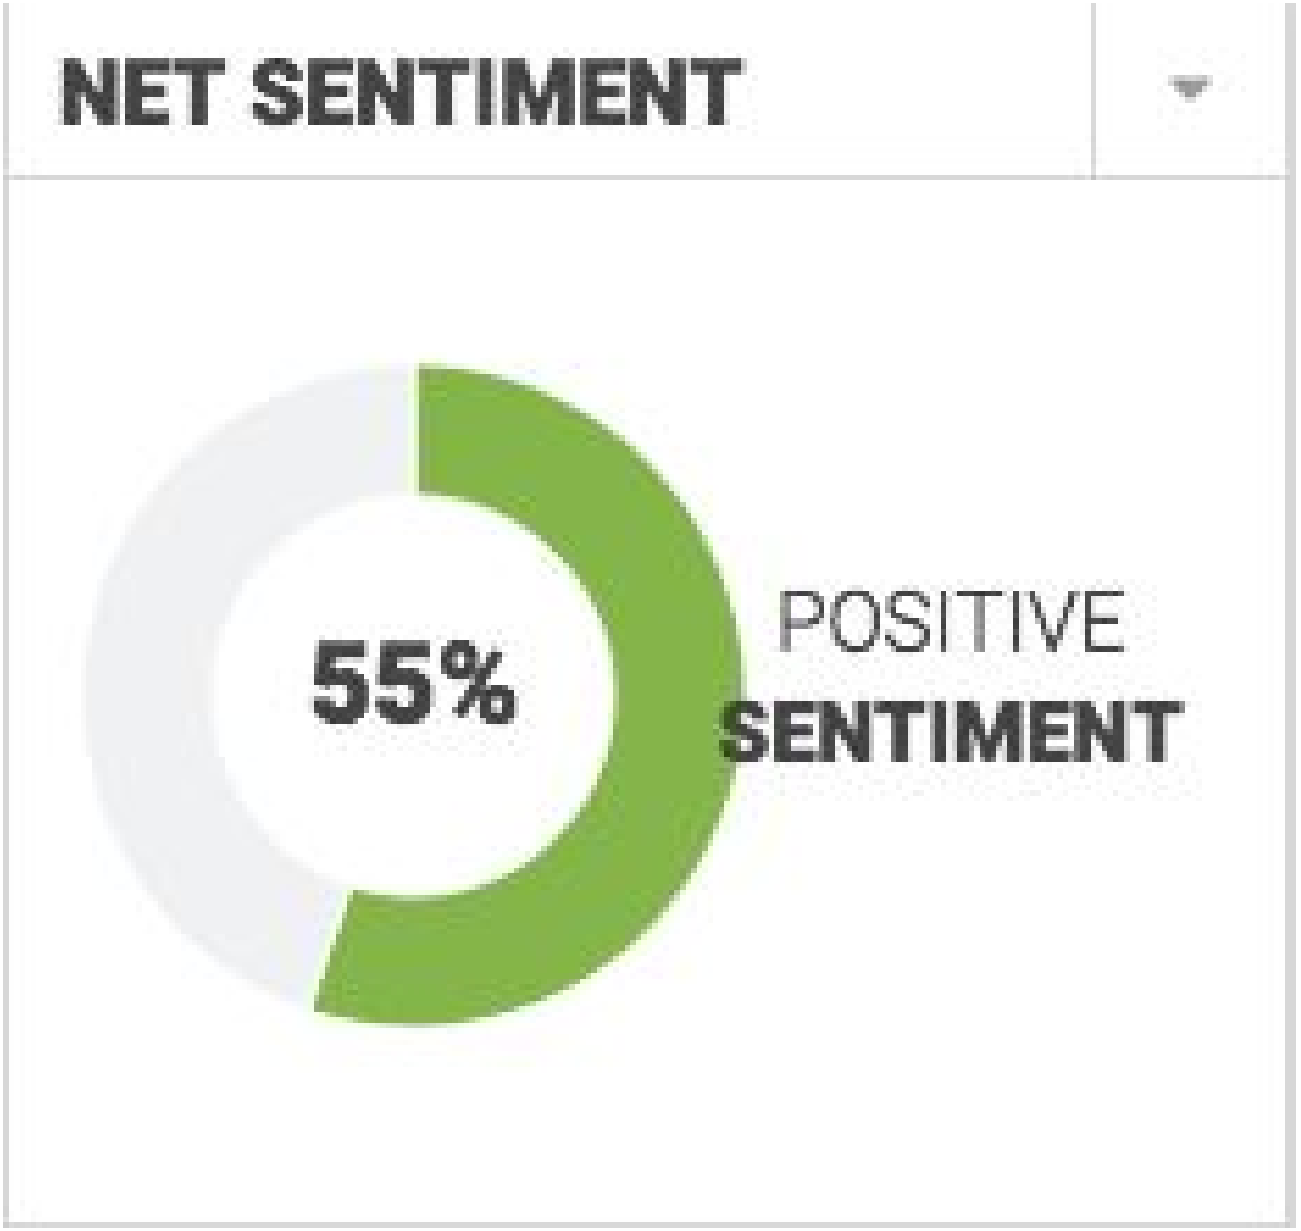
This is the word cloud of Trump-related mentions on Friday:



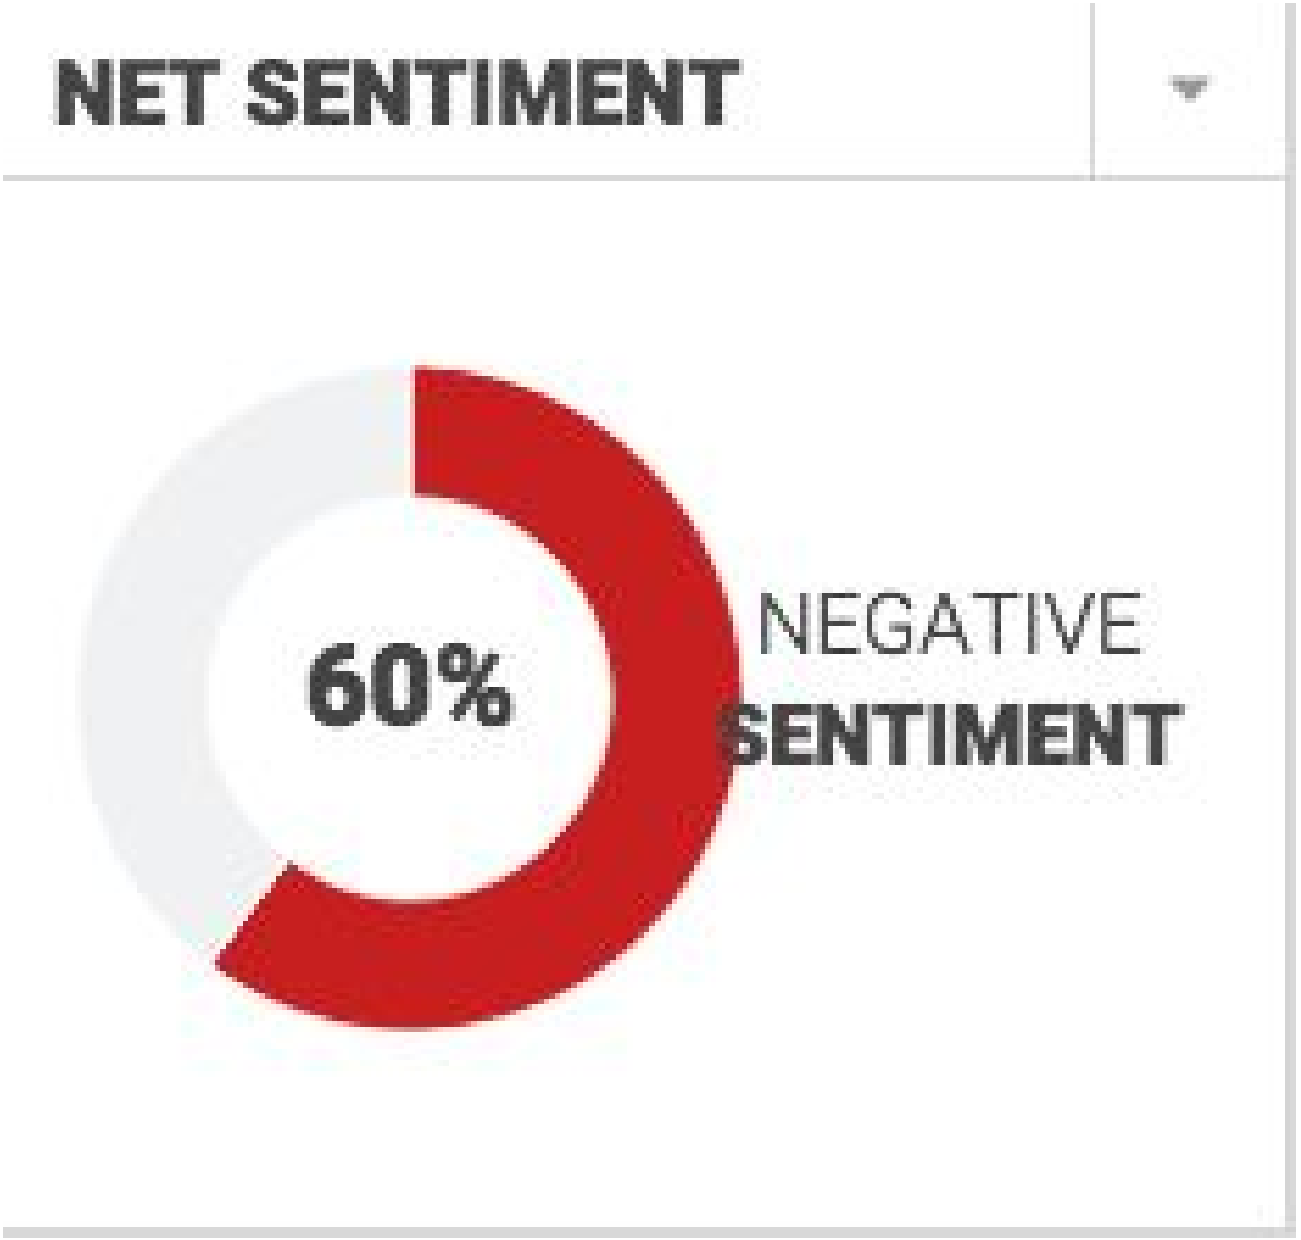
An analysis shows that the conversation about Trump was actually more positive than negative Friday:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



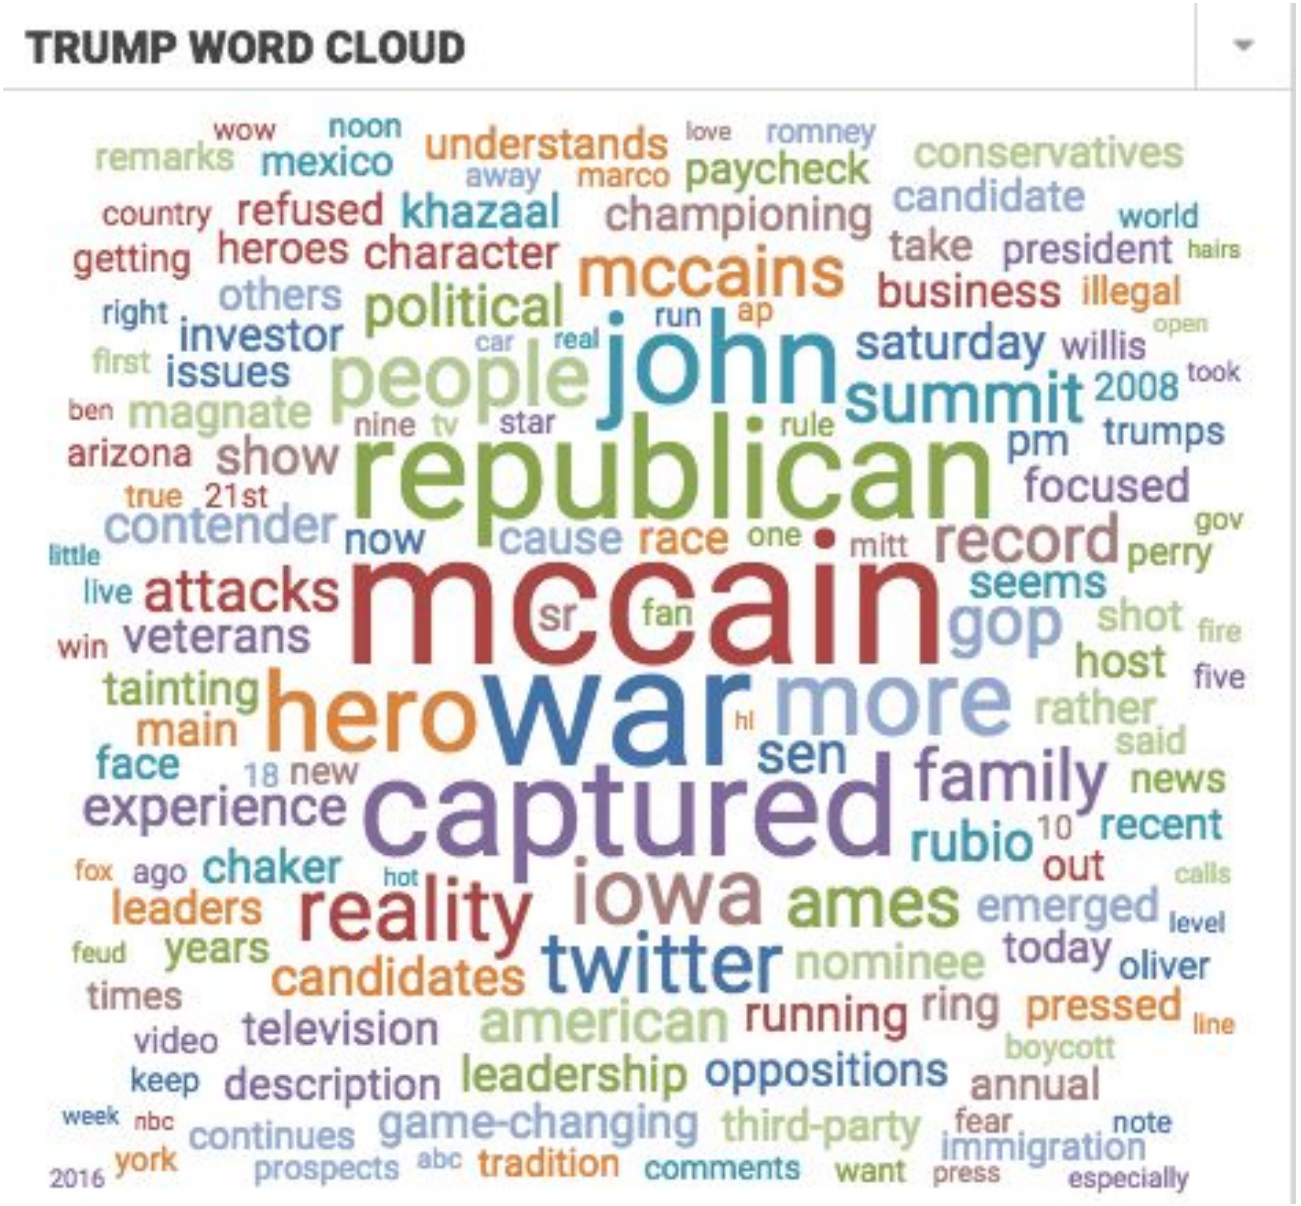
But, by the end of the day Saturday, there was a 15-point swing in sentiment as Twitter turned on Trump:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



And this word cloud shows the extent to which the McCain comments totally overshadowed everything else:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



NO APOLOGY: Trump has an op-ed in today's USA Today defending himself. "No, not at all," he replied yesterday when asked on ABC if he owes McCain an apology. Speaking to Martha Raddatz, he repeatedly accused McCain — who still bears the physical scars from the torture he was subjected to during more than five years in a North Vietnamese prison camp — of having "done nothing" for veterans.

More analysis from Balz on why the Trump comment is so significant: "Trump's candidacy for the GOP nomination is a knot of contradictions. He disparages the Affordable Care Act but has called for a universal national health-care program. He calls himself pro-life after earlier saying he was pro-choice. He wants to expand Social Security benefits. He has repeatedly mocked his opponents in the most personal ways. Could someone like that unite the Republican Party or the country? Such questions have been avoided, along with those of temperament and judgment. What happened Saturday could give license to his rivals and his critics to subject his candidacy — what he says and how he says it, where he stands vs. where he once stood — to the kind of scrutiny he has largely escaped." McCain will make his first comments about the insult on MSNBC's "Morning Joe."

–WHAT EVERYONE IS TALKING ABOUT:

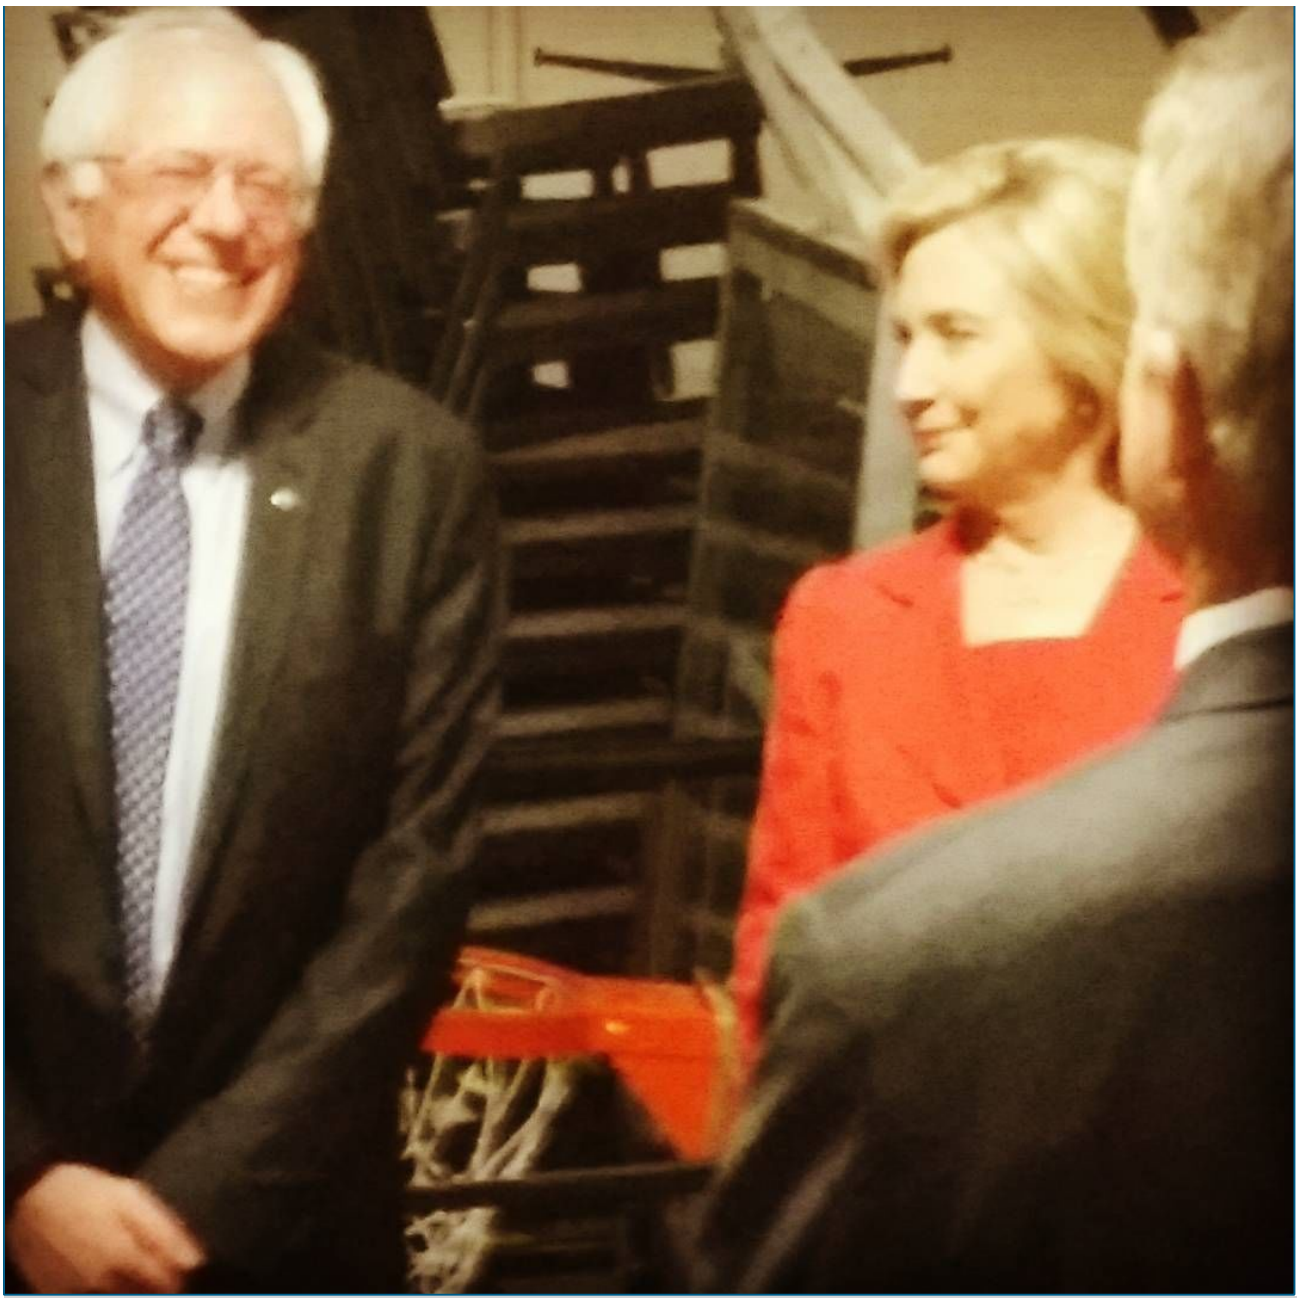
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Picture of the day:

John Kasich does a walk-through at The Ohio State University, where he will kick-off his presidential campaign tomorrow:

Bernie Sanders posted this knowing shot from backstage at the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame Dinner:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



(berniesanders)

Tweets of the day:

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) celebrated a special holiday:

> Today is #NationalIceCreamDay … or as I call it–Sunday. Has to be dark chocolate!
>
> — Nancy Pelosi (@NancyPelosi) July 19, 2015

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) commemorated the anniversary of the Seneca Falls Convention:

> Thinking of all the trailblazing women who gathered at #SenecaFalls 167 years ago today. Thanks for fighting for our right to vote.
>
> — D Wasserman Schultz (@DWStweets) July 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sens. Jeff Flake (D-Ariz.) and Dean Heller (R-Nev.) took a casual ride on horseback. “This is what senators do if they’re not running for President,” Flake joked:

(@JeffFlake)

Instagrams of the day:

Sunday was Star Wars Day at Nationals Park — pretty epic President’s Race:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(nationals)

Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) remembered meeting Ray Charles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(repstenyhoyer)

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) marked Mandela Day:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(repjohnlewis)

Rep. Elise Stefanik (R-N.Y.) took a flight on a Boeing EA-18G Growler at Naval Air Station Fallon in Nevada (Top Gun). “I feel the need … FOR SPEED, ” she wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(elisestefanik)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— Los Angeles Times, "Obama pushes to extend gun background checks to Social Security," by Alan Zarembo: "Seeking tighter controls over firearm purchases, the Obama administration is pushing to ban Social Security beneficiaries from owning guns if they lack the mental capacity to manage their own affairs, a move that could affect millions whose monthly disability payments are handled by others. The push is intended to bring the Social Security Administration in line with laws regulating who gets reported to the National Instant Criminal Background Check System, or NICS, which is used to prevent gun sales to felons, drug addicts, immigrants in the country illegally and others."

— Des Moines Register, "In Iowa, Walker aims for Broad Appeal ," by Brianna Pfannenstiel: "Walker told the Register he's counting on broad appeal to win over conservatives from every segment of the party, as well as independents and 'discerning Democrats,' to win Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucuses. 'Part of the reason we play well in Iowa is we don't just fit into one field,' he said. 'And this is consistent with how I've won in Wisconsin. I do well with everything from the tea party to the so-called establishment, from social conservatives to independents.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Los Angeles Times, "Hillary Clinton's political director brings key lessons from her own (losing) campaign," by Evan Halper: "Last year, Amanda Renteria returned home to California's Central Valley to run for Congress and got crushed. The race in the heavily Latino district exposed blind spots in Democratic strategy with Latino voters, who largely stayed home…Now, as Clinton's political director, Renteria is putting the campaign's vast resources to work avenging the 2014 midterms, when Democrats were unable to mobilize the coalition of minority voters that had helped elect President Obama twice…Clinton's massive Latino outreach machine is unprecedented for this stage in a primary. Most Latinos don't even know the name of Clinton's closest challenger for the Democratic nomination, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, according a new Univision poll."

— BuzzFeed, "Can Bill deBlasio turn Uber into the NRA? ", by Ben Smith: "So will Bill de Blasio pry the Uber app from his constituents' cold dead hands? That is the experiment the New York mayor will start running on Tuesday, when he imposes a cap on the growth of what is one of the fastest-growing businesses in the world…He is walking into a political buzzsaw: Uber has endless cash, real panic about getting capped in its biggest market, and every incentive to make an example of the high-profile New York mayor. The campaign is being run by David Plouffe, who once pulled off the rather impressive feat of persuading Democrats to hate the Clintons, and who immediately made it personal…'Mayor de Blasio's plan to stop Uber will cost 10,000 jobs, hurt underserved areas and make wait times for Uber cars skyrocket,' Plouffe told BuzzFeed in an emailed statement. 'With this view, New York City riders can see for themselves how much time this political payback to big taxi owners will cost them.'

— Wall Street Journal, "Dodd Frank Creators on Wall Street Reform, Five Years Later," by Victoria McGrane and Andrew Ackerman: "WSJ: Do you feel confident that you can declare 'too big to fail' dead? [Ex-Sen. Christopher] Dodd: I think so. … For the first time, insisting at least four times a year that these regulators sit down together to look over the horizon and what's occurring, it's made a difference already….WSJ: How much success do you think the financial industry has gotten in watering down the congressional intent of Dodd-Frank? Dodd: Not much. I know people complain about [Democratic Massachusetts Sen.] Elizabeth Warren [who has criticized regulators for not implementing Dodd-Frank more forcefully]. Elizabeth cares about this stuff and she's not antibanking. I know sometimes the rhetoric can be rather excessive. That's not new to politics. But overall she's watching carefully what's going on and I'm grateful to her for that."

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL:

— The Associated Press, "Christmas in the Capitol? Congress' to-do list grows ," by Andrew Taylor: "Congress' midsummer to-do list may take until Christmas to clear. At the top are maintaining the flow of highway funding, easing automatic budget cuts to the Pentagon and domestic agencies, renewing tax breaks and raising the debt limit. A misstep at any of several points could trigger a partial government shutdown … An eventual repeat of a government shutdown is a real possibility, though a short-term government-wide funding measure is likely in September and would buy time for negotiations."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Reuters, "Congress to examine FBI handling of Tennessee shooter ," by Andrea Shalal: "Lawmakers will examine possible shortcomings in law enforcement or intelligence in the case of a Tennessee shooting that killed five servicemen, a top Republican said on Sunday, adding that the case may be linked to Islamic State. Rep. Mike McCaul, who heads the U.S. House of Representatives homeland security committee, told ABC's 'This Week' program the case highlighted growing concern about Internet-based directives from Islamic State leaders in Syria."

— The Hill, "Dems worry Iran deal may wilt in dog days of August ," by Alexander Bolton: "Democratic lawmakers are holding back their support for President Obama's controversial nuclear deal with Iran, knowing the political dynamic surrounding it could change dramatically in the coming months. Political firestorms tend to erupt during the long, hot days of August, when lawmakers meet face-to-face with constituents in town-hall meetings that can quickly grow contentious. Pro-Israel and other political advocacy groups know this and plan to spend tens of millions of dollars over the next two months to build a firestorm of opposition to the deal."

— Politico, "Democratic self-funder preps U.S. House run in Florida ," by Marc Caputo: "Self-made multimillionaire Randy Perkins is becoming a Washington Democratic favorite to replace Rep. Patrick Murphy after the businessman met last week with party congressional-campaign honchos and said he'd spend as much as $5 million of his own money on the race … Perkins, owner and founder of AshBritt Inc., a debris-removal service, isn't yet ready to announce his candidacy. But all signs point toward a bid for the 18th Congressional District, the South Florida swing seat Murphy's leaving to run" for Marco Rubio's open seat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

New bill would allow companies to fire unwed mothers. From the Huffington Post : "In the wake of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in favor of same-sex marriage, Republicans are pushing legislation that aims to protect Americans who oppose these unions on religious grounds. But critics say the language is so broad, the bill creates a license to discriminate that would let employers fire women for getting pregnant outside of wedlock … This scenario isn't merely hypothetical. There are a number of recent cases where religious schools have fired unwed teachers for becoming pregnant."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

In an IS training camp, children told: Behead the doll. From The Associated Press: "The children had all been shown videos of beheadings and told by their trainers with the Islamic State group that they would perform one someday. First, they had to practice technique. The more than 120 boys were each given a doll and a sword and told, cut off its head … It is part of a concerted effort by the extremists to build a new generation of militants, according to AP interviews with residents who fled or still live under IS in Syria and Iraq."

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: Jeb Bush will deliver a policy speech at Florida State University in Tallahassee, Florida, about taking on federal power ("Mount Washington"). Chris Christie will hold town hall meetings in Mt. Pleasant and Hilton Head Island, South Carolina. Marco Rubio will campaign in Merrimack and Londonderry, New Hampshire. Bobby Jindal will hold events in Grand Mound and Davenport, Iowa.

–On the Hill: The House will meet in pro forma session at 2 p.m. The Senate will not convene again for votes until Tuesday, but a lot of members will be back in their offices.

–At the White House: President Obama will hold a bilateral meeting with Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari and deliver remarks at a reception marking the 25th anniversary of the Americans with Disabilities Act. Press Secretary Josh Earnest will brief the media at 12:30 p.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"Eat your heart out, Zuckerberg" — Jeb Bush tries on a hoodie sweatshirt he received as a gift while visiting San Francisco

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— "Like Sunday, today is miserably hot and humid and Tuesday is only modestly better," the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "It's downright muggy from the moment you step out the door (today), especially around the city (near and above 80 degrees even early in the morning). Under variably cloudy skies, temperatures heat up to near 90 by noon, and low-to-mid 90s for mid-late afternoon highs. Factoring in the humidity (dew points in the 70-75 range, slightly lower than Sunday but still very uncomfortable), it feels like 100 or so."

— The Nationals lost 5-0 to the Dodgers yesterday, losing the series 2-1.

VIDEO OF THE DAY:

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas) kicked off the weekend with a wacky throwback to "Soul Train":

(Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the weekend's scariest viral video clip, pro surfer Mick Fanning is shown fighting off an attacking shark during a competition in South Africa. Fanning escaped unharmed, and the competition was cancelled shortly after:

(Reuters)

You received this e-mail because you are registered on washingtonpost.com . We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive this newsletter, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Team Kirkpatrick" <info@kirkpatrickforarizona.com>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 10/11/2014 5:16:26 PM
Subject: PETITION: [Protect the Grand Canyon]

KIRKPATRICK FOR ★ ARIZONA

John --

The Grand Canyon delivers 6,000 jobs and over $475 million to our local economy each year.

That's why it's absolutely critical we seek a long-term solution to protect the Grand Canyon from new uranium mining.

John, will you sign our petition and demand that Congress pass a permanent ban on new uranium mining in the Grand Canyon?

---------- Original Message ----------

John --

6,000: Jobs created by the Grand Canyon
$476,000,000: Yearly income the Grand Canyon provides to our local economy.
46,200: Number of people who have signed our petition to save the Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon is our district's own personal Wonder of the World.

But more uranium mining around the Canyon poses a real threat to our natural treasure. This practice could contaminate our water supply, pollute our communities and destroy our local economy.

It's absolutely critical we seek a long-term solution to protect the Grand Canyon. Will you join Ann in calling on Congress to permanently protect the Canyon?

John, click here to sign our petition and add your name to the list of supporters demanding Congress ban new uranium mining in the Grand Canyon >>

As a native Arizonan, the Grand Canyon is especially important to Ann. But if we're going to protect it, we need your help.

ADD YOUR NAME: http://action.kirkpatrickforarizona.com/Grand-Canyon

Thanks,

Team Kirkpatrick

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paid for by Kirkpatrick for Arizona

This message was sent to: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Change or update your email address by clicking here .

We believe that emails are a crucial way for our campaign to stay in touch with supporters like you. However, if you'd prefer to take a break from emails, click here . If you'd just like to receive fewer emails, you can click here .

Our campaign is powered by supporters like you. Your grassroots support is critical to helping Ann fight back against Republican lies. If you'd still like to unsubscribe from our emails, click here . If you'd like to donate to our campaign, please click here . Thanks for having Ann's back!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 2/23/2015 1:29:34 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday February 23, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Monday February 23, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Concord Monitor opinion: Paul W. Hodes and Peter V. Emerson: "My Turn: Who else but Hillary can manage world's problems? "

"Although we promised not to join the chorus of those asking Secretary Clinton to run for president, we have taken a sober look at the world's condition, the prognosis for the future and America's position in the world, and Hillary Clinton is the only one who can manage the problems that others see as unmanageable."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Hillary Clinton and the #askhermore Oscar campaign"

"'Ready for Hillary', a super PAC urging the former Secretary of State to run for president, tweeted the hashtag #askhermore Sunday night before the Oscars. It's part of a campaign supported by actresses like Reese Witherspoon and Lena Dunham for reporters to ask more than 'who are you wearing?' on the red carpet."

The Daily Beast: "Sorry, But Clinton's Inevitably Is Not a Problem"

[Subtitle:] "And how exactly is it a bad thing for her or Democrats that Hillary Clinton has the nomination all but sewn up? News flash: It's not."

New York Times: "Economic Recovery Under Obama Creates Quandaries for 2016 Race"

"As both parties begin positioning themselves for the election to succeed Mr. Obama, the politics of the economy are far more complicated than the president would have them. Among Democrats, there are divisions over the degree to which Hillary Rodham Clinton, considered their leading contender, should praise the recovery and run on Mr. Obama's stewardship of the economy."

Politico: "National security still a perception problem for Democrats"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Now, more so than at any other time in the past 12 years, voters trust Republicans more than Democrats to protect them from terrorism. A new report by Ben Freeman and Michelle Diggles from Third Way, a center-left think tank, claimed to have identified the Democrats' antidote: Hillary Clinton."

Wall Street Journal: "Biden's Trips Fan 2016 Race Speculation"

"When Vice President Joe Biden traveled to South Carolina last week to speak about investing in infrastructure, some longtime supporters had another topic on their minds: 2016."

Articles:

Concord Monitor opinion: Paul W. Hodes and Peter V. Emerson: "My Turn: Who else but Hillary can manage world's problems?"

By Paul W. Hodes and Peter V. Emerson

February 22, 2015

We see ads frequently reminding us that friends do not let friends drive drunk. And we are also devoted to the idea that friends should not ask friends to run for president.

We are referring to all the drums beating, tongues wagging and lips pronouncing, "Run, Hillary, run."

We are not friends with Secretary Clinton, but we have great admiration and respect for her career of public service. She carries with her a list of accomplishments to which few can lay claim. She is respected and lauded around the world. Her ideas have tremendous power and influence because of her unparalleled experience.

So why would anyone wish on her one of the dirtiest, most degrading and exhausting processes ever conceived of? Already the lies, distortions and vicious personal attacks have begun. In fact, they never stopped; they just don't make it to the front pages of the papers or newscasts or postings every day. But they are out there, whispered and repeated myriad times every day and echoed by Fox News and other proponents of anything but the news or facts.

The world is becoming increasingly unstable and unpredictable, and therefore often far more threatening and dangerous to America and to American citizens at home and abroad. Looking but a few years down the road; there will be less food, less potable water and fewer basic human necessities for most of the world's exponentially expanding population. Consequently, there will be more violence, civil strive and war.

Unfortunately, many Americans are geographically and geopolitically challenged. Many still believe that America dominates the world and that we are neither dependent upon the international community nor subject to events occurring outside our borders. In short, many still hold opinions based on a world order long ago dismantled.

We are now interconnected and interdependent upon every region of the world. Thus international stability and our continued prosperity are under attack in our shrinking world:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

■ The continued advance of the Islamic State has already further destabilized an already precarious order in the unstable Middle East

■ The escalation of the Israeli-Palestinian stalemate with almost daily outbreaks of killings and retaliation.

■ Iran's continued nuclear program

■ The slowing of the Chinese economy and the potential head-on conflict over the Diaoyu Islands in China and the Senkaku islands in Japan.

■ The postponement of the election in Africa's largest democracy, Nigeria, a success for Boko Haram

■ Greece's possible default on its debt and the impact on the European Union

■ North Korea's continued militaristic posture and nuclear capabilities

■ Declining crop production in critical areas around the world

And the list goes on and on and on.

So what do these events mean to a waitress in New Hampshire, a farmer in Iowa, a rancher in Montana, an avocado grower in California, a high-tech entrepreneur in Massachusetts, a fisherman in Maine, a single mother in Harlem, a pensioner in Phoenix, a widower in Washington, our neighbors, family and friends?

It means that events in other countries, often far away, spill into and through our borders. Americans are part of a new global order – or too frequently global disorder – that challenges our traditional notions of American exceptionalism and leadership.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

International crises that emerge anew each day directly affect the prices of our food, gas, health care, etc. – our domestic tranquility and our national security. All these events affect the bottom-line of all American households.

So when we cut through the clutter of lies and gross distortions of the facts – all meant to create fear – to weigh and examine who's capable of making a dent in these seemingly intractable problems and challenges, there is only one person who is capable of managing them. Please note that we did not say solve these intractable problems because that would be impossible. But managing problems and challenges, that's possible.

Although we promised not to join the chorus of those asking Secretary Clinton to run for president, we have taken a sober look at the world's condition, the prognosis for the future and America's position in the world, and Hillary Clinton is the only one who can manage the problems that others see as unmanageable.

But given our pledge, we are reluctant to ask her to run for president, so we urge her to look around the world and within this extraordinary country of ours and ask herself, "Who else can accomplish what I can accomplish?"

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Hillary Clinton and the #askhermore Oscar campaign"

By Hunter Schwarz

February 22, 2015, 8:56 p.m. EST

"Ready for Hillary", a super PAC urging the former Secretary of State to run for president, tweeted the hashtag #askhermore Sunday night before the Oscars. It's part of a campaign supported by actresses like Reese Witherspoon and Lena Dunham for reporters to ask more than "who are you wearing?" on the red carpet.

The campaign comes on the heels of a re-energized conversation about sexism in Hollywood following revelations from last year's Sony Pictures hack that female actresses were in many instances paid less than their male counterparts.

On E!, Ryan Seacrest seemed to have gotten the message, asking the "who-are-you-wearing" question throughout the night without actually using those exact words in that exact order, and promptly following it up with a similar question for the man. ("Who designed your dress?" he asked Chrissy Teigen before asking her husband, John Legend, what he was wearing). E! also got rid of the mani-cam.

While asking actresses questions about things other than fashion is something we should do a lot more of (why wouldn't you ask everyone on the Golden Globes red carpet last month what they thought about the Sony hack that happened just weeks before?!?), it's not just a question that's completely based in sexism; it's a big part of the fashion industry.

"You might say that awards season is as important, if not even more important, to fashion brands as it is to the entertainment companies that are honored in these ceremonies like the Oscars," Howard Hogan, an attorney and partner in the Washington, D.C.,-based firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP told the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. "A favorable review for an Oscar gown can be make or break for the designers who outfit them."

Red carpet fashion can involve contracts and money changing hands. Los Angeles Times reporter Booth Moore tweeted that if we really want to get rid of "who are you wearing," we need to get rid of fashion brands paying actresses to wear their clothes. Without that, the question might not go away. During the 2010 Oscars, Ryan Seacrest abstained from asking about fashion and was criticized by some in the fashion press, and now five years later, and he's back to asking those question again.

But in politics, where politicians don't have to sign contracts about what wear, this campaign is still good news for female candidates. It shows there's a growing interest in ensuring reporters, whether on the red carpet or in Iowa, treat men and women equally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Daily Beast: "Sorry, But Clinton's Inevitably Is Not a Problem"

By Ana Marie Cox

February 23, 2015

[Subtitle:] And how exactly is it a bad thing for her or Democrats that Hillary Clinton has the nomination all but sewn up? News flash: It's not.

Pundits can't stop snatching Hillary's defeat from the jaws of victory, insisting that her commanding lead in the polls is itself a problem. A Vox piece this week is typical: "Hillary Clinton's uncontested nomination is dangerous for her and her party," but I'd like to give points to Politico for finding a slightly different angle, "All-too-ready for Hillary," which argues that Clinton's real problem is all the really talented people who want to work for her. Clinton may not win, but blaming a loss on her popularity (or overly talented staff!) exposes the weak, desperate illogic of a pundit class that is mostly just filling time and news cycle holes until anything real happens.

An "air of inevitability" should be a good thing, right? It's in the superhero toolbox, right next to the cloak of invisibility and hammer of invincibility. So why do journalists treat it like kryptonite?

On some level, it may be due to amorphous ill will towards Clinton herself, whether motivated by generic sexism or a more specific dislike of her notoriously prickly staff. (The "which came first" between a prickly staff and the negative coverage is a chicken-and-egg-meets-Heisenberg Principle problem whose solution deserves a Nobel in both science and peace for the person who solves it.)

"Of course she's going to win the primary, and that's great for her!" is also the coldest take one could imagine, the kind of "another plane landed today" non-news that political reporters believe in their bones to be inherently uninteresting—as if the point of news was to be interesting, rather than factually correct.

The only kind of accuracy political pundits care about has to do with predictions. The continuing spate of concern-trolling on Hillary's behalf might just be padding out a soft landing should anything not work out exactly like most polls and political scientists predict.

Airy counter-intuitive clickbait is also a lot easier than reporting anything, and almost impossible to call out as untrue, especially when it comes embedded with iceberg-sized caveats such as this (from the Vox piece):

At the end of the day, presidential campaign gaffes rarely seem to matter much. But they surely don't help. And one reason they don't matter is that nobody makes it through the nominating process without showing they can take the heat. In 2016, Clinton isn't going to have to show that. And it might cost her—and her party—dearly down the road.

There is something to be said for working the kinks out of a campaign, as differentiated from a punishing series of preliminary contests. Still, politics can't be rigged like a non-conference schedule, a perfect balance of real competition and record-padding that gets you both ready and well-seeded for the big dance. Indeed, sports may be the one place that Americans truly prefer underdogs, but even then, NJIT jerseys do not sell as well as University of Kentucky ones.

Clinton's connection to purportedly unpopular Obama policies is also a real concern, though one that requires those making the argument to straight-up ignore data that say people will vote for Clinton in favor of squishier "how do you feel" answers—as though that means more than the question that is, you know, the one on the ballot. The story "Why Hillary Clinton isn't even close to a shoo-in, explained in one poll question," is, for some reason, not about the one poll question that shows her to be a shoo-in.

A variant of the "too popular to win" theory is the hypothesis that Clinton is only popular because of her familiar name, but having a familiar name is actually a bad thing. The argument that HRC (and/or Jeb Bush) represents a dynastic tendency that voters may rebel against is at least real argument, as opposed to the logical contortion of "inevitable=not inevitable." The proof that "Americans hate dynasties" is a real argument is that is a testable hypothesis! Testable and proven wrong, by the polls that show Hillary to be so popular. In general, if there's a political dynasty that America doesn't love, well, we haven't heard of it, and there are plenty of political dynasties in America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though some may point toward anti-Hillary coverage as proof that the media are not biased to the left, I consider this tendency toward deliberate, counter-factual undermining as pretty good evidence of that very bias, mostly because you just don't see this pathology on the right. Base voters on either side rattle their cages when the presumptive nominee doesn't fit their specific ideological prescription, but the Karl Roves of the world don't lay into a GOP hopeful just because he's (or she, but come on…) clearly going to win.

Poll numbers are not subject to the insecurity and attention-seeking that reporters are, and they tell a much less sexy, "Hillary leads the polls and you won't believe what happens next"-type story. What reporters insist on calling "inevitability" is a quantifiably unprecedented amount of support. According to the pollsters at The New York Times, "No candidate, excluding incumbent presidents, has ever fared so well in the early primary polls as Mrs. Clinton. She holds about 60 percent of the vote of Democratic voters, a tally dwarfing the 40 percent she held this time in the last election cycle."

I'll say it: Barring her own Titanic/iceberg moment, Hillary will win the nomination, and she will be in excellent position to win the general. Perhaps the only thing that can keep her from being in such an enviable position is the steady drip of negative coverage that proclaims otherwise.

New York Times: "Economic Recovery Under Obama Creates Quandaries for 2016 Race"

By Jonathan Martin

February 22, 2015

WASHINGTON — When President Obama addressed members of the Democratic National Committee here over the weekend, he offered a glowing account of the economic recovery under his administration.

"America is coming back," he said after rattling off an array of upbeat economic indicators. "We've risen from recession."

But as both parties begin positioning themselves for the election to succeed Mr. Obama, the politics of the economy are far more complicated than the president would have them. Among Democrats, there are divisions over the degree to which Hillary Rodham Clinton, considered their leading contender, should praise the recovery and run on Mr. Obama's stewardship of the economy. And Republicans — assessing falling unemployment and soaring job creation under a president with still-mediocre approval ratings — are grasping for the right way to frame their 2016 campaign message.

The coming debate over the economy, and by extension Mr. Obama's legacy, is a particularly acute topic for governors, who are often judged by voters on their states' economic performance and who spend much of their time on job creation. As the governors gathered here for their annual winter meeting, there was bipartisan optimism about the economy, but it was guarded.

"In many parts of the country, we are seeing increasing momentum in terms of recovery, but in almost every state, and certainly in parts of Colorado, we are still struggling to get the unemployment down," Gov. John W. Hickenlooper of Colorado said, "and most importantly the wages still haven't started rising."

Colorado's unemployment rate was down to 4 percent in December, below the national average, which was 5.7 percent in January, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. But Mr. Hickenlooper's sober analysis suggests an awareness that voters are not yet enjoying a boon and certainly are not yet fully crediting Mr. Obama for the recovery.

Indeed, a Quinnipiac University poll in Colorado, a crucial swing state, released last week indicated that 58 percent of voters said they wanted the next president to “change direction from Barack Obama’s policies,” and the president’s job approval rating was only 43 percent. Perhaps mindful of such data, Mr. Hickenlooper, a Democrat, indicated that Mrs. Clinton could not run simply on the recent good economic news.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I am not saying who the candidate is going to be, but I don’t think she will come with, ‘Everything is fine, everything is going well,’ ” he said. “I suspect that she will come forward with some new ideas and some innovative ideas on how we can begin to move wages up and how we can help businesses expand more rapidly and create more jobs.”

Yet in another important state on the presidential map, the Democratic governor said Mrs. Clinton should not be shy about linking herself to Mr. Obama’s record.

“She should embrace the Obama economic policies that have moved the country forward, absolutely,” said the governor, Terry McAuliffe of Virginia, a close friend of both Mrs. Clinton’s and former President Bill Clinton’s. “Go through the numbers, look where we are today. Things are booming.”

But Mr. McAuliffe was quick to add that Mr. Obama could make it easier for Mrs. Clinton to offer that embrace if his administration was more effective in trumpeting the recovery.

“I think they need to do a much better job of explaining their successes,” said Mr. McAuliffe, who was the chairman of Mrs. Clinton’s 2008 presidential campaign. “I don’t get it.”

What most of the governors, in both parties, agreed on was that longstanding wage stagnation was diminishing the political impact of the recovery.

“We still have a wage problem. We are still creating too many low-wage, not family-supporting, jobs,” said Gov. Gina Raimondo of Rhode Island, a Democrat who was elected last year in a state that was among the hardest hit by the recession.

Ms. Raimondo, whose state has a 6.8 percent unemployment rate, added: “So there is a lot of work to do. She has a wage problem that she has to fix.”

The country’s structural economic challenges — whether wages, diminished manufacturing or other challenges associated with globalization — are such that Mrs. Clinton must come up with her own agenda, Gov. Jack Markell of Delaware, another Democrat, said.

“I think it would be a mistake for somebody to be running on ‘It’s great guns; we just have to keep doing what we’re doing,’ ” Mr. Markell said. “It ought to be, ‘In a changing world, here are the things we need to do differently.’ ”

Early signs suggest that Mrs. Clinton intends to offer proposals that would move beyond Mr. Obama’s ideas — notably a plan to offer incentives to corporations that increase profit-sharing with employees.

If Democrats are grappling with how best to hail the resurgent economy while acknowledging its underlying difficulties, Republicans are engaged in a conversation over whether they should remain critical of the recovery, claim a share of credit for it or move on to different issues.

Many of the Republican governors from states where economic improvement has been significant on their watch are uneasy about their nominee’s continuing to bad-mouth the economy. Gov. Terry E. Branstad of Iowa, where unemployment is down to 4.1 percent, said Republican presidential candidates should point to job growth in Republican-led states.

“Take some credit for what Republican governors have done, because the recipe to revitalize the national economy is to do the same thing,” Mr. Branstad said

He also suggested that Republicans ought to focus on national security, an issue on which Mr. Obama may prove to be more vulnerable than the economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "National security still a perception problem for Democrats"

By Adam B. Lerner

February 23, 2015, 5:35 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Report: Voters trust Republicans more to protect them from terrorism.

Now, more so than at any other time in the past 12 years, voters trust Republicans more than Democrats to protect them from terrorism. A new report by Ben Freeman and Michelle Diggles from Third Way, a center-left think tank, claimed to have identified the Democrats' antidote: Hillary Clinton.

Focus groups conducted in October and November 2014 with white college-educated swing voters in Colorado and Iowa indicated that Clinton was an exception to the Democrats' otherwise lackluster performance, the researchers found. Respondents said she "exhibits strength without being pushy" and is "quicker to make decisions" than President Barack Obama without being too proactive like former President George W. Bush.

In Gallup polls dating back to 2003, Republicans have consistently led Democrats on national security — except for an approximately 18-month period from 2007 to mid-2008. Republicans now have a 23-percentage-point lead, after hovering in the teens and single digits through the rest of the period.

It remains unclear whether Clinton's personal favorability on national security will last into a national campaign, the researchers found; respondents praised the current Democratic front-runner in vague terms but their skepticism of her party and the president for whom she worked as secretary of state could sully her brand as she takes more public stances.

Third Way Senior Vice President Matt Bennett said he believes Clinton's appeal could work in the other direction. "An ancillary benefit [of a Clinton candidacy] will be that it will help close the security gap for the party" at large, he said.

The report stated that voters often intertwine immigration with foreign policy, meaning the issue could have particular resonance in 2016 if Obama's executive action to grant undocumented immigrants legal status and the rise of extremist groups in the Middle East are still key topics of debate.

Bennett believes that a Clinton campaign will need to "lean in" on national security to maximize her advantage.

The report's analysis also made an argument that national security is a more important electoral issue than originally believed.

During the 2014 midterms, even though only 13 percent of voters said foreign policy was the most important issue facing the country, the large gap between the parties on the issue made it far more decisive than an issue like the economy. Third Way's analysis found that Democrats' advantage with regards to the economy earned them only 2.6 percent in the polls, while national security and immigration both lost the party 5 percent.

Further, the authors found a strong correlation between voters' opinion of parties' handling of national security and their overall opinions of the parties, though shifts in the former weren't typically followed in the latter for about a year.

That analysis implies that the fact that Republicans currently lead Democrats on national security by the largest margin in more than a decade means the Democratic Party's overall favorability relative to the Republican Party is set to tank.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As for Obama's most significant foreign policy achievements, Third Way found that voters couldn't care less.

"The benefit of the bin Laden raid is gone entirely," said Bennett.

In one focus group the researchers convened, a Colorado woman tried to identify his killing as a major Obama foreign policy success. "That guy, they made a movie about him. You know the skinny guy with the beard." None of the other eight or so respondents knew his name either, the report noted.

Wall Street Journal: "Biden's Trips Fan 2016 Race Speculation"

By Colleen McCain Nelson

February 22, 2015, 3:59 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Vice President keeps supporters guessing on whether he will challenge Hillary Clinton in 2016

When Vice President Joe Biden traveled to South Carolina last week to speak about investing in infrastructure, some longtime supporters had another topic on their minds: 2016.

"You need to run," Dick Harpootlian, former Democratic Party chairman in South Carolina, told the vice president during a stop in Columbia.

Mr. Biden gave his friend a smile and a coy answer. "We'll talk," Mr. Harpootlian recounted the vice president saying.

Mr. Biden has taken no overt steps toward building a national campaign machinery, and few people expect him to run. Nonetheless, Mr. Biden in recent weeks has fanned the will-he-or-won't-he conversation by suggesting that he's still considering a bid and by scheduling trips to three states that hold the earliest presidential nominating contests.

His recent travels to Iowa and South Carolina—as well as a planned Wednesday excursion to New Hampshire—have been official White House business to promote the administration's agenda. But inevitably, talk turns to the presidential campaign in private conversations. Mr. Biden doesn't seem to mind, fellow Democrats say, but he remains consistently noncommittal.

In January, Mr. Biden described the presidential race as "wide open" and said he may wait until summer to make a final decision on his own plans.

Assessing Mr. Biden's intent, Democratic strategists say the not-in, not-out strategy suggests that the vice president is keeping his options open on the off-chance that Hillary Clinton doesn't run. Polls show that Mrs. Clinton, who has yet to officially announce her candidacy, holds a commanding lead over all other potential contenders in her party, and strategists say it is unlikely that Mr. Biden would challenger her.

Joe Trippi, a longtime Democratic consultant, said Mr. Biden would be embarking on a much more aggressive effort if he were planning to square off against Mrs. Clinton. "He's doing things that help him in the event that everyone is wrong but not expending so much energy on what could be a futile mission," he said. "He's being realistic."

Mr. Biden's approach is also aimed at solidifying the Obama administration legacy, and his role in it, by urging members of his party to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"acknowledge what we have done" rather than distance themselves from it, as many Democrats did during the 2014 midterm campaigns. His argument may carry more sway if Mr. Biden is seen as a figure with political relevance and a future.

The vice president had all but fallen out of the 2016 conversation, but he inserted himself into the political fray in January by saying he might seek the Democratic nomination.

During his recent trip to Iowa, Mr. Biden repeated that timeline and stoked speculation by calling for a continuation of President Barack Obama's policies while urging Democrats to run on this White House's record in 2016.

"Some say that would amount to a third term of the president," Mr. Biden said during a speech at Drake University. "I call it sticking with what works."

Beyond that public declaration, the vice president said little privately during his trips to Iowa and South Carolina that suggested he was ready to run. Democrats in those states, as well as in New Hampshire, say they've seen no evidence of organizing efforts by Biden emissaries, and many supporters say no one from the vice president's circle has even hinted that local officials might want to hold off on committing to other candidates.

In Iowa, Mr. Biden reunited with some local Democrats when he stopped by Smokey Row Coffee in Des Moines. Abby Finkenauer, a state representative from Dubuque who volunteered for Mr. Biden's 2008 presidential campaign, managed to snag a few minutes with the vice president at the coffee shop to catch up. But there was no mention of future plans, she said.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Clinton's emerging campaign is already lining up staff, and other groups have long been at work gathering donors and building a supporter network on her behalf. A New Hampshire Democratic strategist said there are no indications that Mr. Biden is organizing in that state, but the Ready for Hillary organization has been moving quickly to lock up commitments from Democrats.

Still, Biden supporters in early primary states say they're holding out hope. "He is the perfect successor to this president because he is part of the team that developed the policies that brought us this far," Mr. Harpootlian said. "Joe Biden ought to be the next president of the United States."

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 3 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton honored by EMILY's List (AP)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 10 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton addresses United Nations Women's Conference (Bloomberg)

· March 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to keynote Irish American Hall of Fame (NYT)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: mlippert@barackobama.com dmcdonough@barackobama.com djsberg@gmail.com tblinken@barackobama.com
john.podesta@gmail.com
john.podesta@ptt.gov
Date: 11/7/2008 8:46:15 AM
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

---

roger. will do.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mark Lippert <mlippert@barackobama.com>
To: Ricesusane@aol.com; Denis McDonough <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>; djsberg@gmail.com; Antony (Tony) Blinken <tblinken@barackobama.com>; john.podesta@gmail.com; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri, 7 Nov 2008 3:37 pm
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Its pretty big so I'd seperate it outm. Moreover, you seperate it away from the standard run of mill operations like carrier battle group deployments and the like.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: Mark Lippert; Denis McDonough; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri Nov 07 14:29:13 2008
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested
yes, we envisioned that as part of ongoing operations. Would you separate it out?

Come to think of it, we should also ask for AFRICOM brief.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mark Lippert <mlippert@barackobama.com >
To: Ricesusane@aol.com ; Denis McDonough <dmcdonough@barackobama.com >; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken <tblinken@barackobama.com >; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri, 7 Nov 2008 3:19 pm
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Just skimming - I'd throw CTJF-HOA brief into the mix for DOD.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: Denis McDonough; Mark Lippert; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri Nov 07 14:17:07 2008
Subject: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Below is the list of briefings Jim and I propose we request of the IC and others for senior transition national security staff over the coming weeks.

A subset of these TBD could subsequently be requested for POTUS-E and VPOTUS-E. We leave it to others to decide if it is desirable and appropriate for POTUS-E to request any or all of these in his meeting with Bush on Monday).

We welcome your thoughts.

IC

Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MEPP and region
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear)
Cybersecurity and CI
IRDPA briefs

NSC

Policy briefings on:

Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China
MEPP and region
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear) Cybersecurity
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
Syria
Lebanon
Egypt
Saudi Arabia
Darfur
Zimbabwe DRC
Weak States strategy

OMB

Budget briefing

DOD

Ongoing Operations
Iraq
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Nuclear safety and security
Readiness

Homeland Security

Infrastructure security
Border security
Disease/pandemic preparedness
First respone/disaster preparedness
Crisis Response plans/processes and continuity in government

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 8/13/2008 5:04:44 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/13/08

Main Topics: Evangelical Voters, Bush's Third Term, Energy Compromise, Abba, Local PA News Coverage

Summary: Political spotlight remains on Edwards as details including the length of his affair, admittance to his wife, and monetary payments to Hunter are uncovered. Pelosi agreed to a vote on oil drilling when Congress reconvenes.

The Olympics dominated morning news coverage; particularly as U.S. swimmer Phelps sets record of most gold medals for any Olympian in history. Network coverage of Georgian situation released conflicting information, as NBC reported ceasefire had been put into effect, and allegations of further Russian invasions were unfounded. Other reports revealed that Russia had occupied city of Gori, and were moving east towards capital Tbilisi. In Tripoli, Lebanon, a roadside bomb killed at least 18 people.

Highlights:
1. FNC: Evangelicals See McCain As Only Option, Looking At Who He Chooses as V.P.
2. FNC: McCain Opposing Energy Compromise Legislation Even Before It Is Proposed or Debated
3. CNN: Susan Eisenhower Claims many Republicans Scared of Third Bush Term
4. FNC: Mamma Mia! John McCain the Dancing Queen?
5. WHTM-ABC 27 - Harrisburg PA - Local Harrisburg, PA News Covers McCain's Visit to Area, Reveals Some Tough Questions and Hard Answers

Highlights No Clip:
1. CBS - CRAIG FERGUSON: "John McCain has been accused of steeling policy ideas from Wikipedia. Which is ridiculous! Everybody knows McCain doesn't know how to use the internet! How could you even accuse him of that? And Barack Obama today pledged that he won't raise taxes on anyone over the age of 70. And McCain said Obama was just pandering to the youth vote. The youngsters got to pay tax!"
2. WHTM-ABC 27 - Harrisburg PA - KRISTEN OLSEN: "Harley Davidson is laying off 270 production jobs, how do you plan to get jobs back to people that you saw right out there in that townhall meeting?
MCCAIN: "We got to keep taxes low, we've got to provide stimulus to, for investment and research and development."

Clips:
Highlight #1
Evangelicals See McCain As Only Option, Looking At Who He Chooses as V.P. (FNC 08-13-08 7:30am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: 83 days until the election, since 1988 evangelicals have been the second most reliable block for the Republicans but will things change this time around? […] Are the evangelicals going to rally around John McCain or will they take a listen to Barack Obama?

DR. LAND: I think they're going to largely support John McCain. The latest TIME poll shows that 70 percent are planning on voting for McCain, and 19 percent are planning on voting for Obama, and the rest are undecided. The question is going to be how many evangelicals will turn out to vote? Most of them are either going to vote for McCain or they're not going to vote. A small minority are going to vote for Obama. And the reason is quite simple, it's very difficult for someone who is as radically pro-choice as Barack Obama is to gain much hearing with evangelicals. And that's why he's doing not any better and in some polls a little worse than John Kerry did with evangelicals in 2004.

GRETCHEN: […] But here's the question I have for you this morning Dr. Land, because, the prevailing thought process right now among the political pundits is evangelicals, they're going to vote for John McCain no matter what because they don't have anyone else to vote for. But what you're saying this morning is that his V.P. pick will still be extremely important as far as getting evangelicals to come to the polls.

LAND: That will be the most important decision that John McCain makes in this entire campaign. The question is, will evangelicals be energized in a pro-life vice presidential pick will help to reassure them that his judicial nominees will be the right picks, that they'll be pro-life like Roberts and Alito. It will reassure them, give them a confidence level, and it will have an enormous impact on turnout. If he picks a pro-life vice presidential candidate it will gin up the turnout. If he picks a pro-choice candidate it will deeply depress it and deflate it.

CARLSON: If he goes for Tom Ridge then, former Homeland Security Chief, he's not pro-life. And if he goes for Joe Lieberman, which some people are rumoring that he's going to do an out-of-the-box pick to try to get independents, what you're saying is that evangelicals may just stay home.

LAND: A lot of them will. A lot of them will. And I love Joe Lieberman. Joe Lieberman wrote the forward to my book, I think he's a great guy, he'd make a great Secretary of Defense, but he's pro-choice so that means he can't be vice president.

Highlight #2
McCain Opposing Energy Compromise Legislation Even Before It Is Proposed or Debated (FNC 08/13/08 10:07am)
MEGYN KELLY: John McCain campaigning for cash today in Michigan […] Let's talk energy, they are still working on an energy compromise on Capital Hill. McCain, not too in love with the compromise being proposed. Tell us.

JAMES ROSEN: Yeah, this is the compromise forged by the so-called "gang of ten", five senators on either side of the political aisle, and in blunt terms Senator McCain is not committed to this compromise at all. He has, of course, shifted policy this year when gas prices have been so punishing, and come out in favor of expanded offshore drilling. This proposed compromise, which hasn't even been circulated as formal legislation yet, provides for some limited new, offshore drilling. Off the shores of Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia. But this gang of ten compromise would also repeal some tax breaks that the major oil companies now enjoy. In an interview with Fox News chief political correspondent, Carl Cameron, just yesterday, Senator McCain sidestepped a direct question about whether he supports those provisions.

MCCAIN: I don't support any increase in taxes. But the point is, the oil companies are ready to drill, they don't need any tax breaks to do that. Not with the price of oil being in where it is. All they need to do is be allowed to drill.

ROSEN: […] McCain also questioned this conventional wisdom that any offshore drilling would take several years to impact on domestic gas prices.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KELLY: […] Apparently McCain in that interview also defended his reputation as a maverick?

ROSEN: That's right. This has come under some attack from the democrats and from Senator Obama's campaign Megyn, and Senator McCain yesterday repeated a favorite line of his saying, that he was never elected Ms. Congeniality.

Highlight #3
Susan Eisenhower Claims many Republicans Scared of Third Bush Term (CNN 08/13/08 07:29am)
SUSAN EISENHOWER: I had an avalanche of email after that endorsement. Many moderate Republicans said that they're terrified of having a third Bush term. John McCain has been a real supporter of virtually everything that the Bush White House has wanted, and I think the American people feel desperate for a change, especially in understanding we have to restore our position abroad.

Highlight #4
Mamma Mia! John McCain the Dancing Queen? (FNC 08/13/08 7:45am)
STEVE DOOCY: Let's take a look at John McCain's favorite songs.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: All right, Dancing Queen!

DOOCY: Is number one on John McCain's list.

[McCain's Favorite Songs List Includes:
1. Dancing Queen – Abba
2. Blue Bayou – Roy Orbison
3. Take a Chance on Me – Abba
4. If We Make It… - Merle Haggard
5. As Time Goes By – Dooley Wilson]

BRIAN KILMEADE: I know he's kidding, this can not be serious?!

CARLSON: His wife picked the list!?

KILMEADE: Is this true? You can't have your wife pick your own list! He's John McCain he can't have dancing queen!

CALSON: Come on! Maybe he has a little Swedish boy in him!?

[…]

DOOCY: There's one thing the two candidates have in common. One artist, who do you think that would be? Frank Sinatra. They both have a Frank Sinatra song on there.

Highlight #5
Local Harrisburg, PA News Covers McCain's Visit to Area, Reveals Some Tough Questions and Hard Answers (WHTM –ABC 27 – Harrisburg, PA 08/12/08 7:00pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: There's no doubt that Pennsylvania will be a battleground state, I think we will be up late and I think every vote will count."

DENNIS OWENS: Well, the fight for our votes went into high gear today as republican presidential candidate John McCain came to town. […]

VALERIE RITCHETT: McCain held his first major public event in the mid-state.

OWENS: Analysts say if McCain wants to win Pennsylvania, he needs to win big in the middle of the state.. today, he visited York to meet voters-- and get them fired up to go to the polls. Blaring music and a rolling bus delivered John McCain into York he calls it the Straight Talk Express and he took a few straight shots at congress for not fixing America's energy dependence. McCain wants more oil drilling and more nuclear.

MCCAIN: We've been sailing nuclear ships around the world for sixty years with nuclear power plants on them and we've never had an accident.

OWENS: He called for sanctions on Russia for invading Georgia and said this when a soldier asked about the war in Iraq, MCCAIN: By the end of the next four years we will be largely out of Iraq and we'll be out because we will have won. Not because of a date for withdrawal.

OWENS: McCain didn't duck tough questions and gave tough answers. He told a public school teacher he favors school choice for parents, he told a farmer he doesn't like farm subsidies, and an eye doctor that he's against nationalized health care.

MCCAIN: If you like a government run health care system go to Canada or England before you decide that's what you want.

OWENS: But the truly conservative in the mid-state still have doubts about this moderate. Listen to this question.

QUESTIONER: We want to know if it is in you to become a passionate and forceful leader with a conservative agenda to fight the lure of socialistic programs promoted by Senator Obama and the democrats?

OWENS: McCain answered with one word and a chuckle.

MCCAIN: Yes [laughter]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OWENS: McCain did elaborate that he'll appoint conservative judges to the Supreme Court. He knows conservative voters will be judging him and he needs their votes.

DEBORAH WENTZ: I thought it was wonderful and I wish more young people could have been here to hear it.

JACK NICHOLAS: I like this town hall format because it gives people a chance to hear him speak off the cuff.

[…]

OWENS: And after the town hall meeting, Senator McCain did not leave York right away.

RITCHETT: That's right, he sat down for a one-one-one interview with our Kristin Thorne. He told her that he knows Pennsylvania is going to be a big tough win. But McCain says he's going to campaign hard here. He hopes former Governor Tom Ridge will help him get the votes. The governor has been touring the mid-state with McCain for the past few days. And McCain would not say if Ridge is on his short list for a running mate. But he says if elected he may ask Ridge to serve in a homeland security capacity.

MCCAIN: I would certainly call on Governor Ridge to help out in the next administration because he's literally a national treasure.

RITCHETT: McCain wouldn't say when he'll announce his v-p. He says it's been a tough process picking a running mate because there are so many qualified people. And after his appearance in York, McCain also visited Lancaster County. […]

AMY KEHM: John McCain's mid-state tour is officially over today. He flew out of Lancaster airport about an hour and half ago. Before that though, Senator McCain made a surprise visit to a really interesting group of potential constituents, high school football players. Interesting choice as many of them can't even vote yet. But John McCain took to the field anyway, at Manheim Central High School. It was day two of football practice. The players, of course, are preparing for the upcoming school year. McCain joked that maybe he should give a long speech so the guys didn't have to practice so hard. That got a few laughs. The candidate didn't talk much about himself or politics. He briefly mentioned his time in Vietnam as a prisoner of war, telling the players that "team work" helped he and other prisoners survive. He encouraged them to also work as a team and to have fun.

MCCAIN: I'm proud of all of you. Don't forget to study. You also have to graduate. Don't forget that okay? Most importantly, look forward to this forward to this season. Enjoy every single game, every single game, every single moment."

[…]

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: NYTimes.com <nytdirect@nytimes.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 9/4/2015 12:06:32 AM
Subject: First Draft on Politics: Rubio and Clinton to Have an Island All to Themselves

? View First Draft on the web | Add nytdirect@nytimes.com to your address book?

9/04/2015 nytimes.com/firstdraft »

The New York Times
FirstDraft
What You Need to Know Today in Politics

Rubio and Clinton to Have an Island All to Themselves

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida spoke at the Prescott Bush Awards Dinner in Stamford,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conn., in June. Eric Thayer for The New York Times

By Jeremy W. Peters

Good Friday morning. Donald J. Trump had a big day on Thursday , but on Friday, other candidates, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Hillary Rodham Clinton*, will find themselves in Puerto Rico at the same time. And Mr. Rubio is wasting little time previewing his idea of what the general election might look like.*

"Marco vs. Hillary in Puerto Rico this Friday," reads the news release from the Rubio campaign, like a flyer promoting an event more suited to a boxing ring than a presidential race.

And while Mrs. Clinton has acted like she would rather just ignore the Florida senator — her campaign sent out a statement of its own saying only that she would be visiting a cardiovascular care center on the island primarily to discuss health care issues — Mr. Rubio sees their visits on Friday as an opportunity to draw clear contrasts with the candidate that many expect to be the Democratic nominee.

Their trips were not planned to coincide, but Mr. Rubio, seems eager to make the most of it. Mrs. Clinton does not speak Spanish. He does, and he plans to make good use of it while he's there.

He also wrote an op-ed (in English and Spanish) that was published on Friday in El Nuevo Día, Puerto Rico's largest newspaper by readership. In it, Mr. Rubio outlined how, unlike Mrs. Clinton and Jeb Bush, another Floridian who is one of Mr. Rubio's chief rivals, he does not support allowing the island's municipalities to reorganize their debt in bankruptcy. (Stateside municipalities can do so under bankruptcy law, but as a commonwealth, Puerto Rico's cannot.)

"So far, Hillary Clinton's liberal hosts in San Juan today have failed to propose any serious measures to fix Puerto Rico's economic challenges," he wrote in the piece.

Of course, there is a subtext to Mr. Rubio's jabs. He hopes their dueling appearances are just a preview of what's to come in the general election.

ADVERTISEMENT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stay tuned throughout the day: Follow us on Twitter @NYTpolitics and on Facebook for First Draft updates .

What We're Watching Today

- King Salman of Saudi Arabia will visit President Obama at the White House, but the kingdom's oil production will barely get a mention. Instead, the first order of business for the Saudi king is likely to be the Iran nuclear deal, analysts said.

- Jake Sullivan, a key staff member for Mrs. Clinton when she was secretary of state, will be interviewed privately by the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya. Another aide, Cheryl D. Mills, testified on Thursday.

Crowd for Pope's Congressional Visit to Spill Onto the Lawn

The hottest ticket in town this month may be inside the House chamber, but second to that will be passes to the lawn of the West Front of the Capitol, where 50,000 people are expected to gather to watch a broadcast of Pope Francis' address to a joint meeting of Congress.

After his speech, plans call for the pope to walk out to the speaker's balcony to appear before the public gathered on the lawn, which has been the site of holiday concerts and other events. Each member of the House will receive a ticket for the lower west terrace and 50 tickets for the West Lawn; each member of the Senate will receive a ticket for the lower west terrace and 200 tickets to the West Lawn. So bug your representative to see what's left. Who knows? Francis might well wade into the crowd.

While the broadcast may seem almost impromptu, the Capitol police have been developing the master plan for the event, including security, for months, along with Speaker John A. Boehner, who has been trying to get a papal visit to Congress for the better part of two decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– Jennifer Steinhauer

Our Favorites From The Times

- A group of software developers and designers, product managers and other tech supporters have volunteered to create apps and other tools to help Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont.

- Ben Carson has developed a head of steam in the Republican field. Mr. Carson, a retired brain surgeon, outperformed Mr. Trump in a head-to-head matchup, according to a new Monmouth University poll.

- Kim Davis, the Kentucky county clerk who was ordered to jail for refusing to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples, received mixed support from Republican candidates.

Bulletins: A Trump Thursday

- After much hand-wringing by his Republican rivals, Mr. Trump signed a party pledge, along with all the other candidates, to forgo a third-party run and support the eventual nominee.

- Corey Lewandowski, once a lobbyist, a political operative and a congressional aide who was arrested after he brought a gun to work, is running Mr. Trump's campaign.

- And Mr. Trump revealed gaps in his mastery of international affairs during a radio interview on Thursday, appearing to mistake the Quds Force, an Iranian military group, for the Kurds, a Middle Eastern people, and growing testy over questions about foreign leaders.

  Oh, and one of his guards hit a protester in the face .

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- Mr. Carson is this season's "stealth candidate," MSNBC writes , in part, because of his "contrasting humility and soft-spoken demeanor – paired with his outsider credibility and far-right views."

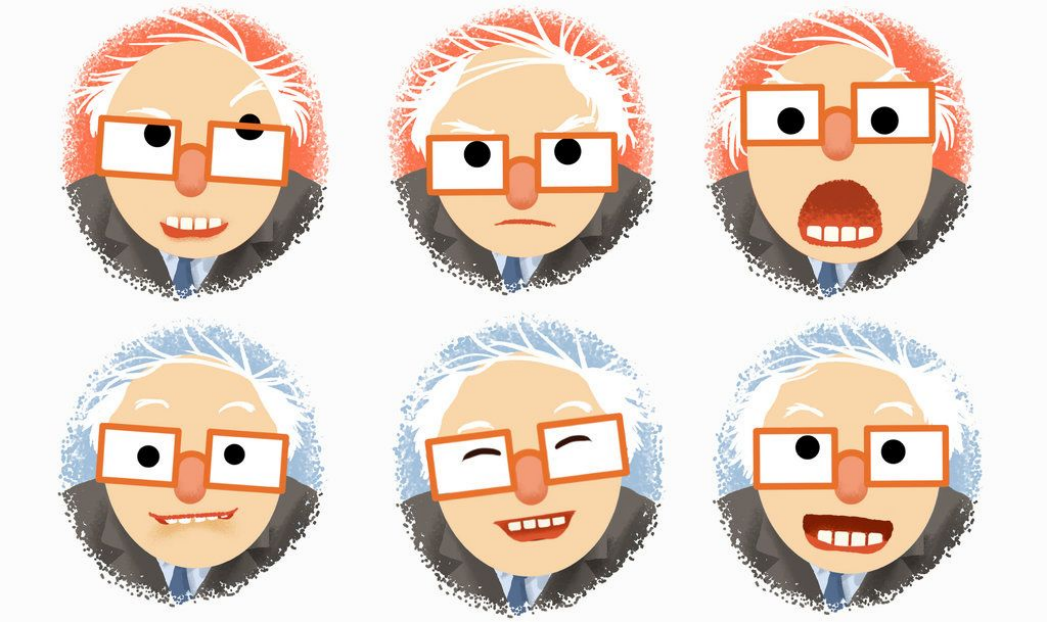
- Rick Santorum is the first in the crowded presidential field to campaign in each of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowa's 99 counties, according to CBS News .

- The Washington Post reports that Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey said Mr. Obama's "inaction" and "deceit," had helped fuel the Syrian refugee crisis.

A Range of Emojis for Bernie Sanders



Berniemoji is an app that allows users to text, tweet and share emojis based on caricatures of Mr. Sanders. Scott Nash/NASHBOX Graphic Design and Illustration

As the hundreds of top-flight developers and programmers have volunteered their efforts to Mr. Sanders, some of his supporters have offered up their own quirkiness and services.

The latest: the Berniemoji , an app that allows users to text, tweet and share emojis based on caricatures of the senator.

"It started as a dare," said Scott Nash, a 55-year-old graphic designer from Portland, Me. "One of my colleagues laid down the gauntlet and said 'What's the equivalent of the Shepard Fairey portrait for Bernie?'"

Mr. Nash was referring to the portrait of Mr. Obama in 2008, his stoic gaze sitting above an all-caps "Hope" message. But every time Mr. Nash sat down to create an iconic portrait of Mr. Sanders, he struggled to find a gaze or a look that captured his momentum.

"And then it occurred to me that the key to Bernie, is he's not iconic, he's emotive," Mr. Nash said. So he set about making not one portrait, but 12, all cartoonishly emotional (which was fairly unsurprising, given Mr. Nash's background: He designed the logo for Nickelodeon way back when).

Two programmers who work with Mr. Nash, Akimitsu Hogge and Wade

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brainerd, helped him amplify his illustrations.

So though Mr. Nash's portraits of Mr. Sanders are dotting the texts and chats of supporters, when it comes to the original dare, Mr. Nash jokes, "if you can tell, I failed miserably."

– Nick Corasaniti

ADVERTISEMENT

A Note to Readers

First Draft will be celebrating Labor Day by not sending you a newsletter on Monday. But we hope you have a great holiday, and we will return on Tuesday.

First Draft is sent weekdays before 7 a.m. and is updated throughout the day at nytimes.com/firstdraft . Check back throughout the day for continuing updates.

And please, tell us how we're doing. Like it, hate it, or have some advice, email us at FirstDraft@NYTimes.com .

Follow us on Twitter: @NYTPolitics

ABOUT THIS EMAIL

You received this message because you signed up for NYTimes.com's First Draft newsletter.

As a member of the TRUSTe privacy program, we are committed to protecting your privacy.

Unsubscribe | Change Your Email | Privacy Policy | Contact | Advertise

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/20/2015 2:53:17 AM
Subject: News Update - July 20, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Monday, July 20

Headlines:

- Ashton Carter: Iran Deal Doesn't Prevent Military Option
- Netanyahu: Why Would US Compensate Israel for a Good Deal?
- Security Officials: We Must Discuss Compensation with U.S.
- Germany: Iran Must Improve Israel Relations
- Herzog Rejects Unity Gov't Reports: 'PM needs to be Replaced'
- Palestinians Freed in Shalit Deal Killed 6 Israelis Since 2014
- Uri Ariel Blasts PM for Settlement Construction Freeze
- Weizmann Institute Among Top 10 Research Institutions

Commentary:

- Yedioth Ahronoth: "Netanyahu Packed the Bags for Herzog"
  - By Nahum Barnea
- Politico: "Israel in 2025: On horror, Hope and Honey"
  - By Fania Oz Salzberger

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ha'aretz

Ash Carter: Iran Deal Doesn't Prevent Military Option

U.S. Defense Secretary Ashton Carter arrived in Israel on Sunday evening, ahead of meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon. Carter said Sunday he has no expectation of persuading Israeli leaders to drop their opposition to the Iran nuclear deal, but will instead emphasize that the accord imposes no limits on what Washington can do to ensure the security of Israel and U.S. Arab allies. "Our ability to carry out that strategy is unchanged," Carter told reporters aboard his plane in route to Tel Aviv. “The Obama administration reserves the right to use military force against Iran if necessary”, he added, although the nuclear deal is intended to preclude that by resolving the issue diplomatically.

Jerusalem Post

PM: Why Would US Compensate us for a Good Deal?

US Defense Secretary Ashton Carter arrived in Israel on Sunday night as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu indicated an unwillingness to speak about any “compensation” the US could provide to make Israel feel more secure after last week’s signing of the Iranian nuclear deal. Netanyahu, in an interview Sunday on ABC, said there was much talk about compensating Israel. The question that needed to be asked, the premier said, was, “If this deal is supposed to make Israel and our Arab neighbors safer, why should we be compensated with anything?” Furthermore, he said, “how can you compensate a country, my country, against a terrorist regime that is sworn to our destruction and is going to get nuclear bombs and billions of dollars to boot for its terror activities against us?”

Galey Tzahal

Officials: We Must Discuss Compensation with U.S.

Security officials have criticized the prime minister in the context of the debate over the compensation package from Washington following the nuclear agreement. We have to talk to the Americans now about the compensation package, because after the agreement is ratified by Congress, their interest in placating Israel will drop and the compensation package will shrink, security officials said. They said that the chances that the agreement would not be ratified by Congress were low, and so it would be a shame to take that risk.

Ynet News

Germany: Iran Must Improve Israel Relations

German Vice Chancellor Sigmar Gabriel urged Iran at the start of a three-day visit to improve its relationship with Israel if it wanted to establish closer economic ties with Germany and other western powers. Gabriel, who is also economy minister, is the first senior figure from a large western government to visit Iran since it struck a landmark agreement with world powers on its nuclear program last week. "You can't have a good economic relationship with Germany in the long-term if we don't discuss such issues too," Gabriel told a gathering of German and Iranian business people in Tehran. "Questioning this Israel's right to existence is something that we Germans cannot accept."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

Herzog Rejects Reports: 'PM should be Replaced'

Opposition leader and head of the Zionist Union, Isaac Herzog, rejected reports that his party was in talks to join Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government. "This government needs to be replaced today. Not get a lifeline," he declared. Speaking at the Labor party conference in Jaffa, Herzog said that "Benjamin Netanyahu must be replaced. He needs to be sent home. I'm saying no to 'crawling' into Netanyahu's extremist right government." The Zionist Union leader was trying to calm down party members after a series of reports in the media that he was interested in joining the prime minister in a unity government.

Times of Israel

Pal. Freed in Shalit Deal Killed 6 Israelis Since 2014

The suspected mastermind behind a deadly West Bank terror attack last month was among 1,027 Palestinian inmates freed by Israel in exchange for the release from Gaza of the captured Israel Defense Forces soldier Gilad Shalit in 2011. On Sunday, the Shin Bet announced it had detained four members of a seven-member Hamas cell who allegedly opened fire on a car near the settlement of Shvut Rachel in June, killing Malachy Rosenfeld, 25, and wounding three others. Rosenfeld was the sixth Israeli to be killed in attacks carried out or planned by Palestinians released under the Shalit deal since April 2014. This is a reminder of the cost Israel has paid for Shalit's freedom, a scenario that critics of the deal predicted would unfold.

Jerusalem Post

Ariel Blasts PM for Settlement Construction Freeze

Agriculture Minister and chairman of the Tekuma-National Union Party Uri Ariel denounced what he said was a de facto construction freeze in the West Bank and Jerusalem, as well as the planned destruction of housing units in Beit El by the end of July. The council of the National Union, a constituent of the Bayit Yehudi faction, which convened on Sunday night in Beit El, instructed its MKs, Ariel and MK Bezalel Smotrich, to implement "coalition sanctions" against the government until it changed these policies, which could include actions such as failing to be present for important votes in the Knesset. The Likud party said in response that the settlements were important to the PM and that he would "continue to advance the settlements" while acknowledging the current reality.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

Weizmann Institute Among Top 10 Research Inst.

Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science ranks tenth in the world, out of 750, for the quality of its research, according to a recent Dutch review project that examined the impact of publications from research institutions on the scientific community. The institute, based in Rehovot, was the only non-US research body to make it to the top ten on the list, which was published by the Center for Science and Technology Studies at Leiden University in the Netherlands, otherwise known by its Dutch acronym CWTS.The Massachusetts Institute of Technology was the top research institution, followed by Harvard University.
See also, "CWTS Leiden Ranking 2015" (CWTS)

Yedioth Ahronoth July 20, 2015

Netanyahu Packed the Bags for Herzog

By Nahum Barnea

There is nothing like getting on a plane. The opposition leader gets to leave the moist, humid Lod valley at midnight, and 12 hours later lands in moist, humid New York. Someone he doesn't know makes sure to usher him quickly through passport control, without a long line, without troublesome questions, without fingerprints. Another hour-long flight and he alights, pressed inside a group of bodyguards, at Reagan Airport in Washington. Someone insists on carrying his luggage. And there is the ambassador: He woke up at dawn, wasn't that nice of him, just to wait for the opposition leader at the airport. The black limousine was washed and polished in advance just for him. He feels that he is saving the homeland single-handedly; he feels like Netanyahu.

Four days later, when he returns to Ben-Gurion Airport, no one is waiting for him. He comes out into a sweltering, humid day in Tel Aviv. He turns on his cell phone to read what people wrote about him on the social networks. The right wingers wrote that he's a traitor; the leftists wrote that he's a loser. He mutters a curse under his breath: The omelet from the plane is giving him heartburn. If only I had an antacid, he says to himself. My opposition for an antacid.

The nuclear agreement with Iran became within a day a litmus paper for examining the Israelis' loyalty to the homeland. Anyone who discerns a single positive point in the agreement is a traitor; anyone who criticizes the agreement but blames our government for the failure is both a traitor and impudent; anyone who criticizes the agreement but is worried by the worsening clash with the Obama administration is a traitor, impudent and a coward.

Opposition Chairman Yitzhak (Buji) Herzog took the test first, and passed it successfully. Within a short time, he was called by the members of AIPAC, who proposed that he come to Washington to meet with senators and members of Congress and explain to them why the agreement is bad. Herzog quickly gave a positive response; he is a positive person by nature. He can sometimes say maybe or perhaps, but the person hasn't yet been born who has heard him say no.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The AIPAC lobbyists will set up meetings for him with the Democratic members of Congress, those who are currently deliberating between their loyalty to the president and their dependence on Jewish voters and donors. They will ask him tough questions. He will run into trouble. He has already run into trouble. Jeffrey Goldberg, a prominent American journalist, conducted a phone interview with him that was published last weekend on the Atlantic website. "The deal," Herzog said to Goldberg, "will unleash a lion from the cage, it will have a direct influence over the balance of power in our region, it's going to affect our borders, and it will affect the safety of my children."

Herzog, Goldberg writes, had mainly kind words for Netanyahu. Do you intend to lobby members of Congress to vote against the deal, Goldberg asked. "I think it's a bad deal, but I'm not going to lobby, I'm not going to tell senators what to vote. I think what I need to do is explain the weak points and have them understand our concerns," Herzog replied.
Isn't that a description of lobbying? Goldberg queried. "I don't intend to clash with the administration," Herzog said. Goldberg was not convinced. He reminded the readers what Herzog had said to him in an interview he gave in Washington last December, when he asked him about the negotiations with Iran: "I trust the Obama administration to get a good deal," he said. Obama is the same Obama, but Herzog is no longer the same Herzog.

In the situation that has arisen after the agreement was reached, it is difficult to have it both ways, to fight against the agreement and support the Obama administration, to fight against Netanyahu and support his campaign against the administration. Herzog will let something slip against the diplomatic stalemate, and the right wing in Israel will immediately return him to the slot of the traitor, like before the elections; he will try to defend Netanyahu, and his party members will suspect that despite what he has said publicly, he is paving his way into the government behind their backs.

Eitan Cabel, his ally, advised him over the weekend not to go [to Washington]. Cabel is right; sometimes, there is no place like home. Before Herzog mobilizes for the campaign he should ask himself: Do I really want Congress to override the president's veto? Will the ensuing chaos be good for Israel? Won't the victory be a Pyrrhic victory?

Did you pack on your own, the security guard at Ben-Gurion Airport will ask him. No, he will say to her embarrassedly. Netanyahu packed my bags. Having no other choice, she will send him to have his bags x-rayed.

Politico – July 19, 2015

Israel in 2025: On horror, Hope and Honey

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Fania Oz Salzberger

Political imagining of the future is often a thinly disguised exercise in reflection upon the present. What else can it be? But before I share my ideas of the sort of Israel, or rather the sorts of Israel that might emerge from today's intricate matrix let me dwell on the future's most obvious quality: unimaginability. As a writer and a historian, I know that storylines do not develop the way we expect, neither in life nor in fiction. There are too many unforeseen factors, overlooked seeds, unintended consequences. There is too much serendipity.

A decade from now we may be living in a bee-less, honey-less, nutrient-impoverished world. Or in a world helplessly watching its adolescents become monkish addicts to online gaming. Or in a world where the rich will buy technology enabling them and their genetically upgraded children to outlive the poor of their own country by four whole decades. Wars could be fought about on-screen icons or stolen intellectual property.

The Middle East would share such global diseases alongside, or instead of, its current regional plights. Its countries may face a food deficiency far graver than the already hard-hitting water shortage, making today's acute poverty in Egypt even more disastrous. Rising sea levels may equally threaten Alexandria, Tel Aviv and Beirut. Perhaps, as unintended consequences go, environmental disaster rather than military intervention would forcibly curb the energy-flow of militant Islam.

Or, by another scenario, young Israelis and Saudis and Iranians will co-inhabit an internet universe where online game pals matter far more than their Jewish mama or Muslim papa banging on the door. Israel's high-tech breakthroughs could make Israeli newborns, or some Israeli newborns, immensely healthier or prettier or smarter than their peers across the region.

All or any of these factors, and others yet unfathomed, would recalibrate our historical route and make a mockery of yesteryear's stale predictions.
So yes: I can offer you a couple of future Israels, potentially stemming within ten years from today's complex topography. But these predictions are really about 2015, and the way we stand now.

In the first of these futures I shall no longer be living in Israel, because Israel shall no longer exist. Israel will have been wiped out by two or three Iranian mid-range missiles capped with nuclear heads. This scenario may become less likely following this week's nuclear deal with Iran, but I will disbelieve anyone who tells me its likelihood is null. Actually, one missile might be enough, if it destroys Tel Aviv prior to the forthcoming relocation of Israel Defense Forces headquarters to the Negev desert. The rest of the tiny country will collapse like a beheaded body, with or without Hamas, Hezbollah or ISIS stepping in.

Bereft of its last liberal friends in the world, propped up only by the vestiges of Washington uber-Republicans or seeking dubious new supporters in the east, this Israel will become a tragedy as well as a travesty.

Just because I deeply dislike my prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, who stakes his political career solely on the Iranian threat and deploys it to justify his deep-set animosity to peacemaking and territorial compromise, does not mean that his focal nightmare is not one of our possible futures.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The second sort of future Israel is a country I shall probably not inhabit either. Democratically conquered by an irreversible majority for nationalists and populists, leaning on the demographic growth of zealotry, pitching Jewish violence against Palestinian violence in a permanent danse macabre, Jerusalem will eventually defeat Tel Aviv. The liberals will pack their belongings; the high-tech nation will shut its laptops and relocate to Silicon Valley or perhaps Bangalore. The artists and intellectuals will be silenced, or desperately seek posts abroad. Some will end up playing their violins, real or symbolic, in the streets of the world's cities, like the Jewish émigrés of old. But numerous moderate Israelis will simply have nowhere to go. The world is not waiting for Tel Aviv's harrowed refugees with a gleaming stack of resident visas.

Led by Likud or by the extreme-right, this Israel will keep sending its youngsters, fresh from their Auschwitz-tour, clad in national flags and murmuring the mystical slogans of Jewish eternity, into the sinister and civilian-filled battlefields of Gaza, southern Lebanon, perhaps ISIS-controlled Syria and Jordan. Bereft of its last liberal friends in the world, propped up only by the vestiges of Washington uber-Republicans or seeking dubious new supporters in the east, this Israel will become a tragedy as well as a travesty. Its impressive financial stability will finally give way, not only due to the escalating toll of war and dearth of global friends, but also because most of the million-or-so Israelis responsible for our economic miracle are neither nationalists nor mystics. Pragmatic and heartbroken, they will leave if they can. Jerusalem will not only kill off Tel Aviv, but Israel's "Silicon Wadi" as well.

Why do I tend to believe that the second scenario will not happen? Perhaps because of inborn optimism, inherited from my early-Zionist ancestors who gambled against history and won. But it is more likely due to my faith in Jewish habits of controversy and in human dynamics of self-amendment.

In my third scenario, Israel's current tide of righteous belligerency will wane within one or two Knesset terms. Likud and its partners will lose their grip, which currently holds less than half of Israeli voters. Alienating the international community and barring moderate Palestinians (as well as marginalizing moderate Israelis) cannot work in the long run, nor even in the medium run. If the Middle East continues to totter in the clutches of Islamic fanatics, Israel will need to recruit Arab partners to battle extremism, rather than use radical Islam as an alibi for blocking Palestine's future. Nor can Netanyahu's open Obama-bashing prevail into the next U.S. administration, which now seems unlikely to consist of right-wingers eager to bear-hug Israel against its own best interests.

Israeli society itself, though, is my main pointer for a cautiously optimistic outlook. We are too contentious, too prone to hurl truth in the face of power, too verbally aggressive to take extremism lying down. The peace-seeking, justice-pursuing part of Israel's public sphere is vast, and far from placid. Our economic energies run parallel to our political restlessness; given an opportune moment, creative solutions must emerge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Like three cherries in a slot machine, we need a Palestinian government strong and serious enough to sign a peace deal, an international community willing to engage with both sides on an equally tough footing, and a skillful and charismatic Israeli leader. We have already had two cherries in the slots, more than once, but so far we never had three. Why not in the coming decade? Israel's public opinion is capable of rationality. Given the right amount of trust and hope, our stormy civil society will argue its way into a historical turning point.

The Israel of 2025 may not be a land of milk and honey. Perhaps, god forbid, bees will be extinct and honey gone. On the other hand, if it is allowed to flourish further, Tel Aviv might flex its high-tech muscles and help battle the man-made calamities inflicted on nature, agricultural and human prosperity.
But war is the greatest and most ancient man-made calamity, and therefore politics is the key. It always was. If we pull off that trickiest of feats, a democratic resolution of the longest war in living memory, beset by the bitterest civil controversy in living memory, then Israelis and Palestinians may still be able to shed some light unto the nations before the decade is over.

Fania Oz-Salzberger, an Israeli writer and history professor at the University of Haifa's Faculty of Law, recently co-authored "Jews and Words" (Yale University Press, 2014) with her father, novelist Amos Oz.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Douglass" <info@johndouglassforcongress.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 10/17/2012 9:01:02 AM
Subject: Great new ad:

John --

Got some good news this morning. With all of your support, we hit our goal for this week's ad buy. Thanks to you, our new ad is up about my commitment to stopping dangerous uranium mining in populated areas.

Click here to check out our ad and help keep it up before tonight's last FEC deadline until the election.

Your support has been awe-inspiring this entire campaign. I knew this campaign would be hard but it has been made easier each day because of the generous support of people like you.

We only have two weeks left. Can I count on you now to keep us running strong?

Thank you again for all that you do. Together, we will win.

--John Douglass

Paid for by John Douglass for Congress

This email was sent to: john.podesta@gmail.com. If that is not your preferred email address, you can update your information here. We believe that emails are a vital way for the campaign to stay in direct contact with supporters. Click here if you'd like to unsubscribe from these messages.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Campus Broadcast" <broadcast@law.georgetown.edu>
To: "Campus Broadcast" <broadcast@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 8/6/2014 1:43:54 PM
Subject: Security Update

Yesterday, the New York Times reported on the findings of the information security firm Hold Security. This firm discovered that Russian hackers had come into possession of 1.2 billion username and password combinations as well as 500 million email addresses. The security firm did not release information on what organizations this data belonged to. We have no reason at this time to believe that any University credentials have been compromised. However, since many people use the same password for multiple systems it is possible that stolen credentials from another site could be used to access University systems if they are the same. Security experts recommend regularly changing your password and using a different password for each system. If you observe suspicious activity on any of your accounts, you should immediately change your password. You can change your University password at any time by using the password change system found at http://password.georgetown.edu. If you have further questions or concerns, please contact the IST Service Desk at 202-662-9284 or help@law.georgetown.edu .

Technology Service Desk
GEORGETOWN LAW | help@law.georgetown.edu
McDonough 152 | 600 New Jersey Avenue NW | Washington DC 20001
Office: 202.662.9284

****

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"John Podesta" <jp66@hillaryclinton.com>
"Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
"Sara Latham" <slatham@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 1/23/2016 11:03:40 AM
Subject: Fwd: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Zachary Petkanas <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Sat, Jan 23, 2016 at 6:00 PM
Subject: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >

DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

ENDORSEMENT: Marco Rubio can chart new direction for GOP

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

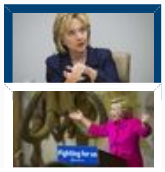
Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

Buy Photo

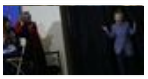
Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton meets with the Des Moines Register editorial board Monday Jan 11, 2015, in Des Moines, Iowa. Rodney White/The Register

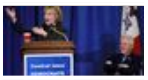
Buy Photo

Fullscreen



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.





This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Next Slide

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

This endorsement is the opinion of The Des Moines Register's editorial board:

David Chivers, president and publisher

Amalie Nash*, executive editor and vice president for news and engagement*

Lynn Hicks, opinion editor

Clark Kauffman, editorial writer

Andie Dominick, editorial writer

Brian Smith, engagement editor

--

Kristina Schake | Communications
Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Amitabh Desai" <adesai@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 4/19/2012 8:58:38 AM
Subject: Re: Clinton Foundation Letter

Helen Clark's CoS hasn't heard about this possible UNDP-CF/CCI islands collaboration. He's going to try to get more info from his people, quietly.

----- Original Message -----
From: Amitabh Desai
To: Bruce Lindsey; john.podesta@gmail.com <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Cc: Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC
Sent: Wed Apr 18 17:58:51 2012
Subject: RE: Clinton Foundation Letter

Will do - I just left a message for Helen Clark's chief of staff. Hard to know if they'll tip off Ira but I'll try to do it delicately. Sincerely, Ami

-----Original Message-----
From: Bruce Lindsey
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 2:28 PM
To: Amitabh Desai; john.podesta@gmail.com
Cc: Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC
Subject: Re: Clinton Foundation Letter

I agree with your unhappiness, but not your approach. I think you should talk with someone at UNDP and try to find out how much they have committed and if it is a grant or matching funds, what the scope of the project is, what the deliverables are, etc. Or you can wait and try to get those details from Darien.

The problem is that President Clinton apparently told Ira he supported this in concept. With Ira, if you give him an inch he will take a mile.

Bruce

----- Original Message -----
From: Amitabh Desai
To: Bruce Lindsey; john.podesta@gmail.com <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Cc: Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC
Sent: Wed Apr 18 12:47:19 2012
Subject: FW: Clinton Foundation Letter

In reading the attached letter from the Barbados PM, I'm a bit inclined to recommend WJC writing back and delicately saying something like: this is an issue of shared importance and I'd like to be helpful but am not sure yet exactly what a project could or should look like (and how much it would cost and over what timeline, with what specific deliverables) and I therefore would welcome input from you (the PM) and other leaders in the region before this is discussed publicly, and I'd like you to speak with my staff (listing us and not Ira).

And/or we can call the UN Secretary General's folks and say their UNDP/energy folks should deal with us and not Ira.

The above seems like a nuclear option but at this point unless we do something, it seems like Ira is going to proceed on something that we don't really have a handle on, and it could be good, but on the other hand - and given precedence with CHAI and CCI - it could spend (a lot of) money without us knowing specifically what WJC and the world will get in terms of results (on a timeline) and/or us being able to control how WJC's name / legacy are being impacted / used in relation to this project.

Maybe I am being petty but just wanted to raise this option with you, and I'm happy to proceed as you wish. Tackling islands is something we all believe in but it's hard to know what Ira's plan is and hard to trust it since we seem to learn of things after the fact, as evidenced by us learning of this "launch" via the email below today. Thanks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-----Original Message-----
From: Ira Magaziner
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 9:29 AM
To: Terry Krinvic
Cc: Amitabh Desai
Subject: FW: Clinton Foundation Letter

Terry:

Attached is a letter that will come to President Clinton from the Prime Minister of Barbados inviting him to speak on May 8 at a high level conference of energy Ministers from all of the Island nations in the world. The conference is being sponsored by UNDP and we will be participating. I will be there.

UNDP is providing funds to the Clinton Foundation for our work on clean energy and we will be launching our work at this conference.

Obviously, if President Clinton can speak, that would be great. If he cannot attend but could provide a video, that would also be very helpful.

I am sorry for the short notice, but the conference has come together rather quickly.

Thanks

Ira

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	hrcrapid@googlegroups.com
Date:	5/6/2015 2:34:54 AM
Subject:	May 6 Cable News Roundup
Attachments:	5.6.15 Morning Cable Roundup.docx

Document attached, 2016 highlights below:

MSNBC's Morning Joe: Long segment on HRC's immigration announcement, Clinton cash and the latest polls. Mayor de Blasio was on to discuss his "Progressive Agenda." When asked about HRC he said he was seeing positive signs but was noncommittal about supporting her. George Mitchell was on to discuss his book and said HRC is fully capable of dealing with the issues the country faces.

CNN's New Day: Coverage of 2016 Iowa poll of GOPfield; Jeb Bush is facing declining numbers and the cause might be the Iowa Republican Party moving further to the right. Panel discussion on Bush's moderate stances, noting that NH has not been kind to him. John King said HRC's immigration position was smart politics and went on to discuss the NBC/WSJ poll. HRC is leading the Democratic field but 48% said she was trustworthy.

Fox News' Fox and Friends: Rudy Giuliani spoke about those on the Republican field he likes, including Huckabee, Christie and Rubio. Giuliani took a swipe at HRC over Clinton Cash allegations.

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 9/24/2015 7:52:48 AM
Subject: Fwd: Follow up 2

From Barbara Boxer
Can you circulate to 8:00 group.
Second one for circulation coming also.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: "BB" <bbnanna11@gmail.com >
Date: Sep 18, 2015 7:16 PM
Subject: Follow up 2
To: <john.podesta@gmail.com >
Cc:

Hillary has so many accomplishments. here is my view of the top three.

1. Being a constant champion for children, women and families all her life.

2. Organizing the countries of the world to support heavy economic sanctions on Iran to get them to the table to end their nuclear weapons program.

3.Working and fighting for first responders after 9/11 and to bring financial and moral support to New York City and all of those affected by that tragic terrorist attack.

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"Huma Abedin" <huma@hrcoffice.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
Date: 3/3/2015 2:46:38 PM
Subject: Talking Points

Feel free to circulate these. We've been circulating this on background as an aide, and the additional points below on deep background.

- Let's start by rethinking the premise here. Nothing nefarious was at play. She had a Blackberry, she used it prior to State, and like her predecessors she continued to use it when she got to State. This was not bucking the system; this was in keeping with exactly what former Secretaries had done. Here's an excerpt from Secretary Powell's book about his email habits:

"To complement the official State Department computer in my office, I installed a laptop computer on a private line. My personal email account on the laptop allowed me direct access to anyone online. I started shooting emails to my principal assistants, to individual ambassadors, and increasingly to my foreign-minister colleagues who like me were trying to bring their ministries into the 186,000-miles-per-second world."

- The notion that she was subject to different regulations than her predecessors is flat wrong. In fact, it wasn't until the fall over 2013, well after she left office, that NARA issued any further guidance about the use of other email accounts. The NYT was at best not clear with the factset . The same regulations that applied to Colin Powell applied to HRC.

- As State worked to bring itself up to date, it became clear that they needed assistance, and reached out to ALL applicable former Secretaries for help in being responsive to the guidelines.

- We responded quickly to the request, and turned over 55,000 pages of emails to State. Anything that pertained to her work there. So if she emailed with her daughter about flower arrangements for her wedding, that didn't go in, but if she emailed one of the 100 State Department officials she regularly corresponded with, State had it in their servers already and HRC's office replicated that to ensure it was all there. 9 out of 10 emails that she sent over the course of her tenure went to the State Department.

- Using her own email account broke no laws, and like all other blackberry users, was used for communicating non-classified information only and was in accordance with the guidelines, even AFTER they were updated.

Further information/context:

- Here is the Archivist on the subject in sworn testimony followed by the text of the preservation requirement:

"David Ferriero , archivist of the United States, confirmed to the panel that while NARA discourages alias email accounts, there is "nothing in the law that prohibits them" and that sometimes circumstances make them necessary. "We don't care how many accounts you have as long as those on which you're doing federal business are captured for the record." http://www.govexec.com/technology/2013/09/agency-heads-explain-their-use-personal-email-accounts/70144/

Preservation requirement

(b) Agencies that allow employees to send and receive official electronic mail messages using a system not operated by the agency must ensure that Federal records sent or received on such systems are preserved in the appropriate agency recordkeeping system. [36 CFR 1236.22]

Further…

Jason Baron, former Director of Litigation at the National Archives, who in the NYT story said this: "It is very difficult to conceive of a scenario — short of nuclear winter — where an agency would be justified in allowing its cabinet-level head officer to solely use a private email communications channel for the conduct of government business," said Jason R. Baron, a lawyer at Drinker Biddle & Reath who is a former director of litigation at the National Archives and Records Administration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

…subsequently conceded on the record today that Secretary Clinton's email use did not violate the law, despite what the story alleges may have been the case.

https://twitter.com/danmericaCNN/status/572842630855430145

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: john.podesta@gmail.com
To: "Denis Mcdonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
Date: 10/23/2008 11:17:50 AM
Subject: Re: Dennis Ross

Just make it from the middle east ctr rather than obama guy

Sent via BlackBerry from T-Mobile

From: "Denis McDonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
Date: Thu, 23 Oct 2008 12:57:33 -0500
To: <john.podesta@gmail.com>; James B. Steinberg<djsberg@gmail.com>; Mark Lippert<mlippert@barackobama.com>
Subject: RE: Dennis Ross

It is pretty forward leaning, so I am actually asking him to withdraw it.

D

From: john.podesta@gmail.com [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, October 23, 2008 1:51 PM
To: Denis McDonough; James B. Steinberg; Mark Lippert
Subject: Re: Dennis Ross

Do you know content? If inconsistent with BO positions we should ask for a different byline. He has plenty of other things he can put behind his name. If it sounds like what you would say if asked, let it go.

Sent via BlackBerry from T-Mobile

From: "Denis McDonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
Date: Thu, 23 Oct 2008 08:39:00 -0500
To: James B. Steinberg<djsberg@gmail.com>; John Podesta<john.podesta@gmail.com>; Mark Lippert<mlippert@barackobama.com>
Subject: Dennis Ross

Fellas –

Dennis was asked to write an article about transition for Sunday's Outlook, and he did it. He says that he argues that this transition cannot be "business as usual" and there cannot be a lull in efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program.

He is identified in the byline as someone who gives advice to BO.

I would have preferred Dennis not write this or at least not be publicly identified as one of our advisers, but we are where we are. If you all have serious heartburn, please let me know and I will go back at Dennis.

Thanks,
DM

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Clinton Campaign, Press Office" <press@hillaryclinton.com>
To:
Date: 5/20/2008 7:04:32 AM
Subject: State Clips, 05/20/08

State Clips
Tuesday, May 20, 2008

KENTUCKY (May 20)

Both Obama and Clinton prepare to claim victories Herald Leader
http://www.kentucky.com/254/story/410059.html

The day Bill Clinton came to my home Herald Leader
http://www.kentucky.com/263/story/410060.html

Former Clinton aide, Obama strategist in talks Herald Leader
http://www.kentucky.com/522/story/409815.html

Bill Clinton urges people to vote for Hillary Richmond Register
http://www.richmondregister.com/homepage/local_story_141083704.html?keyword=leadpicturestory

Ky. Primary Elicits Chatter Kentucky Post
http://www.kypost.com/news/local/story.aspx?content_id=c97f3527-6a2b-405f-8005-7a1fe2a86381

Part of Second Street closed because of Clinton visit Courier Journal
http://www.courier-journal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/ZONE07/80520024

Readers react to speeches at NRA meeting Courier Journal
http://www.courier-journal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/OPINION02/805200347

Clinton, Obama appeal for votes Courier Journal
http://www.courier-journal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008805200446

Obama likely to cinch elected delegates Courier Journal
http://www.courier-journal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008805200384

Clinton continues campaign Appalachian News
http://www.news-expressky.com/articles/2008/05/20/top_story/01clinton.txt

Clinton Campaign Makes Stops Around The State WKYT
http://www.wkyt.com/home/headlines/19071529.html

Candidates Make Final Campaign Push LEX18
http://www.lex18.com/Global/story.asp?S=8345408&nav=menu203_7_3_1

Clintons rally in Louisville one last time WAVE
http://www.wave3.com/Global/story.asp?s=8350403

Op-Ed: Voters ready to ditch GOP Courier Journal
http://www.courier-journal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008805200336

OREGON (May 20)

Oregonians are the deciders now Salem Statesman Journal
http://www.statesmanjournal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/ELECTION03/805200345&referrer=FRONTPAGECAROUSEL

All over but the shouting Medford Mail Tribune
http://www.mailtribune.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/NEWS/805200307

Hillary Clinton talks with Newschannel 21 KTVZ-TV
http://www.ktvz.com/Global/story.asp?S=8349856&nav=menu578_1

Sen. Clinton encourages Oregonians to vote in primary May 20 KVAL
http://www.kval.com/news/19070984.html

Poll suggests late gains for Clinton OBP News
http://news.opb.org/article/2111-poll-suggests-late-gains-clinton/

Polls: Clinton solid in Kentucky, Oregon is Obama's tight race Salem News
http://www.salem-news.com/articles/may192008/clinton_obama_latest_5-19-08.php

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton to Obama: Not so fast KPTV
http://www.kptv.com/politics/16333840/detail.html

Chelsea Clinton stops at Shari's Salem Statesman Journal
http://www.statesmanjournal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/ELECTION03/805200335/1001/NEWS

Chelsea Clinton visits boys and girls club of Albany Albany Democrat Herald
http://www.dhonline.com/articles/2008/05/19/news/top_story/6aaa05_chelsea.txt

Chelsea Clinton goes shopping in Springfield The Register Guard
http://www.registerguard.com/csp/cms/sites/dt.cms.support.viewStory.cls?cid=101969&sid=1&fid=7

Bill and Chelsea speak at SOU KDRV
http://www.kdrv.com/article.aspx?id=36392

Bill Clinton and Chelsea visit SOU KMED
http://www.kmed.com/pages/landing/?blockID=7213&feedID=133

SOU students get out the vote KDRV
http://www.kdrv.com/article.aspx?id=36396

"Ugly Betty" in Medford for Senator Clinton KOBI-TV
http://www.localnewscomesfirst.com/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=1971&Itemid=2

As primary nears, Oregon regains an old brand The Oregonian
http://blog.oregonlive.com/mapesonpolitics/2008/05/as_primary_nears_oregon_regain.html

Clinton and Obama last minute campaigning KOHD
http://www.kohd.com/article.aspx?id=36352&section=news&contentCat=local

(AP) Washington State Democratic Party chairman throws super delegate support to Obama http://blog.oregonlive.com/breakingnews/2008/05/washington_state_democratic_pa.html

Obama courting Native American votes ahead of Western primaries OPB
http://news.opb.org/article/2115-obama-courting-native-american-votes-ahead-western-primaries/

Tribal leaders identify with Obama's words East Oregonian
http://www.eastoregonian.info/main.asp?SectionID=13&SubSectionID=48&ArticleID=77851&TM=6677.611

(AP) Oregon looks like Obama country
http://www.oregonlive.com/newsflash/regional/index.ssf?/base/news-24/1211242744262110.xml&storylist=orlocal

Obama stumped by question about Hanford nuclear cleanup KDRV-TV
http://www.kdrv.com/article.aspx?id=36422

Should Obama declare victory? Open Discussion BlueOregon
http://www.blueoregon.com/2008/05/should-obama-de.html

75,000 for Obama? Bloggers know better Willamette Week
http://wweek.com/wwire/?p=11948

Barack fan celebrates birthday waiting for Obama East Oregonian
http://www.eastoregonian.info/main.asp?SectionID=13&SubSectionID=48&ArticleID=77849&TM=43029.49

Editorial: Give them your verdict The Oregonian
http://www.oregonlive.com/editorials/oregonian/index.ssf?/base/editorial/121124491991120.xml&coll=7

Editorial: The deadline is 8 p.m. today - get out and vote Salem Statesman Journal
http://www.statesmanjournal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/OPINION/805200306/1048

Editorial: A bridge between politician and voter The Oregonian
http://www.oregonlive.com/editorials/oregonian/index.ssf?/base/editorial/121124491491120.xml&coll=7

Editorial: Ballots due by 8 p.m. Medford Mail Tribune
http://www.mailtribune.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/NEWS07/805190329

Opinion: An altogether unique conversation The Oregonian
http://www.oregonlive.com/news/oregonian/steve_duin/index.ssf?/base/news/121124313846400.xml&coll=7

Opinion: Hillary knows how the Republican shoe feels Salem Statesman Journal
http://www.statesmanjournal.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/OPINION/805200322/1049/OPINION

MONTANA (June 3)

Presidential Primary Attracts New Voters, Flathead Beacon

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.flatheadbeacon.com/articles/article/presidential_primary_attracts_new_voters/3535/

Votes of working-class Democrats uncertain, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/news/local/23-obama_s.txt

Poll Shows McCain Even With Clinton, Leading Obama in Rural States, New West
http://www.newwest.net/topic/article/poll_shows_mccain_even_with_clinton_leading_obama_in_rural_states/C37/L37/

Billings, Crow Agency prepare for Obama rallies today, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/19/news/local/20-obama.txt

Butte Obama volunteers getting out the vote, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8346034

Obama holds Town Hall meeting in Billings, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8344761&nav=menu227_8

Obama's Billings supporters react to his recent visit, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8344773&nav=menu227_2

Crow welcome Obama on first visit to US reservation, The Missoulian
http://www.missoulian.com/articles/2008/05/19/bnews/br32.txt

Obama adopted by Crow tribe, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/19/news/state/20-obama_s.txt

Kumar Goes to Kalispell, Flathead Beacon
http://www.flatheadbeacon.com/articles/article/kumar_goes_to_kalispell/3534/

Obama holds Town Hall meeting in Billings, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8344761&nav=menu227_6/Global/story.asp?S=6830551.menu227_2_2

Obama speaking in Bozeman, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8338673&nav=menu227_5

KULR-8 One on One with Barack Obama, KULR-TV
http://www.kulr8.com/news/local/19086019.html

Thousand Stand in Line for Obama, KULR-TV
http://www.kulr8.com/news/local/19085849.html

Butte student gets chance to meet Obama, KPAX-TV
http://www.montanasnewsstation.com/Global/story.asp?S=8349871

Obama calls for end to 'game-playing' in Bozeman, The Missoulian http://www.missoulian.com/articles/2008/05/20/news/local/news02.txt

Crow Tribe adopts candidate Obama in historic visit, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/news/state/18-obama_s.txt

Obama outtakes, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/news/local/26-obama_s.txt

Sidelights from the Barack Obama rock show, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/news/local/20-obama_s.txt

Obama wows 'em: Illinois senator excites crowd at West, Crow, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/news/local/18-obama_s.txt

Obama Speech, KULR-TV
http://www.kulr8.com/news/local/19088794.html

Letter: Clinton strong backer of family farming, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/opinion/letters/20-familyfarming.txt

Letter: Clinton offers voters strength, experience, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/opinion/letters/60-clinton.txt

Gazette Opinion: Face-to-face visits excite local voters, Billings Gazette
http://www.billingsgazette.net/articles/2008/05/20/opinion/gazette/50-gazetteopinion.txt

SOUTH DAKOTA (June 3)

Our View: Iran And Appeasement – Is Talking Dangerous? Tankton Press & Dakotan http://yankton.net/articles/2008/05/20/opinion/editorials/doc4832499fddbcb540450299.txt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oregon, Kentucky primaries latest to shape race Argus Leader
http://www.argusleader.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=200880520007

Obama returns to Iowa today for rally in Des Moines Argus Leader
http://www.argusleader.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=200880520006

McGovern plan gains ground Argus Leader
http://www.argusleader.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008805200309

Clintons playing fast, loose Argus Leader
http://www.argusleader.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008805200322

Clinton refreshing Aberdeen News
http://www.aberdeennews.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080520/OPINION01/805200315/-1/RSS02&rssfeed=RSS02

Poll: Clinton leads in Ky.; Obama ahead in Ore. White Rock Reviewer
http://www.onelocalnews.com/whiterockreviewer/stories1/index.php?action=fullnews&id=4647

Former Clinton Aide, Obama Strategist in Talks KTTW
http://www.foxnews.com/wires/2008May20/0,4670,ClintonObama,00.html

Oregon, Kentucky primaries latest to shape race KTTW
http://www.foxnews.com/wires/2008May20/0,4670,PrimaryRdp,00.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 5/21/2015 5:57:19 PM
Subject: Re: Israel and Iran: Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem (JPPI)

Stu - there is much to discuss in here. Let's try to touch base early next week?

On May 21, 2015, at 5:34 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Jake,

I thought it might be useful for the campaign to give you a quick summary of some of the points that were made at the JPPI conference we had on Monday and Tuesday of this week at Glen Cove, New York. Dennis Ross and I co-chair JPPI, which is based in Jerusalem, and was created by the Jewish Agency of Israel ten years ago to be a think tank for strategic issues facing Israel, the Diaspora, and USG-Israel relations. We have a group of fellows, like retired General Michael Herzog (brother of the opposition leader), Avi Gil and others. At the conference, we had Natan Sharansky, who heads the Jewish Agency; leading Jewish organizational leaders (e.g. heads of major UJA Federations around the country); leading rabbis (e.g. Norman Kurtz in Chicago, and Eric Yoffie); academics from Harvard to UCLA; a Member of the Canadian Parliament and former Cabinet Minister (Irwin Cotler)l Middle East experts like David Makovsky, Martin Indyk, and, of course, Dennis Ross, as well as Henry Kissinger and Eric Schmidt of Google, who talked about high tech in Israel. Moreover, Malcolm Honlein, the president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations (who I put together with Hillary through you and Huma), was there for the whole two day conference. and spoke on several occasions. We had a signficant number of Israelis there, as well.

1. ISRAEL

(1) The new Netanyahu government has very little flexibility on the peace process, given its right-wing tilt.

(2) While solid majorities of the Israeli public (over 60%) continue to support the two state solution, only a minority believe it is feasible, given Palestinian intransigence.

(3) A number of people, including, interestingly, Malcolm Honlein, felt the Prime Minister should now accept the last Kerry offer as a basis for resuming negotiations. Evidently, the last version given to Bibi did not contain language on Jerusalem (which he cannot accept), while the last version given to Abbas contained the language (but they still rejected it).

(4) There was a clear consensus that the BDS/anti-delegitimization movement against Israel was growing in Europe, and was an increasing threat.

(5) There was a grave concern that the Obama Administration, once the Iran nuclear negotiations are out of the way, will support some form of the French proposal for a new UN Resolution to supplant UN Resolution 242, endorsing the two-state solution, with 1967 borders, and with Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state. Several people felt that given the impasse in the peace process, Israel's argument that this should be left to negotiations, had a hollow ring to it. If this is going to happen, then it should be framed in ways that force the Palestinians to make tough choices, like ending claims to the "right of return". But the safest political position is to oppose what will be seen as an effort to "impose" a solution both sides will reject.

(6) There was a feeling on the part of some that Gaza was likely to blow-up again, a combination of Hamas rearming and rebuilding their tunnels, and the impact of the embargo, which has not been loosened.

(7) Israel needed to be more creative to take advantage of the open window for cooperating with the Sunni states (Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Egypt, Jordan) against their common enemy, Iran.

(8) Most troubling was the pervasive feeling that the US has withdrawn from a leadership position in the Middle East, leaving our allies in the Arab world, and Israel, to fend for themselves. The level of vitriol against the President was striking, to such a degree that one participant urged that he was being unfairly demonized.

2. ANTI-SEMITISM/ANTI-ZIONISM

(1) There was genuine belief that there is a substantial rise in anti-Semitism in Europe (a topic I addressed at some length). This is most evident in France (where 7000 French Jews left in 2014 for Israel, with almost double that amount expected this year); Belgium; parts of Sweden (Malmo); the Netherlands; Greece; Hungary; Ukraine; but even in the UK. Roger

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cukierman, the long-time head of the CRIF, French Jewry's central organization, cited several examples of the growth of anti-Semitism during my negotiations with the French government for payments for people deported on the French railway during World War II, as Secretary Kerry's Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues. Thus, in 2001, when his first term began, 90% of school-age French Jews attended public schools; now only 30% do so, because of the intimidation in schools. It is dangerous to wear a kipot (head-covering) on the Metro. Argentine Jews are also increasingly fearful, in part because of their government's close relations with Iran, which is widely seen as having planned and funded the Hezbollah attacks in the 1990s against the Jewish community center (AMIA), and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires.

(2) Modern-day anti-Semitism is a product of a combination of factors:

(a) Neo-Nazi/right wing parties, which have long had an anti-Semitic strain, like Le Pen's National Front in France.
(b) Left-wing parties/academics, who oppose Israel's settlement policy and occupation and import their opposition on Jews, who are seen (wrongly) as surrogates for Israel.
(c) Angry, disaffected, unintegrated Muslim young people, who identify with the Palestinians as the underdogs and address their anger for their plight and that of the Palestinians at Jews in their countries.

(3) French Prime Minister Valls estimates there are some 3000 European-born Muslims fighting in Syria and Iraq, 1000 from France, who come back to Europe, armed and trained jihadists. This was precisely the profile of the suspect in the Brussels Jewish Museum attack last year.

(4) The growth in anti-Semitism, and anti-Zionism is not limited to Europe. There is a greater security fear among Jews in both the U.S., Europe, and key Latin American countries. It was reported that 14 AEPi fraternity houses on American campuses were subject to some form of desecration. Several people said that "American campuses were our Europe".

(5) Malcolm Honlein placed special emphasis on the rise of anti-Semitism in his remarks. He said that the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations was catalyzing efforts to create a Global Forum to deal with this phenomenon, to track it, exchange information about it, and develop new ways to combat it. He said that Israel had a role to play, as well.

3. DIVISIONS WITH THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY OVER ISRAEL POLICY.

(1) There are increasingly sharp left-right divisions (J Street vs. AIPAC) within the American Jewish community over Israel. Remarkably, rabbis are reluctant to discuss Israel in their sermons for fear of alienating one faction or another.

(2) There was now a big debate over which groups can march in the annual New York City Israeli Independence Day parade, which take more liberal positions (e.g., New Israel Fund, J Street). It was generally felt best to have a "big tent" so the Democratic Party left-leaning people were not excluded.

(3) The kind of robust debate that occurs in Israel over Israeli policy, is blunted here by attacks against those who oppose the current government's policies in the West Bank.

(4) There was a clearly established (Pew and Gallup polls) drop in support for Israel among self-identified Democrats (now under 50%, with over 80% for Republicans). This could feed into making Israel a partisan issue (one of the problems with Bibi's speech to Congress) for the first time in its history, a dangerous situation.

4. IRAN NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS AND BEYOND

(1) This was the most emotional issue. Most of the participants who spoke on the topic (Sharansky, Kissinger, Honlein, Makovsky, Ross) were deeply skeptical of the Iranian nuclear negotiations. Clearly, Honlein and AIPAC will mount a major effort to block the agreement. There was a real foreboding (one participant called it a "panic") that the American Jewish community was going to be involved in a confrontation with the Administration, that the Republicans would use to try to drive a further wedge with Jewish voters over Israel-related issues.

(2) At the same time, there was a recognition (e.g. Kissinger) that the President would be able to overcome a veto override fight, although just barely.

(3) It was important to reassure Israel and Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States that any nuclear deal with Iran did not presage broader cooperation with Iran on regional issues. (Kissinger agreed, but felt it was inevitable over time, because Iran is a real country, with a long history)

(3) Several speakers (e.g. Ross) suggested that Israel should now begin to talk with the White House about ways to repair the damage to the relationship over the nuclear talks (if there is an agreement). Indeed, the President proposed to Bibi, in his call after the formation of the government, just that, but was rebuffed, seeing any cooperation as signaling he was giving up the fight against the deal.

(4) The options for a post-agreement reassurance included:

(a) Reassurance that the agreement would not lead to a new U.S.-Iranian alliance in the region, at the expense of our traditional alliances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(b) Sophisticated military weapons to defend themselves against a resurgent Iran.
(c) Defense treaties, that an attack by Iran would be considered an attack against the U.S. (But this was fraught with difficulty; would it be all forms of attack or only a nuclear attack)
(d) Development of a common agenda with Israel, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf States. This has not been initiated.

(5) The "snap-back" of sanctions was felt to be impractical. What would constitute a violation? Who would make the determination? Which sanctions would be re-imposed (US, EU, UN)?

(6) There needed to be a clear declaration after the 10/15 year period of the agreement, that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable, and the U.S. would every means to stop it. Likewise, the U.S. could not afford to disengage from the region, and had to lead the coalition against Iran.

(7) There was almost no one who subscribed to the Administration's hope that over the 10/15 year period of the agreement, the Iranian regime would moderate. Far from it, the end of sanctions and the massive amount of money that would flow to Iran would strengthen the regime, provide more funds to support terrorist groups, and embolden them in the region.

I hope this is helpful in shaping Hillary's positions on these difficult issues. But more broadly, she needs to understand the great angst in the Jewish community over the cascade of challenges I have described. The empathy and appreciation she can demonstrate, would itself be important and reassuring.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 1/28/2015 10:00:08 AM
Subject: FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: CTR STATEMENT ON ROMNEY SPEECH TONIGHT

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Wednesday, January 28, 2015

CONTACT: Correct The Record by American Bridge
Adrienne Watson / Daniel Wessel (202) 688-3656

CTR STATEMENT ON ROMNEY SPEECH TONIGHT

Washington, DC – Correct The Record released the following statement in response to released excerpts of Mitt Romney's speech tonight at Mississippi State University, in which, according to reports, he recklessly and inaccurately attacked former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Correct The Record's Communications Director, Adrienne Elrod, said, "Mitt Romney's reckless, inaccurate attacks against Hillary Clinton are laughable.

"Regarding Russia, what Mitt Romney fails to mention is that as one of the most accomplished Secretaries of State in U.S. history, Hillary Clinton obtained Russian cooperation on key objectives like sanctions on Iran and arms control while remaining one of the administration's most skeptical voices about Putin.

"And it's ironic that the guy whose own company bought American companies and then outsourced those jobs overseas is even bringing up the topic of jobs. Hillary Clinton has spent her lifetime working to lift up the middle class and level the playing field for all Americans – something elitist Mitt Romney could never understand.

"Mitt Romney hopes to recast himself as the guy looking out for the underprivileged. Working Americans need hope. Mitt needs to stick with reality. Let's not forget who criticized 'the 47% of Americans who believe that they are victims', who argued that Detroit should go bankrupt and who is beholden to special interests."

For the facts on Hillary Clinton's smart, effective strategy in dealing with Russia, click here .

For the facts on Hillary Clinton's work as a lifetime champion of economic opportunity, click here .

Correct The Record by American Bridge is a strategic research and rapid response team designed to defend potential Democratic presidential candidates from right-wing, baseless attacks.

Correct The Record · http://correctrecord.org/ · Facebook · @CorrectRecord

###

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/25/2008 11:37:36 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Mesilla, NM 10/25/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via TV coverage. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Attacks Obama for having his inaugural address already written
    - Says maybe im oldfashioned, but i prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome
    - Adds that what america needs now is "someone who will finish the race before starting the victory lap," someone who will fight to the end, not for himself but for his country
    - Concludes i've fought for you most of life, in places where defeat mean more than returning to a Senate seat.
- Revives attack on Admin. and Treas. Secretary for not making mortgages affordable so ppl can stay in their homes -- says that's how this whole crisis started
- Repeats: Dems plan is to raise taxes and lower defense, my plan is to strengthen defense and lower taxes
- Continues to hit Obama on Biden-crisisgate, energy independence and spending

Mesilla, NM: McCain Rally 10/25/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- According to news reports, about 2k - 3k ppl

Speech Highlights

[feed cuts in]

joe the biden guarantees there will be an internatl crisis if obama is president. the Dems' plan is to lower our defense and raise our taxes. thats not what i wnat to do, ill strengthen defense and lower taxes the next pres wont have time to get used to the office. many challenges at home and abrpad.

we cant spend next 4 yrs as we have the last 8, waiting for our luck change. we have to act. We need a new direction and we have to fight for it.

I've been fighting for this country since 17 and have scar to prove it. if im elected pres, I'll fight to shake up Washington and take america in new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, im ready for it.

if im elected pres, ill fight to shake up DC from my first day til last. im happy to have palin as my partner in this. shes not afraid of the fight, im not either.

i'm not gonna spend 750 billion to bailout WS bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. ill make sure we take care of the working ppl who were devastated by excess and greed and corruption of WS and DC. 1 of the first things we have to do is buy up these bad mortgages, give them a home they can afford. this admin and this Tres. Secy is not doing this. that's how this whole crisis started. we have to keep ppl in their homes.

i have a plan to hold the line on taxes and create jobs. Raising taxes makes bad economy worse. keeping taxes low creates jobs and strengthens economy.

if im elected pres-- When i'm elected president, [cheers] i wont spend nearly $1T more of your money, Obama will. and he cant do that without taxing or debt. im gonna make government live on budget just like you do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ill freeze government spending on all but most important programs like defense, vet care, SS and HC until we scrub every govt program and get rid of the ones not working. Ill veto every single pork barrel bill that comes across my desk. and you'll know their names.

when i'm elected presidnet, we'll stop spending 750B to pay countries for oil that dont like us very much in the debate, I gave testimony to Obamas eloquence, but you have to pay attn to his words. he said he would "consider" off shore drilling and nuclear pwr. we have to drill offshore and we have to do it now. we have to do it now. we can creat 750k new jobs by building nucl plants. just ask anyone in the navy, we've been doing it for yrs without serious accidents.

we'll Invest in all alternatives: nucl, wind, solar. we'll encourage manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric cars. we'll invest in clean coal tech. we'll lower the costs of energy within months and create millions of new jobs in america.

some straight talk: let me give you the state of the race, 10 days out, we're a few pts down, and the pundits as they have a fwe times before have written us off. my opponent is working out the details with w/ reid and pelosi to raise taxes, incr spending and concede defeat in iraq. im not gonna let that happen. i will bring the trps home in honor and victory.

we just learned from a newspaper article today that obama's inaugural address is already written. [boos. someone yells, "what arrogance!"] im not making it up, im not makin it up. an awful lot of voters are still undecided but he's decided for them. why wait to move fwd w/ his first inaug. address? when i win this, i have a request for my opponent. i want him to save that manuscript and donate it to the smithsonian. [laughter, cheers] so they can put it right next to the chicago paper that says Dewey defeats Truman! [cheers]

there's 10 days left, maybe obama will even have his 1st state of the union address ready before you head to the polls.

but i guess im a lil oldfashioned about these things. i prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome. [cheers] what america needs now is someone who will finish the race before starting the victory lap, someone who will fight to the end and not for himself but for his country. ive fought for you for most of my life. I have fought for you most of life, and in places where defeat mean more than returning to a senate seat. there are other ways to love this country but ive never been the kind to back down when the stakes are high.

I know you're worried. America is great but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

i wanna ask you these questions really quickly:
Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I am an American and I choose to fight.
Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless you and god bless the united states of America. I need your help. Thank you and god bless…

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Dennis Cheng" <dcheng@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Michael Bronfein" <mbronfein@gmail.com>
Date: 1/27/2016 4:16:15 AM
Subject: Re: The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worry Hillary's pro-Israel backers

Thanks for flagging - will look into this asap

On Wed, Jan 27, 2016 at 11:13 AM, Michael Bronfein <mbronfein@gmail.com > wrote:
I am fielding quite a few concerns over this.. , seems to have some viral qualities.. FYI

Begin forwarded message:

From: Cary Luskin <cary@thebigtv.com >
Subject: Fwd: The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worry Hillary's pro-Israel backers
Date: January 27, 2016 at 10:34:22 AM EST
To: mbronfein@gmail.com

The Chelsea Clinton fundraiser that should worry Hillary's pro-Israel backers

Resize Text

Print Article

Comments 92

By Jennifer Rubin January 25

Iranian Foreign Minister

(REUTERS/Leonhard Foeger)

For $250,"friends" — or $1000 for a "champion" (photo included) — you too can attend a fundraiser with Chelsea California, according to an invitation to the event obtained by Right Turn. Michael Chegini served on theboard (NIAC), a notorious group with links to the Iranian regime that opposed, among other things, any sanctions on

"The Clintons never miss an opportunity to put money ahead of principle," a spokesman for the Republican Jewi primary concern has been supporting the NIAC — a notorious supporter of the Radical Islamic Mullahs in Iran. I for cold hard cash."

The NIAC, you may recall, was forced to pay damages for a spurious lawsuit against blogger Hassan Daioleslam, that is dedicated to Israel's destruction. (A federal court found in 2012 "that the work of NIAC president and fo advocate for the regime.' The judge essentially found it was conceivable that NIAC could reasonably be accused c

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is not the first Clinton encounter with the NIAC. Bill Clinton, while Hillary was secretary of state, according with the NIAC: "An aide to Bill Clinton asked the State Department in 2012 about the former president potential to all U.S. sanctions against Tehran, according to an email exclusively obtained by Fox News." Ultimately Bill C the Congo – an event that would have included notorious Democratic Republic of the Congo leader Joseph Kabila appointment).

It does however suggest that the Clintons are quite comfortable with taking money from people with ties to apol Clintons willingness to take money for themselves and their foundation from scoundrels and despots (e.g. Ara specifically that propagandists for Iran would have Hillary Clinton's ear should she make it to the White House. evidence that a Clinton foreign policy on Iran will be no different from what we have now," he told me.

The event should also serve as a reminder to Clinton's pro-Israel backers, argues Noah Pollak, executive director insist that she cannot dance at two weddings. To the extent they do not deliver this message, they share part of t fer Rubin writes the Right Turn blog for The Post, offering reported opinion from a conservative perspective.

In any event, it is one more reminder that with Clinton comes a whole parade of influence peddlers, some of wh American Enterprise Institute, observing that the fundraiser "just isn't good politics," asks, "Surely there's some and Hillary Clinton will not take money.

--
Dennis Cheng
National Finance Director
Hillary for America
dcheng@hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Peter Ogden" <pogden@americanprogress.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/22/2008 4:04:42 AM
Subject: FW: Clips: July 22, 2008

Today's clips.

From: John Neurohr
Sent: Tuesday, July 22, 2008 11:01 AM
To: Clips
Subject: Clips: July 22, 2008

Center for American Progress

Date	Headline	Text	Outlet	Contact
Center for American Progress
07/21/2008	Yglesias Moves Again	Text	CQ Politics
Matthew Yglesias to join CAP as new blogger
Center for American Progress Action Fund
07/21/2008	NV National Clean 07 21	Text	Associated Press (AP)
John Podesta to speak at The National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Obama Campaign: Response to the latest McCain attack ad	Text	Wispolitics
CAPAF report: "The McCain Plan to Cut Oil Company Taxes by Nearly $4 Billion,"
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Calibre MacroWorld
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Macro World Investor
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
Center for American Progress Action Fund; Economics
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at ...	Text	MarketWatch.com
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Atlanta Business Chronicle
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Business Courier Serving the Greater Cincinnati Area
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Business Journal Phoenix, The
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Business Journal Serving Greater Milwaukee, The
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Columbus Business First
John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit
07/22/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Digital50

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Earthtimes.org	Center for

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Nashville Business Journal

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	Portland Business Journal

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	San Antonio Business Journal

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve	Text	San Francisco Business Times

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

07/21/2008	Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy...	Text	Thomson Reuters

John Podesta to speak at National Clean Energy Summit

Domestic

07/21/2008	CITY'S POOR LOOK DIFFERENT THROUGH NEW ASSESSMENT	Text	City Limits

Mark Greenberg on expanding poverty measures

07/21/2008	Outlook: Genetic Testing's Recessive Regulation	Text	Washington Post

Rick Weiss' "Outlook: Genetic Testing's Recessive Regulation: Young Industry Needs Rules and Limits for Examining Individuals' DNA"

07/21/2008	Toledo Public Schools Academy Principal to Speak at Conference	Text	RedOrbit	Meghan Gilbert, The Blade, Toledo, Ohio

Cynthia Brown at Education Event 'From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold: Schools Expanding Learning time'

Economics

07/21/2008	Are you dipping into your retirement funds?	Text	Desert Sun, The	The Associated

Christian Weller on report, "Borrowing from Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

07/22/2008	McCain's head games on taxes	Text	Politico - Washington,DC,USA

Robert Gordon and James Kvaal report, "Bush-McCain-Norquist Tax Agenda"

07/22/2008	Resist urge to raid retirement funds early	Text	Lawrence Journal-World	Michelle Singletary

CAP report on loans from 401(k) retirement plans

07/22/2008	Tapping retirement money too early can be costly	Text	New Haven Register	Tim Paradis

CAP report on loans from 401(k) retirement plans

07/21/2008	Workers Break Retirement Piggy Bank in Tight Times	Text	SmartPros

CAP report on loans from 401 (k) retirement plans

Energy

07/21/2008	Read 'Cost of Freedom' recap	Text	FOXnews.com

Dan Weiss on offshore drilling

ENOUGH

07/21/2008	Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace [analysis]	Text	AllAfrica.com

ENOUGH on ICC indictment of al-Bashir as a step towards peace

07/21/2008	Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace [analysis]	Text	Calibre MacroWorld	Released : Monday, July 21, 2008 12:30 PM

ENOUGH on ICC indictment of al-Bashir as a step towards peace

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

07/21/2008	Sudan Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace	Text	AllAfrica.com	Washington, DC

Enough argues that pressure on Sudan's leader could be a step towards peace

07/22/2008	The Case Against Robert Mugabe [press release]	Text	AllAfrica.com

John Norris on justice in Zimbabwe

07/22/2008	The Case Against Robert Mugabe [press release]	Text	Calibre MacroWorld

John Norris on justice in Zimbabwe

Fellows

07/22/2008	At the Border, Your Laptop Is Wide-Open	Text	Connecticut Law Tribune

Peter Swire testifies on laptop search and data seizure

07/22/2008	Elizabeth Edwards To Be Keynote Speaker For Central Ohio Higher ...	Text	PRWeb

Elizabeth Edwards to be keynote speaker at Central Ohio HIgher Education Institute

National Security

07/22/2008	Bin Laden driver on trial at Guantanamo	Text	Russia Today

Ken Gude on Salim Hamdan Guantanamo trial

07/22/2008	How the next president can improve Homeland Security	Text	Washington Times

PJ Crowley Op-Ed on homeland security policies for the next administration

Think Progress

07/21/2008	Late Breaks: Janet and Justin, Vindicated	Text	Condé Nast Portfolio

Think Progress on Fox News misspelling education

07/22/2008	What's next for the netroots?	Text	Guardian, The

Amanda Terkel Op-Ed on the top priority for progressive bloggers

Return to Top

Yglesias Moves Again

The ever-mobile Matthew Yglesias is leaving his perch at the Atlantic for new blogging digs over at the liberal think tank, the Center for American Progress. Over the past few years, Yglesias has largely shed his image as an independent thinker for one that is more overtly partisan and liberal. That doesn't necessarily mean his value as a blogger has devalued. In fact, it was probably a smart business move, as politically centrist views rarely equal high readership in the blogosphere. But now that Matt is working for an openly partisan political operation, I'm wondering if his soon-to-be former colleague Andrew Sullivan will revise the already antiquated 'Yglesias Award Nominee,' given to conservative and liberal bloggers who buck their side's dogma to express a poignant and independent opinion?

Return to Top

NV National Clean 07 21

bc-NV-National-Clean 07-21

1/8STK 3/8

1/8IN 3/8 ENV OIL

1/8SU 3/8 TDS

TO BUSINESS AND ENVIRONMENTAL EDITORS:

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Vegas to Chart America's Clean Energy Future

Speakers to include Reid, Center for American Progress Action Fund

President/CEO John Podesta, UNLV President David B. Ashley, President Bill

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Arizona Governor Janet Napolitano, Colorado Governor Bill Ritter, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and businessman T. Boone Pickens

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ --

WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world.

The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions.

The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions:

-- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy

-- The Clean Energy Economy

-- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade

-- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy

-- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html

WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants:

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp.

WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008

Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT

Media check-in begins at 8 a.m.

All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m.

Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m.

One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event

WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas

4505 S. Maryland Parkway

Las Vegas, NV 89119

SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

-0- 07/21/2008

/NOTE TO EDITORS: Please contact Natalie Mounier, 702-737-3100, nmounier@kirvindoak.com to request media credentials or to schedule one-on-one interviews./

/CONTACT: Natalie Mounier, +1-702-737-3100, nmounier@kirvindoak.com, for Center for American Progress Action Fund/

/Web site: http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html /

CO: Center for American Progress Action Fund

ST: Nevada

IN: ENV OIL

SU: TDS

GS-KK

-- LAM530 --

6538 07/21/2008 14:32 EDT http://www.prnewswire.com

Copyright © 2008 The Associated Press

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama Campaign: Response to the latest McCain attack ad Return to Top

A study by the Center for American Progress Action Fund noted that the corporate tax rate cut included in the McCain tax plan ?would deliver a $3.8 billion ...

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve Return to Top

SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

CONTACT: Natalie Mounier, +1-702-737-3100, nmounier@kirvindoak.com, for Center for American Progress Action Fund

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve Return to Top

SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

CONTACT: Natalie Mounier, +1-702-737-3100, nmounier@kirvindoak.com, for Center for American Progress Action Fund

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at ... Return to Top

Speakers to include Reid, Center for American Progress Action Fund President/CEO John Podesta, UNLV President David B. Ashley, President Bill Clinton, ...

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

Center for Earthtimes.org

Speakers to include Reid, Center for American Progress Action Fund President/CEO John Podesta, UNLV President David B. Ashley, President Bill Clinton, New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Arizona Governor Janet Napolitano, Colorado Governor Bill Ritter, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and businessman T. Boone Pickens LAS VEGAS, July 21

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO:Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119 SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Ve

Return to Top

LAS VEGAS, July 21 PRNewswire WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy The Clean Energy Economy Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit http://cleanenergysummit.org/agenda.html WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119

SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy...

Return to Top

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid Unifies Nation's Leaders at National Clean Energy Summit in Las Vegas to Chart America's Clean Energy Future Speakers to include Reid, Center for American Progress Action Fund President/CEO John Podesta, UNLV President David B. Ashley, President Bill Clinton, New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Arizona Governor Janet Napolitano, Colorado Governor Bill Ritter, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and businessman T. Boone Pickens LAS VEGAS, July 21 /PRNewswire/ -- WHAT: The National Clean Energy Summit, hosted Tuesday, August 19 by the Center for American Progress Action Fund, Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV) will join industry leaders, scientists and policy experts to define an agenda that accelerates the development of renewable energy, energy-efficiency technologies and robust clean energy markets throughout the nation and world. The Summit's objective is to define consensus ideas and principles that participants can carry to the parties' political conventions and into the next Administration. To conclude the event, Reid, Podesta and Ashley will host a news conference at 6:30 p.m. to lay out deliverables from the Summit including key policy priorities that emerge from the day's discussions. The National Clean Energy Summit will feature the following panel discussions: -- Earning More by Using Less: Businesses, Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- The Clean Energy Economy -- Restoring American Leadership: Jobs, Growth, Communities and Trade -- The Visible Hand: Government's Role in the Clean Energy Transformation Opportunities to Accelerate Deployment of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy -- For detailed agenda, including panel moderators and participants, visit here WHO: Speakers and Panel Participants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; John Podesta, Pres./CEO Center for American Progress Action Fund; David B. Ashley, UNLV President; Pres. Bill Clinton; NY Mayor Michael Bloomberg; AZ Gov. Janet Napolitano; CO Gov. Bill Ritter; Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary and Pres. Citigroup; T. Boone Pickens; NV Sen. Randolph Townsend; Jim Murren, Pres./COO MGM MIRAGE; Jon Creyts, Principal McKinsey Global; Congresswoman Hilda Solis, 32nd Dist. Calif.; NV Sen. Dina Titus; Trenton Mayor Douglas Palmer, Pres. U.S. Conference of Mayors; Somer Hollingsworth, Pres./CEO Nevada Development Authority; Ian Rogoff, Chairman/Trustee Nevada Institute for Renewable Energy Commercialization; Leo Gerard, Pres. United Steelworkers; Edward Mazria, Founder Architecture 2030; Jon Wellinghoff, Commissioner Federal Energy Regulatory Commission; Dr. Steven Chu, Dir. Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory; Dr. David Overskei, Pres. Decision Factors; Neal Skiver, SVP Energy Services for Bank of America Public Capital Corp. WHEN: Tues., Aug. 19, 2008 Summit begins at 9 a.m. PDT Media check-in begins at 8 a.m. All media must be in place by 8:45 a.m. Closing news conference begins at 6:30 p.m. One-on-one interviews can be scheduled following the event WHERE: Cox Pavilion, University of Nevada Las Vegas 4505 S. Maryland Parkway Las Vegas, NV 89119 SOURCE Center for American Progress Action Fund Natalie Mounier, +1-702-737-3100, nmounier@kirvindoak.com, for Center for American Progress Action Fund

CITY'S POOR LOOK DIFFERENT THROUGH NEW ASSESSMENT

Return to Top

The new poverty measure unveiled by city officials at the recent NAACP convention presents New York City with a yardstick not just to count the city's poor, but also to gauge the effect of anti-poverty measures and gain new perspective on New

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

York's residents - including the realization that poverty among the elderly and the employed is significantly worse than previously recognized.
The question now, say both city officials and poverty experts, is how the new statistic will be incorporated into city policies.

Poverty experts have long decried the official federal "poverty line," which is used for calculating eligibility for programs ranging from Medicaid to WIC. First conceived in the 1960s by a Social Security Administration statistician named Mollie Orshansky, in more recent years it's come to seem hopelessly outdated. Noting that an Agriculture Department survey had estimated that the average American family spent about one-third of its income on food, Orshansky simply took the cost of a subsistence "food basket," tripled it, and families earning below that amount were deemed officially poor.

Since then, "the world has changed a lot," Deputy Mayor Linda I. Gibbs told a briefing at the NAACP gathering - filling in for Mayor Bloomberg, who was grounded at LaGuardia by bad weather, and unable to attend - as some household costs have fallen and others risen. Food, for example, made up one-third of all household costs 40 years ago, but is now down to about one-eighth. Housing and transportation, meanwhile, combine to make up nearly half of all family expenditures today.

To reflect this new reality, city researcher Mark Levitan - a longtime policy analyst with the Community Service Society who was brought on board the mayor's new Center for Economic Opportunity last year - led a team that devised a new measurement, based on recommendations presented to Congress by the National Academy of Sciences in 1995. The new measure first tallies up the average cost of a range of expenses, including food, shelter (which is regionally adjusted for local housing costs), clothing, and other essentials. If a household's income - including that from aid programs like food stamps, the earned income tax credit, and housing subsidies, none of which were counted under the old measure - minus the costs of child care, transportation, and out-of-pocket medical expenses, is less than 80 percent of the median expenses for these basic needs, that family is designated as poor.

The resulting poverty line is significantly higher than the old. For a family of four, for example, under the existing federal definition it was $20,444 in 2006, the year that the CEO studied; under the new measure, it is $26,138. Under the new measure, the official city poverty rate would jump from 18.9 percent of the city's population to 23 percent. The share of the population living below 150 percent of poverty leaps even more dramatically, from 27.8 percent to 44.3 percent.

The demographic breakdown of poverty also changes. Children living with single-parent families see their poverty rate drop slightly (from 44.4 percent to 41.6 percent), and those in two-parent families remains almost level (17.2 percent, up from 16.5 percent), reflecting, according to Gibbs, the success of aid programs targeted at poor children. The proportion of poor elderly, meanwhile, jumps from 18.1 percent to 32 percent - largely, explained Gibbs, as a result of deducting medical expenses from available income. The number of working poor families also rises dramatically, from 27.6 percent to 36 percent, a reflection of the fact that more low-wage earners fall below the new, higher income standard.

"This is not surprising to us at all," says Nancy Cauthen, deputy director of the National Center for Children in Poverty (NCCP) at Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health, which calculates its own Basic Needs Budgets as an attempt to more accurately measure poverty. "When you take benefits into account, the people we are targeting benefits to are doing better." In contrast, the large number of working poor reflects the presence of "benefit cliffs," where families that earn just enough to no longer qualify for benefits nonetheless are unable to pull themselves out of poverty.

Gibbs stressed that the new measure won't have an immediate effect on programs, since eligibility standards are set by the state and federal governments, not the city. Rather, she said the intent is to spark national discussion, while also moving to "feed this immediately into local programs policy decisions," specifically citing senior services as an example.

"We know that wages have not kept up with inflation, and that for folks that are working at the lowest end of the income scale, those wages are not enough to satisfy their basic needs," said Gibbs. The mayor's initial Commission on Economic Opportunity, she noted, focused on "making work pay" as one of its policy recommendations. "It shouldn't be that you are working full-time and you can't have your basic needs met."

The city's new poverty measure is likely to fuel national debate about scrapping the 40-year-old poverty line, or at least supplementing it with additional data. Last Thursday, the U.S. House Ways and Means Committee held hearings into a bill by U.S. Rep. Jim McDermott (D-WA) that would direct the Census Bureau to adopt an NAS-style poverty measure alongside the current one.

Mark Greenberg, director of the Poverty and Prosperity program for the Center for American Progress, says that this would come in useful during upcoming debates over changes to federal earned income tax credit and child tax credit, since "under the existing measure, if the earned income tax credit is expanded, it has no effect on the measure of poverty."

Prospects for adopting the new standard are potentially even brighter on the New York state level, where the issue is less likely to become bogged down in debates over how it would redistribute resources. The state uses the federal poverty rate to determine eligibility for numerous programs, including school lunches, says state Senator Liz Krueger, an Upper East Side Democrat and former poverty advocate who has long supported an updated measure of need. Changing state funding formulas, she hopes, will be easier than changing federal ones, because "we don't have to deal with 49 other states complaining about New York" getting more money.

Greenberg says these new measures would "provide a significantly improved way to measure poverty over what we have now," adding, "I think it takes some courage for a city to use a better measure that winds up concluding that a larger share of its residents are poor, and they ought to be commended for doing that." While historical census data isn't available to compare current city poverty under the new measure with, say, the same calculation for the start of Bloomberg's term, the mayor's office says it will issue a more detailed report on the 2006 figures later this summer, as well as a report later in the year comparing city poverty rates from 2005 through 2007.

Members of Community Voices Heard, a grassroots antipoverty group, welcome the new formula, but remain focused on what tangible outcomes accrue. "It's an improvement if this measure is taken seriously and additional services are created to address the extreme poverty in the city and even the poverty of those previously not considered poor," Ketny Jean-Francois, a CVH board member, said in a statement. "It's great that the CEO invested in creating a new poverty measure; now let's see them invest in some REAL programs to combat the poverty!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This measure also needs to be aggressively promoted at the federal level so that it can impact government programs that serve the millions of people living in poverty across the country who are not currently seen as poor because of an over 40-year-old measurement," Jean-Francois continued. Presidential aspirant Sen. Barack Obama apparently had a similar thought, endorsing the Bloomberg administration's effort as a step in the right direction.

Cauthen has quibbles about the specific methodology of the CEO measure - she worries that calling $26,000 the "poverty line" for a family of four is misleading, since that's after deducting transportation, child care, and medical expenses: "You need to have $26,000 left over to pay for food, clothing, shelter, and a few other things." Her organization's Basic Needs Budget, in contrast, calculates that for a New York City family of four with a preschooler, their basic needs budget is $65,000 - with $20,000 of that going for child care.

Still, Cauthen joins other poverty researchers in calling the new measure "a huge advance" over the old poverty line. "We need a much better poverty measure, and I think this fits the bill. But if we care about expanding the middle class, we need to go beyond a basic needs budget, and look at: What do you need to send a child for college? If you're going to put something in the bank for a rainy day? If you're going to be prepared for a medical crisis? A revised poverty measure is long overdue and welcome, but it should be just the beginning."

Return to Top

Outlook: Genetic Testing's Recessive Regulation

Former Post science reporter Rick Weiss, now a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, will be online Monday, July 21 at 11 am ET to discuss his ...

Return to Top

Toledo Public Schools Academy Principal to Speak at Conference

Meghan Gilbert, The Blade, Toledo, Ohio
RedOrbit

By Meghan Gilbert, The Blade, Toledo, Ohio

Jul. 21--Schools across the country could learn a thing or two from Toledo's Grove Patterson Academy, according to a Washington-based think tank.

For nearly 10 years, the districtwide elementary school has educated students the equivalent of about 40 days longer than the traditional school year, with two extra hours each day and several additional days. 'It's not just having extended learning time, but what do you do with it and what's the result,' said principal Gretchen Bueter, who has been invited to Washington to speak at 12:30 p.m. today to education and political officials about what her students do with that extra two hours.

For each day's first 90 minutes, Grove Patterson is on 'reading lockdown' for uninterrupted instruction. Later on, 30 minutes of class time is reserved daily for foreign-language study, Ms. Bueter said. About 400 students are enrolled in the kindergarten through eighth-grade school.

Ms. Bueter is one of several panelists for the 2 1/2-hour discussion called 'From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold: Schools Expanding Learning time' at the Center for American Progress offices.

Reports also will be released today about research of schools and districts with high poverty and minority students who have extended learning time and the financial costs of incorporating it.

Cynthia Brown, director of education policy for the Center for American Progress, said they are 'very impressed' with what Grove Patterson has done and Ms. Bueter will add the perspective of a real practitioner to the conversation.

An education consultant, university research professor, and an adviser to Sen. Ted Kennedy also are on the panel.

About 150 people are expected to attend, Ms. Brown said.

Ms. Bueter said that since the school opened, she has had researchers and various think tanks contacting her about extended learning time, and that the Center for American Progress' work has been in depth and should give a good overview about how schools across the country have incorporated it.

To see more of The Blade, or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to http://www.toledoblade.com.

Copyright (c) 2008, The Blade, Toledo, Ohio

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

Source: The Blade

Return to Top

Are you dipping into your retirement funds?

The Associated Desert Sun, The

Americans are raiding their already fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home. And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a study released Wednesday by the Center for American Progress.

The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them. "They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings," said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs. "The borrower acts like a bank to himself," Weller said. Typically, borrowers can repay loans within five years without penalty. Loans for first-time homes must be repaid within 15 years to avoid penalties. That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises such as unemployment and medical emergencies, the study found.

When Rachel Hernandez took out a $7,000 loan from her retirement plan, for example, it was after her daughter was killed and she took time off to care for her grandchildren. "I understood it was going to hurt my retirement, but it was something I had to do," said Hernandez, a 46-year-old resident of San Antonio, Texas. She was working as a reservation agent for Southwest Airlines at the time and it was the second time she borrowed from her 401(k); the first time was to buy a house. "Obviously it's going to impact my retirement, but I'm glad I had the option," she said. People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with extremely favorable interest rates. Failing to repay loans on time typically incurs a 10 percent excise tax and borrowers must also pay income tax.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income - such as Social Security and pensions - weren't drying up, Weller said. More people today are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary income source in retirement.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs, the study by Hewitt found.

Return to Top

McCain's head games on taxes

It really is psychological for John McCain.

Asked to defend his admittedly paltry gas plan in April, he touted the "psychological boost" of shaving a few cents off the gallon. Asked last month to explain the purpose of an offshore drilling plan that does not even purport to alter the current energy supply, McCain argued that while it "may take some years" to kick in, drilling promises a beneficial "psychological impact." And back in January, McCain downplayed talk of a recession by putting America on the couch. "A lot of this is psychological," he told voters at a town hall event, "because I believe the fundamentals of our economy are still strong."

So when former Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Texas), McCain's then-chief economic adviser, chastised Americans for whining about a "mental recession," he was actually channeling McCain's psychological view of our economic problems. The media lapped up the gaffe but missed the point.

Gramm was not "off message." McCain's economic platform rests on the premise that the nation's economic challenges are minor and primarily psychological. How else can you explain his policies? McCain has not even proposed a short-term stimulus. His tax cuts ignore middle-class workers - about 100 million households, including 37 million seniors, would get no relief. Only 1 million seniors see rebates under his proposal, which brazenly prioritizes wealthy households over elderly Americans living on fixed incomes.

Then there's that McCain penchant for scheduling economic help a few years down the road. (Although perhaps the psychological boost is instantaneous.) The only plank of McCain's tax agenda that is not tailored for the superrich - boosting the exemption for dependents - would not even start until 2010. And it would not take full effect until 2016, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center, which recently issued a 39-page report on both candidates' tax plans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And McCain's tax plan is so regressive that some liken it to a third term for President Bush. But that's just not fair to Bush.

Bush's signature tax cuts were skewed toward the richest Americans; roughly 31 percent of the money went to the top 1 percent of taxpayers. Yet under McCain's two proposed tax cuts, a staggering 58 percent of the benefits go to the top 1 percent of taxpayers. That finding is from a report by James Kvaal and Robert Gordon, policy experts at the Center for American Progress, about the "Bush-McCain-Norquist Tax Agenda." Tax activist Grover Norquist, a Republican insider, has crowed that McCain adopted his organization's "entire agenda" of slashing the corporate tax rate, vetoing all tax hikes, extending the Bush tax cuts and abolishing the alternative minimum tax.

Return to Top

Resist urge to raid retirement funds early

Michelle Singletary
Lawrence Journal-World

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. "The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity," wrote Christian E Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, who authored "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet." The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 - "an increase of almost 400 percent." Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said. Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report: " When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings. " You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return. " If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal. " You pay back the money in after-tax dollars

In a statement, the Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, "When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use." I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans. It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability, or major medical illness.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's neither realistic nor is it compassionate.

Return to Top

Tapping retirement money too early can be costly

Tim Paradis
New Haven Register

NEW YORK Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement.

'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs, and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.'

Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan without contributing more to make up for lost returns reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.

John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a non-governmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling food and energy costs, as well as a slumping housing market, are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

Return to Top

Workers Break Retirement Piggy Bank in Tight Times

(Associated Press) NEW YORK - Americans are raiding their already fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home. And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a study released Wednesday by the Center for American Progress.

The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them. 'They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings,' said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs. 'The borrower acts like a bank to himself,' Weller said. Typically, borrowers can repay loans within five years without penalty. Loans for first-time homes must be repaid within 15 years to avoid penalties.

That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises such as unemployment and medical emergencies, the study found.

When Rachel Hernandez took out a $7,000 loan from her retirement plan, for example, it was after her daughter was killed and she took time off to care for her grandchildren. 'I understood it was going to hurt my retirement, but it was something I had to do,' said Hernandez, a 46-year-old resident of San Antonio, Texas. She was working as a reservation agent for Southwest Airlines at the time and it was the second time she borrowed from her 401(k); the first time was to buy a house. 'Obviously it's going to impact my retirement, but I'm glad I had the option,' she said. People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with extremely favorable interest rates. Failing to repay loans on time typically incurs a 10 percent excise tax and borrowers must also pay income tax.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income - such as Social Security and pensions - weren't drying up, Weller said. More people today are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary income source in retirement.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs, the study by Hewitt found.

Return to Top

Read 'Cost of Freedom' recap

DISCLAIMER: THE FOLLOWING 'Cost of Freedom Recap' CONTAINS STRONG OPINIONS WHICH ARE NOT A REFLECTION OF THE OPINIONS OF FOX NEWS AND SHOULD NOT BE RELIED UPON AS INVESTMENT ADVICE WHEN MAKING PERSONAL INVESTMENT DECISIONS. IT IS FOX NEWS' POLICY THAT CONTRIBUTORS DISCLOSE POSITIONS THEY HOLD IN STOCKS THEY DISCUSS, THOUGH POSITIONS MAY CHANGE. READERS OF 'Cost of Freedom Recap' MUST TAKE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THEIR OWN INVESTMENT DECISIONS. Bulls & Bears | Cavuto on Business | Forbes on FOX | Cashin' In Bulls & Bears This past week's 'Bulls & Bears': Gary B. Smith, Exemplar Capital; Tobin Smith, ChangeWave Research; Eric Bolling, FOX Business News; Peter Schiff, Euro Pacific Capital; Matt McCall, Penn Financial, and Maria Cardona, Democratic strategist.

Trading Pit: Is Oil Bubble Bursting and New Bull Market Beginning?

Gary B. Smith: Yes, the oil bubble has burst. My 'tell'? Tuesday (7-15-08) was the biggest volume down day on USO...ever. (USO is the exchange traded fund that tracks oil.) We may get a bounce back upwards, but at this point, the momentum is with the oil bears.

On the upside, look at Fannie Mae (FNM), Freddie Mac (FRE) and other major financial stocks. All up HUGE since Tuesday. Again, they may pull back a bit, but the upside is the easier path right now.

Tobin Smith: Oil is not done (meaning the bubble has not burst). We'll drop down to $120/barrel, and then we'll trade between that number and $130 until we get into the winter heating season when oil will shoot back up.

As for stocks, what we are seeing is the classic 'bear market rally', and we'll probably rally to 12,000. And then the fundamentals will take over. And on top of everything, everyone ignores the fact that we have the highest inflation numbers in 25 years.

You trade the bounce, build some cash and short the financials!

Eric Bolling: Yes, the oil bubble has burst and it will drop to $100/barrel. That means lower prices for consumers (like $2.50 gas). People will spend more and stocks will benefit. And It comes as no coincidence (to me) that this downward move in oil comes on the heels of Bush pulling the presidential portion of the ban on drilling in the Outer Continental Shelf this past Monday (7/14/08).

Matt McCall: With oil back in a normal trading range it will take the fear factor out of 200 dollar oil out of the market and investors can now turn their attention to buying again.

A big drop in oil will only occur if the global growth numbers come down. Therefore high oil is not necessarily a bad thing.

Peter Schiff: There is no oil bubble, so there is nothing to burst. What we have is yet another correction in a major, long-term bull market driven by a combination of legitimate supply and demand and the most inflationary monetary policies the world has ever seen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The current stock market bounce is yet another bear market rally, and should be sold.

Dems' New Spending Plan; Will It Crash Economy?

High gas prices, a slumping housing and job market, and the Dems' answer: another round of spending.

But this time its not just tax rebate checks. Try more food stamps... subsidies for air conditioning... and more cash for states.

Total cost? At least $50 billion. You pick up the bill, of course.

So is this what the economy needs?

Tobin Smith: We can afford the money&we cannot afford the philosophy&outlawing recessions&next thing you know they are going to try to outlaw short selling oh wait& they are! This is the ultimate Nanny State privatize profit and socialize risk LET capitalism WORK let it take capital away from POOR users and redistribute it to GOOD users of capital&that's what recessions do& Our numbers say that 85-90 percent of the checks went to savings, oil or paying off credit cards&Stimulus checks IN NO WAY creates jobs&it could delay layoffs for a few months at best in retail& ALL we do is push out the recession for a month or two&and make it WORSE IF they wanted to create REAL stimulus-open up $500 BILLION of new investment in energy resource exploration and GREEN energy development in the USpass expanded tax credits and funding for green energy AND open ALL drilling/pipeline installation TODAY.

Maria Cardona: This stimulus package is just what the doctor ordered for the economy; it is offering short term and long term solutions to the problems that ordinary Americans are facing. We are facing a real recession (Sorry Phil Gramm this is not a figment of our imagination), and Americans are hurting every which way they turn - form record high gas prices, to rising food prices, skyrocketing costs of health care, the mortgage crisis, the banking scare - Americans need more relief and the 'everything's fine, no need to worry' attitude is not going to put our country back on track and is certainly not going to give Americans the help they need and our economy the shot in the arm it is clamoring for.

And if you look past the stimulus checks, this bill is also designed to help create jobs (through a boost in infrastructure spending). That's a long-term solution that I think critics might miss!

Gary B. Smith: The economics do support a stimulus plan (increased government spending). But this is still a bad idea. If only the Congress, the President and the Fed, would stop screwing with things. They are all about short term fixes, and ignore any unintended/long term consequences. In this not, not the least of which is an even bigger deficit!! And these kinds of plans are just not the kind of system America was founded on.

Eric Bolling: When my son wants to stay outside any play with his friends after the time he should be coming in and getting ready for bed, once in a while I say o.k. And sure as day, he comes in the following week and asks for another hour...'but you said yes last week'. Get it? The stimulus was a one time transfer meant to jump start spending, the economy. If we do it again, people will absolutely be looking for another and another, and another. Talk about moral hazard; this is financial hazard. People will start to rely on these and get themselves in a heap of trouble when they stop. Stock X-Change: 'Dark Knight' Stocks Click here to watch this segment in its entirety

Gary B's Pick: Johnson & Johnson (JNJ) Tobin Smith's Pick: Assured Guaranty (AGO)

Matt McCall's Pick: American Superconductor (AMSC)

Eric Bolling's Pick: DreamWorks (DWA)

Peter Schiff's Pick: Harvest Energy (HTE)

Predictions

Gary B Smith's prediction: IndyMac bank scare overblown! 'XLF' up 30 percent by end of '08

Peter Schiff's prediction: Inflation gives silver more shine! 'SLV' up 25 percent by end of '08

Matt McCall's prediction: New roads = new cash for Fluor; 'FLR' up 50 percent in 12 months

Tobin Smith's prediction: Barbie/Bratz decision is big for Mattel; 'MAT' up 40 percent by Christmas

Eric Bolling's prediction: Clean up with clean energy! 'CLNE' jumps 50 percent in 5 months Bulls & Bears | Cavuto on Business | Forbes on FOX | Cashin' In Cavuto on Business On Saturday, July 19th, 2008, Cheryl Casone was joined Ben Stein, 'How to Ruin the United States of America' author; Charles Payne, wstreet.com; Adam Lashinsky, Fortune Magazine; Marc Lamont Hill, PhD, Temple University professor; Dan Weiss, Center for American Progress; Katrina Campins, real estate agent; Greg Warr, real estate developer.

Bottom Line: Should Congress Follow the President's Footsteps and Lift Ban on Offshore Drilling?

Cheryl Casone: Lifting the ban on offshore drilling. President Bush did it this week. Now, if Congress does it, could we see $2 gas? Charles, what do you think?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Charles Payne: I think the reaction will be down to at least $3.50. Look at this week, oil got hammered. This was the worst week for oil in a long time. If congress follows through, it might take some of the speculators out. Ultimately, taking advantage of our resources, which includes offshore drilling, would take gasoline down to $2 a gallon.

Cheryl Casone: So offshore drilling seems to be an added bonus?

Dan Weiss: Except for one thing. It is totally divorced from reality. The Department of Energy says it will take till 2030 before drilling offshore will make any difference in price. In fact, four out of every five barrels that's offshore is already available to the oil companies, and they have chosen to not produce it. We have to get the oil from places that already have it. Second, is that the only way to have a really quick impact in lowering oil prices is to take a little bit of oil from the already-full Strategic Reserve, put it on the market, and that will lower prices at the pump.

Cheryl Casone: A lot of oil executives have said it will only be three years.

Adam Lashinsky: I want to apologize for guffawing when Dan was speaking. He doesn't even know and love Charles as much as I do, but he stole exactly what I was going to say. Charles, what you say is entertaining, but it is irresponsible to say that gas will go down to $2 a gallon because we open more drilling. It may go down to $2 a gallon for a list of reasons, but that is not one of them. Dan is right. We have to start getting oil into the system, but drilling will take years. Drilling would have absolutely zero impact. Oil didn't fall last week because the president said we should drill of the coast. People are concerned we would have a global expansion with a moderate impact on the economy of China and India. That's what we're talking about.

Cheryl Casone: I want to bring in Ben Stein. It is the psychological impact on the consumer and the industry& if they think we will drill at home, there is an emotional and psychological aspect of the economy to make that it will lower gas prices.

Ben Stein: It is an argument without numbers. The idea that drilling offshore will lower the price is just preposterous! I don't even know how to describe how preposterous it is. But, it is a very good idea for long-term security, and we should be drilling. On the other hand, Mr. Weiss's comment that the oil companies are not drilling on huge amounts of land or under sea is also nonsense. The oil companies have a lot of leases. They don't drill on ever single acre they lease. They want the oil out as fast as they can, too! The oil companies are not holding out on us. They'd like to pump and sell more oil too.

Cheryl Casone: Again, Marc, some people say it does help psychologically. It's like investing in stocks. If people are afraid we're in a recession, even though we're not; it's the same thing with oil. You have to put that factor in.

Marc Lamont Hill: It is possible it will have a psychological effect, but there is no way to quantify it. I think the argument that drilling will not affect oil prices till 2025 is actually dangerous because we could be there for 30 years! I do not advocate drilling. It will have a dangerous impact on the ecosystem. I think the caribou care if we drill. There have been conferences, and they have been particular about saying that 70 percent of food comes from that area, those animals, and this could have a deleterious effect. Indigenous tribes have said that 70 percent of their food comes from animals in the region.

Ben Stein: They can have some other type of food. We need the oil. There are 300-million of us and 220 of them.

Marc Lamont Hill: What are you going to do? Send them Dominos pizza? There is a delicate equilibrium we have to maintain in order to keep they ecosystem alive and functional. And drilling can impact that.

Charles Payne: Bottom line, I like what you said, Marc. I do not understand people who say it will not have an impact for 20 years. It will. The immediacy, the short-term thinking, is why we are in the problem to begin with. We've got to do something. By the way, Adam, I didn't realize you were such a great oil trader. I should start coming to you so you can tell me next time oil is going to go down. You know what? I think the president's speech had something to do with the drop in oil. But, the bottom line is that this argument is some kind of scam. Look at what we saw in Katrina. All those oil wells down in the ocean and we didn't have a lick of oil that leaked out.

Dan Weiss: That's totally wrong Charles! That's totally false! There were 9 million gallons of oil spilled!!

Charles Payne: Exactly! Out of how many BILLIONS? Come on! You're with the Center for American Progress? Tell me. What is the answer then? Because you guys keep telling us what the answer ain't!

Dan Weiss: In 2006, President Bush said America is addicted to oil& Charles Payne: What's the answer!?

(CROSSTALK)

Dan Weiss: Let me finish. Trying to get more oil out of the outer continental shelf is like curing your alcoholism by going to a different saloon. What we need to do is in the short run is lower prices by putting some of the oil in the SPR up for sale.

Charles Payne: No way. That is an illusion.

Cheryl Casone: Ok everybody. No one can hear when you're all talking at once. Neil doesn't like that and I know he's watchin'! Ben, be the voice of reason.

Ben Stein: The voice of reason is that it's not going to affect oil prices, but as a nation gigantic military interest and vulnerabilities around the world , we should be more self-sufficient. We should be drilling.

Head to Head: Housing or Stocks: Which Will Rebound First?

Cheryl Casone: This week, the Dow, NASDAQ, and S&P all jumping higher. And, new home construction jumping 9 percent last month. But, which rebound is for real? It's time to go 'Head to Head.' Greg Warr: This is like saying, 'Who is going to come second to last in a horse race?' Both housing and stocks have been beaten down. Right now, real estate is a smarter choice. It has been beaten down for such a long time. Houses are the 'American Dream.' That is what people want to get into. There are two factors that make real estate a good investment: Low interest rates and money coming in from private equity. It just has to have that marriage with that low interest rate and then they're just going to take off.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cheryl Casone: Here the thing, Ben, I would think any investment you make now is going to have a return. We've got a really beaten down stock market that could really rebound in the next 6 months.

Ben Stein: I do not know the future; I'm not a fortune teller. But, a typical real estate correction takes seven or eight years. A typical stock market correction is about 18 months. Historically, stocks would be better. On the other hand, you do start getting returns immediately by rent and the pleasure of living in it. For a short-term return, I like stocks. For a place to play with your dogs, I like homes.

Cheryl Casone: Charles, he's making an argument that you should be doing both.

Charles Payne: First, Dan said at the start of the segment, real estate is a good buy anytime. That's nuts. We see an exodus of people losing their homes that are foreclosed on. I think people who want to buy a home, which is what Ben's talking about, then yes. As an investment, I dunno. Stocks are going to pop. You can make a lot of money with them. You can trade them. You can short them.

Cheryl Casone: I want to go over to Katrina really quick, because you're in Florida. And that market has been so beaten down. Here's the thing: People can't get loans to buy the homes.

Katrina Campins: It's the number one obstacle that I'm encountering right now regardless of how wealthy my clients are: Financing. However, real estate is really beaten up right now. It's really one of the best times to buy. Some of the smartest investors are buying right now. And, in real estate, you do make the most money when you buy. However, I think it's really important that the investor become familiar with the location. Every market is different. If investors have a mid-to-long term hold strategy, real estate make sense in the next two years. Be patient. Research the market. Buy a property at a discount and hold long term.

Cheryl Casone: Adam, you're in the Bay Area. I read earlier this week, homes down 25 percent for new home starts I believe. I know that prices have fallen just a little, so you're in a good place to say whether I should be stocks or real estate.

Adam Lashinsky: Bay Area is an unusual place because things were so expensive before the bubble. Story is different for the rest of California where the drop has been catastrophic. Charles and I disagree a lot, but this is one thing where he said something very important. You invest in the stock market. You buy a home to live there. We've seeing a once in a lifetime bubble in the residential real estate market. People have to get it through their thick heads that yes buying a home is a good investment, but it isn't an investment strategy. It's a lifestyle strategy. I think stocks will absolutely recover before the residential real estate market will recover.

Ben Stein: This shows how young you are, Adam. We have bubbles like this in California about every ten years.

Cheryl Casone: Greg, you're in California, a lot of people made a lot of money flipping homes in Arizona and California and Washington state. I'd have to think those days are done.

Greg Warr: They can be done. Charles said before that you can short the stock market. Unfortunately, the Federal government has rigged the real estate market now so that you can't short the stock market, and that takes a big play out of that.

Ben Stein: That's nonsense.

(CROSSTALK)

Cheryl Casone: Katrina, I'm going to give you the last word.

Katrina Campins: I would say overall real estate is always going to prove to be a good investment. My background is international finance and marketing, so I understand the stock market and what they're saying. If someone has real estate to be a mid-to-long term strategy, real estate is great for the long term.

More for Your Money: The Best Funds!

Click here to see this segment!

Dagen McDowell: Picking just one great stock in this unpredictable market can be a lot like trying to catch a falling knife. That's why Ben Stein says buying a basket of stocks with a fund will help you get 'More for Your Money.' Ben Stein: Fidelity Contrafund (FCNTX) *Ben owns shares of this fund

Charles Payne: Oppenheimer Emerging Growth A (OEGAX)

Adam Lashinsky: Dodge & Cox Stock Fund (DODGX) *Adam owns shares of this fund

FOX on the Spot!

Charles Payne: Ride high on the 'HOG'! Harley revs up 25 percent in 1 year

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Adam Lashinsky: Google's a go! Jumps 25 percent by 2010

Marc Lamont Hill: Apple knows what we want! MacBook Air price gets slashed

Ben Stein: Learn from brave soldiers! Stop whining and start buying!

Cheryl Casone: You need FBN! Call your cable provider Bulls & Bears | Cavuto on Business | Forbes on FOX | Cashin' In Forbes on FOX Flipside: New Fed Crackdown on Shady Lenders: Bad News for All Homeowners!

Mike Ozanian, national editor: Cracking down on predatory lenders would tank home prices. It would cause a big decrease in the demand for home. When you get lower demand, prices fall.

Quentin Hardy, Silicon Valley bureau chief: What happens when you get higher misplaced demand? Prices bubble up and you get an explosion of prices like you did over the past 4 years. That ends up in a catastrophe and that would happen again. We have to have guardrails in the system.

Rich Karlgaard, publisher: This is a terrible development. The Fed is grabbing more power after it's proved itself incompetent to manage the stability of the dollar. The problem is in the opposite direction. The good people can't get loans right now.

Elizabeth MacDonald, FOX Business Network: Predators have wrecked the system for us. The free market has turned into a free-for-all. Let's put those guardrails back up and get rid of those roaches in the system.

Steve Forbes, editor-in-chief: You may have a different agency than the Federal Reserve regulating this. They should be punished for their incompetence rather than rewarded. But there should be regulations that say a homeowner has an income before getting a mortgage. Lenders should have to lay out what the real fees are and basic things like that. Who enforces this you can debate. But we shouldn't debate the fact that you should have basic banking practices.

John Rutledge, Forbes contributor: Truth in lending laws are not new and a lot of what the Fed is trying to do is just that. In 2000, before the last crunch, I wrote an article for the Wall Street Journal that said the Fed, not the Treasury, should do bank regulation. The Fed is in charge of keeping the economy going. But they should do it locally, not centrally, so the whole economy doesn't shut down all at once.

In Focus: IndyMac Bank Customers Lose $500 Million: Should They Sue Sen. Schumer?

John Rutledge: We should roast this guy in public. What an idiot saying in a letter that if depositors take their money out of a bank, the bank could be in trouble. This is how all banks operate. Politicians need to show leadership and show us how to get out of problems. They don't need to create the problems with their mouths open and their policy books shut.

Josh Lipton, Forbes.com staff writer: The bottom-line here is IndyMac customers can't sue Senator Schumer. As a member of Congress he is immune from lawsuits arising from statements he makes in his official capacity. You might criticize him but you can't sue him.

Steve Forbes: Let Senator Schumer suffer his own medicine. He defends trial lawyers who engage in these types of lawsuits, let him face it. Also let him face hearings like he puts people through. Why did he write that letter, etc.? Let him face his own medicine for once.

Neil Weinberg, senior editor: There is still no law in this country against stupidity. This was a really dumb thing for someone in his position to do. Especially at a time when we're seeing such a loss of confidence in our financial system. But it's not illegal.

Jack Gage, associate editor: He's not apologizing for this. He's riding his white horse claiming he is a patriot defending the people. He's not. He's causing trouble. The SEC is going through this. Christopher Cox is speaking out about imposing laws against people who start rumors and create runs on banks. This is no different. Schumer started this rumor. Now it's the taxpayer's problem.

Victoria Barret, associate editor: Suing him is not really an option. But I think we should investigate him. I think we should question why he looked at a bank that was hundreds of miles away and decided to point a finger. Many of his largest contributors run hedge funds that could have profited from the kind of precipitous drop on IndyMac stock. We don't know, but it's something we should look at. It's pretty odd that he would single out this one bank that's not in his district and not effecting most of his constituents.

Best Way to Slash Food Prices: Eliminate All Government Regulations!

Jack Gage: Competition will always be a better street cop than government bureaucrats. You have to look no further than the rise in food prices to see that the FDA, when it's trying to protect consumers, is actually driving up the price of food.

Quentin Hardy: The market would maybe sort out some things but it would do it over thousands of dead bodies that wouldn't benefit from regulated food or drugs or other good things the FDA looks after. You want to lower food prices? End subsides in agribusiness. End foreign farmers from not being able to sell here.

Mike Ozanian: The FDA just came out and said corn fructose syrup is as natural as honey! So now, all the corn processors have a $30 million campaign to promote this. Guess who is going to pay for this? All of us when we go shopping!

Rich Karlgaard: Getting rid of these regulatory agencies is just a nonstarter right now. The real problem is the dollar. The cheap dollar is affecting crop prices and oil prices which affect transportation prices and packaging prices. If we strengthen the dollar prices will come down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Steve Forbes: Rich is right. The cheap dollar is raising the price of everything. Quentin is right when it comes to subsides and removing trade barriers. You do those two things and you've addressed 98 percent of the problem. We can't get rid of the FDA. The best we can do is get alternative agencies. Agencies are immortal. Once you create them they live forever.

Informer: Most Recent Buys

Click here to watch the segment

Jack Gage: iShares Latin America (ILF)

Neil Weinberg: iShares Home Construction (ITB)

Victoria Barret: Lamar Advertising (LAMR)

Josh Lipton: Yamana Gold (AUY) Bulls & Bears | Cavuto on Business | Forbes on FOX | Cashin' In Cashin' In Stock Smarts: Gore's New Green Energy Plan: Fast Track to $8 Gas? John 'Bradshaw' Layfield, Layfield Energy: Absolutely! We can't get off of fossil fuel. We can't get off fossil fuel for electricity. We gotta have nuclear. We gotta have a national grid. We got to have a production tax credit, which these green tree huggers refuse to implement. It would create millions of jobs. But we are not drilling off our outer continental shelf. We're not drilling in Colorado, Utah. Oil is going to go through the roof.

Terry Barnes, FOX Business Network: If you're going to try to do this in 10 years, you have got to do everything. You cannot rule anything out. To his credit, he has been reminded people all along that we have to do something and he makes the point over and over again that we are giving money to countries that hate us. We have got to stop doing this. It is a national security issue. You have to give him credit.

Chris Kofinis, Democratic strategist: I don't understand the logic of how it will increase the price of gas. People on all sides agree that that is the case. And the proposal has a very ambitious state to achieve it, but it is simple, we have got to be very forward-looking, move in a different direction, and we cannot continue to do what we have been doing and continue to say we will grow more.

Wayne Rogers, Wayne Rogers & Co.: That is true, and we won't wane ourselves off of that until the other fuels become competitive. I think Tracy's right; you can make that argument. If you'll forgive me, Jonathan, that they are saying you are unpatriotic if you do not support these alternative uses of fuel. You are held captive. By the way, Carter made the same speech 30 years ago, and we did nothing. I blame the Congress; I blame the people of the United States, because we have ignored it.

Jonathan Hoenig, CapitalistPig Asset Management: Is not Middle Eastern oil that Gore is against, it's oil. It is carbon emissions. Problem is, we use carbon emissions. We're productive with them. It powers modern civilization.

Jonas Max Ferris, Maxfunds.com: I don't think it has anything to do with this whole thing about money going to our enemies has nothing to do with our domestic electricity business. All of the money in electricity goes to U.S. companies. We don't burn Saudi energy to make our electricity really. As a domestic business, it does not hurt the economy to buy electricity. It is an environmental issue he is raising, not a 'Don't send money to Hugo Chavez' issue. Electricity domestically, we could achieve this goal in less than 10 years. I could have my home in two weeks not hurting the environment, but it would practically doubled the cost of electricity to do this in the short run, so this is not some magical way to generate power. We have to keep down costs.

Lesson From IndyMac: Let All Failing Banks Go Bust?

Jonathan Hoenig: Absolutely.The government shouldn't be re-regulating banking, it should be de-regulating banking, and that includes letting IndyMac, Fannie and Freddie and Bear Sterns.

Wayne Rogers: Yes and No. You have the Federal Reserve, you've got the treasury and FDIC, and these are proper areas for the government to regulate in a certain extent. However, when they cancelled the Glass-Stegle Act, the congress, in its infinite stupidity, opened up this whole thing to what Jonathan would call deregulation. I' m not sure you would call it that, but, ok, the banks have been allowed to go so large, that they are too big to fail. If they were held to Glass-Stegall, they wouldn't be where they are today. John 'Bradshaw' Layfield: One thing that Wayne is dead right about is infinite stupidity. Our guys on Congress have got to be the worst Senate in the history of empires. These guys are morons. To let them be in charge of something they never saw coming is ridiculous. When is it going to stop. Do you bailout Wachovia? Do you bailout Wells Fargo? We either need a free market, or we do not need a free market.

Tracy Barnes: It should scare people. It's your money, do your due diligence. If you have more than 100 grand in a bank account, either separate it, or move it. Make sure your bank is solvent. If we were talking about 3 different tech companies, and one had a crappy computer, we would say, 'Let it shut down. Move the door, and move on.' We do it for other industries, we should do it for banks.

Jonathan Hoenig: Why do people trust and IndyMac bank? Because it is government- regulated. That's the whole point.

Chris Kofinis: My perspective is that one of the rules of government is to make sure we have a stable market place, but we want an economy right now where consumers are feeling really, really nervous about where we are going, and I think the idea of seeing a bank fail is something that's psychologically does bigger damage than just simply one bank failing. That doesn't mean that the government needs to save every bank, but they need to be very selective in terms of stopping it. The last thing you want is for people to lose confidence not only in the banking system, but the economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jonas Max Farris: Because they don't fully understand the problem yet. Any IndyMac customer can tell you, they did not get bailed out by the government. The government is bailing out depositors, which is a system we've had since the depression, and they will continue to do that because since the 24-hour news cycle, if we had camera shots of these lines around the banks, we would see a line around all banks. The average person cannot determine if their bank is solvent or has made good loans and we need an FDIC system. The core issue is falling home prices, and they're not doing things to support it. You have to bail out people at this bank, because it is hurting the bank. In fact, the government is encouraging home prices to fall.

Teachers Unions Social Agenda: Will It Bankrupt Us If Obama Wins?

Jonathan Hoenig: What's proposed here is school becoming a second home, replacing parents, and, once again, forcibly asserting more unaccountable government control into people's everyday lives. I' m not an educator but I think the purpose of school is to learn how to think. Not get a cavity filled, not get a hot meal. And that's what is on the table here.

Chris Kofinis: Well, times have changed. AFT's proposal is an ambitious, but I think what it reflects is a growing reality that educators face every single day. Kids come to school that do not have a health-care, kids come to school with poor nutrition or they are not treated well at home. They have to educate them poor services, poor building support instruments. It complicates the primary mission of every educator, to teach kids as best they can. I do not know if this is necessarily the right solution, it seems pretty ambitious. It is something that I think maybe almost too difficult to manage, but I think it reflects a growing reality that we have to, as a country, focus on human capital and how to build that up.

Next Bull Market Leaders!

Click here to watch the segment

John Bradshaw Layfield: General Electric (GE)

Jonathan Hoenig: NTT Docomo (DCM)

Jonas Max Ferris: Vanguard Telecom Services ETF (VOX)

Wayne Rogers: United Technologies (UTX)

Return to Top

Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace [analysis]

Washington, DC, Jul 21, 2008 (AfricaFocus/All Africa Global Media via COMTEX News Network) --
On July 14, 2008, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) asked the court to indict the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur. "Will this be a historic victory for human rights, a principled blow on behalf of the victims of atrocity against the men who orchestrated massacre and destruction? Or will it be a tragedy, a clash between the needs for justice and for peace, which will send Sudan into a vortex of [further] turmoil and bloodshed?" - Alex de Waal

This AfricaFocus Bulletin contains an analysis by Alex de Waal on the impact of the ICC decision to charge Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir, highlighting the threat that insistence on justice will further reduce the chances of peace, by provoking even more violent actions by the Sudanese government. Another AfricaFocus Bulletin sent out today contains an alternative perspective, from the Enough Project, arguing that in fact the increased international pressure on Sudan's leader could be a step forward towards peace.

As this two contrasting analyses show, the impact of the ICC decision is highly unpredictable and hotly disputed, both among Sudanese and among international advocates for peace and justice in Sudan.

Whichever view of the ICC decision is correct, however, the debate does obscure one critical point: the failure of the international community to provide adequate support for the African Union-UN peacekeeping force in Darfur (UNAMID). This operation is understaffed, under-equipped, under-funded, and vulnerable to attacks.

Established one year ago with an authorized strength of up to 19,555 military personnel, 6,432 police, and more than 5,000 civilian personnel, it currently has less than 8,000 troops, less than 2,000 police, and a little over 1,000 civilian personnel.

Critical equipment is lacking, including helicopters, aerial reconnaissance, transport and logistics units. And more than half of the $1.3 billion budget assessed on UN member states for the first year was unpaid as on the end of April. For more detailed information on UNAMID, including monthly reports, see http://www.un.org/depts/dpko/missions/unamid

For previous AfricaFocus Bulletins on Sudan, and other related links, visit http://www.africafocus.org/country/sudan.php

Additional commentaries on the ICC decision include:

July 14, International Crisis Group, "Opportunities and Risks for Peace"

http://allafrica.com/stories/200807141036.html

July 14, Inter Press Service, "Genocide Charges Split Global Community"

http://allafrica.com/stories/200807141818.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 16, Suliman Baldo and Marieke Wierda, "UN Should Stand Fast of War Crimes Case"

http://allafrica.com/stories/200807160870.html

July 18, Inter Press Service, "ICC Indictment Sparks Hope, Fear"

http://allafrica.com/stories/200807190001.html

For a well-informed analysis of the background to the conflict in Darfur, there is no better single source than the book by Alex de Waal and Julie Flint, Darfur: A New History of A Long War. The most recent edition was released by Zed Books in May 2008.

It is available at

Amazon.com

http://tinyurl.com/5odnb6

Amazon.co.uk

http://tinyurl.com/58p5bs

Powell's Books

http://tinyurl.com/5putgy

For an additional selection in the AfricaFocus Bookshop of recent books on the crises in Sudan, see http://www.africafocus.org/books/afbooks.php#sud1 (Amazon USA) or http://www.africafocus.org/books/afbooks_uk.php#sud1 (Amazon UK).

Sudan and the International Criminal Court: a guide to the controversy

Alex de Waal

http://www.opendemocracy.net

http://www.ssrc.org/blogs/darfur

Today, 14 July 2008, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC), Luis Moreno-Ocampo, asked the court to indict the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur. Here, Luis Moreno-Ocampo is taking a bold and momentous step for global human rights and for Sudan. It is also controversial and fraught with danger. Will this be a historic victory for human rights, a principled blow on behalf of the victims of atrocity against the men who orchestrated massacre and destruction? Or will it be a tragedy, a clash between the needs for justice and for peace, which will send Sudan into a vortex of turmoil and bloodshed?

Over the last month, the Social Science Research Council (SSRC) blog has hosted a debate on the imminent indictment, which has attracted diverse contributions by scholars and experts.

Contributors have diverse opinions and have provided arguments from different disciplines and perspectives. In pursuit of its aim of providing social-science expertise on matters of immediate import, the SSRC has hosted this debate as a resource for those interested in delving deep into the complexities of the issues that confront Sudan, the ICC and the United Nations. This article provides a guide to the main strands of the debate.

The prosecutor's application

The application to the court follows from the previous indictments, of Ahmed Harun (then in the ministry of the interior with responsibility for Darfur, now minister of state for humanitarian affairs) and militia leader Ali Kushayb. Both were indicted for their roles in the massacres of 2003 and 2004. Speaking to the United Nations Security Council on 5 June 2008, Luis Moreno-Ocampo indicated his intention to finger the men who instructed Harun.

But the decision Luis Moreno-Ocampo has made on 14 July by naming Presdient al-Bashir makes history. The prosecutor is striking an immense blow for universal jurisdiction. He is seeking to demonstrate that no one can enjoy impunity for crimes. He is taking a step towards a world constitution in which the barriers of national sovereignty are swept away in favor of the rule of law with global reach. This point is emphasised by William Schabas and also by Ronald Jennings.

The legal arguments

It is significant that Luis Moreno-Ocampo has indicated that his investigations range more broadly than the period of massacres of 2003-04. In his address to the United Nations Security Council - which referred Darfur to the International Criminal Court with Resolution 1593 in 2005 - he claimed that government actions the subsequent period represent the continuation of a systematic campaign of crimes against humanity. If he does indeed proceed to asking the court to make charges on this basis, it is an ambitious claim. The prosecutor would, in effect, be charging that the entire apparatus of the government of Sudan is involved in a coordinated and systematic, criminal enterprise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The legal options open to the prosecutor have been analysed by Jens Meierhenrich.

There are three main avenues he could have chosen to pursue:

allege a conspiracy to commit war crimes, crimes against humanity, or genocide

charge senior government figures in Khartoum with joint criminal enterprise to commit a range of crimes prosecute on the basis of command or superior responsibility for crimes, in effect returning to the 2007 case against Ahmed Harun and following it up the chain of command.

Is the prosecutor on solid ground when he claims that a policy of eradication has continued for the three and a half years since the beginning of 2005? On this point, Moreno-Ocampo's empirical case has been criticised by Julie Flint, who points out how much has changed. Fabrice Weissman of Medecins sans Frontieres (MSF) makes similar points, especially with regard to the displaced camps.

These observers argue that evidence for such a policy, pursued in a determined and coordinated manner, is slender. Socio-economic analyses of Darfur by various authors (reviews of publications on markets and livelihoods, and of the political economy of Sudan) make the point that it is better understood as a "complex emergency" than an ongoing genocide. Pieter Tesch has also criticised parallels with the holocaust and especially Moreno-Ocampo's controversial comparison with the Nazis.

Julie Flint and these other contributors do not dispute that horrendous crimes have been committed and that responsibility reaches up to the highest echelons of the Sudanese state apparatus.

Nor do they cast doubt on the continuing crisis and the violations perpetrated by Khartoum and its proxies. But they do question the prosecutor's depiction of the current situation, and do question the wisdom of his approach.

The prosecutor's decision to pursue a charge of joint criminal enterprise against a head of state is certain to cause controversy.

The charge has been developed in United States law and is used primarily to catch racketeers and gangsters; it has often been used (such as in the well-known RICO cases) as a charge of last resort, a dragnet to catch individuals who may not have individual culpability for a crime but who are deemed to have common purpose with others who have actually committed the crimes.

As discussed by Jens Meierhenrich, this approach could eviscerate the principle of individual responsibility for crimes and set a precedent in international law with very far-reaching consequences.

By the same token that joint criminal enterprise allows a prosecutor to reach into the highest echelons of state power, it is also open to indiscriminate use. For example, it could be applied to make a head of state, or government ministers, criminally culpable for crimes committed by their underlings, even if they had no direct involvement in or even knowledge of those crimes.

Sudan's polarisation

Sudanese opinion on the ICC's role is polarised - and not simply "for" versus "against". Many Darfurians are enthusiastic about the indictment of the men they consider responsible for the destruction of their land and the slaughter of tens of thousands of people (see Omer Ismail's contribution). There are already exuberant demonstrations in Khartoum of support for the ICC among Darfur's displaced and its rebels. Many opponents of President al-Bashir, including southerners, are similarly delighted that he has finally received the condemnation that they believe he deserves. Without doubt, Bashir's adversaries - in Darfur, the south and within Khartoum itself - will feel emboldened. The dangers of emotive polarisation leading to bloodshed should not be minimised.

Others are less celebratory; one civil-society activist said that "This government deserves everything that can be thrown at it. But it is the people of Sudan who will pay the price." Another comments: "All of us want justice but justice cannot be achieved in a social vacuum. We should choose the time for justice. Today it is the lives of people that count." A Sudanese political leader - known for publicly supporting the ICC in principle - regards this as "a classic case in which justice and stability are at loggerheads." Many Sudanese - including people who are not supporters of the government - are worried about their country's political stability. Some are concerned that the prosecutor's action is depriving them of their democratic rights to choose their own government (see Abdalbasit Saeed's contribution).

Omar al-Bashir will not surrender himself voluntarily to the International Criminal Court. In resisting, will he be stigmatised, shamed and thus weakened? The possibility of the stigma of an indictment acting as a deterrent to future crime, an end to a culture of impunity, is examined by Nicki Alam. These outcomes seem improbable. Al-Bashir has already vowed never to hand over any Sudanese to the ICC and has accused the court of being a "terrorist" organisation. He may see an attempt to indict him as an act of war.

The likelihood that al-Bashir will react angrily, seeking to retaliate to avenge his sense of humiliation, is examined in my posting based on the writing of criminologist James Gilligan. In assessing al-Bashir's response, the long-standing rule of thumb for Khartoum elite politics should not be forgotten: the greatest threat to the president comes from those closest to him. His actions will be driven by calculations of internal threat more than by his assessment of how threatening the ICC or the UN troops in Sudan, might be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the aftermath of the Justice & Equality Movement (JEM's) attack on Khartoum on 10 May 2008, the government is feeling vulnerable and the army especially feels that it needs to demonstrate its strength. President al-Bashir is also known for his propensity to respond to insult with fury, and is reportedly preoccupied with what he sees as foreign conspiracies to overthrow him. His response cannot be predicted.

Africa's ambivalence

The ICC prosecutor may have the law on his side. But whether he can win his case in the court of world opinion is a different matter - especially in Africa. When a common criminal is in the dock, he is on trial. When a sitting head of state stands indicted of crimes against humanity, both he and his prosecutor are on trial. A point made by several contributors is that the ICC does not operate like a regular criminal court. The choice of individuals to indict and the charges to bring against them are political decisions. Luis Moreno-Ocampo's political judgment and the future of the ICC are under scrutiny as much as the record of President al-Bashir.

The ICC's exclusive focus on African cases to date is causing some unease in Africa. It represents an expansion of western power at the expense of African concerns, including national sovereignty and the possibilities of pursuing local mechanisms for justice. Chidi Odinkalu and Beshir Gedda make these points. It is notable that the African Union (AU), an early supporter of the ICC, is showing a distinct lack of enthusiasm for the direction of the court. The AU-ICC cooperation memorandum, which was expected to be finalised by this time, has been put on hold. As Stephen Ellis describes, the precedent of the Charles Taylor prosecution shows that this will be a highly political act.

Beshir Gedda's second contribution argues that Moreno-Ocampo's strategy has less to do with justice and Africa and more to do with international politics: it is aimed at getting United States support for the court. William Schabas makes a similar point: "A more robust judicial intervention in Sudan from the Court has the potential to restore its flagging credibility."

Peace-and-justice dilemmas

Several contributors have predicted political turmoil as the most likely outcome of the indictment (they include Mary Harper and Michael Davies's far-reaching "worst-case scenario" - a frightening prediction that is privately shared by senior United Nations staff). Well-connected individuals fear that the indictment may spell the restriction or expulsion of UN missions, the end of Sudan's comprehensive peace agreement (CPA) agreed in January 2005, and new outbreaks of violence. The prosecutor's step comes at a time when the partnership between the National Congress Party and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) that underpins the CPA is very fragile.

Celia McKeon of Conciliation Resources makes the important point that accountability mechanisms should pay due regard to the need for peace. Under the Rome statute of July 1998 that set up the ICC, the prosecutor is in fact required to ensure that any prosecution is in the interests of justice and the interests of the victims. My posting on the deficiency of the justice provisions in the Darfur peace agreement (DPA) signed in May 2006 makes the complementary point that the UN Security Council's referral of Darfur to the ICC had the unintended consequence of excluding accountability issues from the peace talks, with the outcome that the ICC has become the only judicial mechanism operative with regard to the crimes committed Darfur. If - as now seems almost certain - ICC prosecutions are stalled, then there will have been no progress at all in obtaining justice for the victims of atrocities in Darfur.

Chad Hazlett is more sanguine, arguing that Darfur's peace process is stalled and that the adverse consequences of an indictment can be managed. Peace and political stability are not the prosecutor's prime concern. The Rome statute set up the prosecutor as an independent agent concerned with the pursuit of justice. When the UNSC referred Darfur to the ICC on 31 March 2005, it mandated the prosecutor to examine the evidence and pursue criminal prosecution.

Other concerns such as humanitarian relief, peace and civilian protection were dealt with by other UNSC resolutions. The prosecutor is obliged to consider the interests of the victims, but ultimately it is for the Security Council to exercise its powers to defer ICC activities, should it choose to do so. Moreno-Ocampo has, as examined in my posting of 11 June, thrown down a gauntlet to the UN Security Council.

What next?

Around the world, human-rights campaigners are expecting a bold step from Moreno-Ocampo which they can hail as the single most important blow for justice and human rights for many years. They argue that such an action by the chief prosecutor will signal that there is no impunity for crimes, even for a head of state, and demonstrate that the international community will stand up for the human rights of victims, whatever the consequences - and thus irrevocably change the world for the better. Moreover, by giving hope and solidarity to the victims of unspeakable crimes in Darfur, these campaigners contend that the indictment of al-Bashir will be a huge step towards realising human dignity, democracy and peace.

Others disagree, and fear the casualties of justice triumphant.

Responsibility now passes to the judges of the ICC, who must now consider the evidence presented and decide whether to indict the men named. In theory, the judges could reject all or part of the application, because they consider the evidence deficient. On past record, this is unlikely.

The UN Security Council could in principle intervene and, using its powers under Article 16 of the Rome statute, defer any prosecution for a year. At present this seems improbable. The prosecutor has checkmated the two countries most opposed to the ICC. The US, which refuses to support the court on principle, has determined that the crimes in Darfur constituted genocide, and both presidential candidates have committed themselves to a tough line on Sudan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

China is unlikely to want to endanger its standing in the world with less than four weeks to go to the Olympic games.

Chad Hazlett makes the interesting point that use of Article 16 can be seen, not as a rebuff to the court, but as a use of the ICC mechanism to bring pressure to bear on the Sudanese government. His posting focuses on how an indictment can be used as an important point of leverage for achieving both justice and peace.

The challenge to the United Nations and the international community will be as profound as to Omar al-Bashir. Sudan's status as a pariah state will be confirmed while al-Bashir's defiant stand would be no more than his habit of nineteen years. But for the international community - respectful of the rule of law and supportive of the ICC, but also committed to the CPA and the national elections, and supporting two huge peacekeeping and civilian-protection missions - the dilemmas are acute. Cornelia Schneider's article on the UN and the ICC makes it clear that the UN forces are not under any legal obligation to execute ICC arrest-warrants - a step that would certainly bring them into sharp conflict with the Sudanese government. But whether it is possible for UN officials and peacekeeping troops to sit at the same table with Sudanese officials whose president and commander-in-chief is officially accused as a war criminal, and to enter into legally-binding agreements with him and his government, remains to be seen.

These legal issues will arise only if the judges of the court decide to uphold an application from the prosecutor and issue an indictment. The focus will now shift to the next act in this drama - the decision of the judges. If past experience is a guide, they will take at least a month to examine the application.

The UN Security Council's approach to the Darfur crisis has deployed a vast array of instruments including sanctions, peace processes, peacekeeping and the ICC. These decisions have rarely been coordinated and prioritised, and the last four years appear increasingly like an exercise in giving powerful new weapons to untrained foot-soldiers who lack a single commander. These weapons may cause less danger to the enemy than the risk of friendly-fire casualties to their own side. Some fear that the Security Council referral of Darfur to the ICC may yet turn out to be the international community's biggest self-inflicted wound.

AfricaFocus Bulletin is an independent electronic publication providing reposted commentary and analysis on African issues, with a particular focus on U.S. and international policies. AfricaFocus Bulletin is edited by William Minter.

AfricaFocus Bulletin can be reached at africafocus@igc.org. Please write to this address to subscribe or unsubscribe to the bulletin, or to suggest material for inclusion. For more information about reposted material, please contact directly the original source mentioned. For a full archive and other resources, see http://www.africafocus.org

Copyright © 2008 AfricaFocus. Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media (allAfrica.com).

Return to Top

Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace [analysis]

Released : Monday, July 21, 2008 12:30 PM
Calibre MacroWorld

(AfricaFocus/All Africa Global Media via COMTEX News Network) -- On July 14, 2008, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) asked the court to indict the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur. 'Will this be a historic victory for human rights, a principled blow on behalf of the victims of atrocity against the men who orchestrated massacre and destruction? Or will it be a tragedy, a clash between the needs for justice and for peace, which will send Sudan into a vortex of [further] turmoil and bloodshed?' - Alex de Waal This AfricaFocus Bulletin contains an analysis by Alex de Waal on the impact of the ICC decision to charge Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir, highlighting the threat that insistence on justice will further reduce the chances of peace, by provoking even more violent actions by the Sudanese government. Another AfricaFocus Bulletin sent out today contains an alternative perspective, from the Enough Project, arguing that in fact the increased international pressure on Sudan's leader could be a step forward towards peace.

As this two contrasting analyses show, the impact of the ICC decision is highly unpredictable and hotly disputed, both among Sudanese and among international advocates for peace and justice in Sudan.

Whichever view of the ICC decision is correct, however, the debate does obscure one critical point: the failure of the international community to provide adequate support for the African Union-UN peacekeeping force in Darfur (UNAMID). This operation is understaffed, under-equipped, under-funded, and vulnerable to attacks.

Established one year ago with an authorized strength of up to 19,555 military personnel, 6,432 police, and more than 5,000 civilian personnel, it currently has less than 8,000 troops, less than 2,000 police, and a little over 1,000 civilian personnel.

Critical equipment is lacking, including helicopters, aerial reconnaissance, transport and logistics units. And more than half of the $1.3 billion budget assessed on UN member states for the first year was unpaid as on the end of April. For more detailed information on UNAMID, including monthly reports, see http://www.un.org/depts/dpko/missions/unamid

For previous AfricaFocus Bulletins on Sudan, and other related links, visit http://www.africafocus.org/country/sudan.php

Additional commentaries on the ICC decision include:

July 14, International Crisis Group, 'Opportunities and Risks for Peace' July 14, Inter Press Service, 'Genocide Charges Split Global Community' July 16, Suliman Baldo and Marieke Wierda, 'UN Should Stand Fast of War Crimes Case' July 18, Inter Press Service, 'ICC Indictment Sparks Hope, Fear' For a well-informed analysis of the background to the conflict in Darfur, there is no better single source than the book by Alex de Waal and Julie Flint, Darfur: A New History of A Long War. The most recent edition was released by Zed Books in May 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is available at

For an additional selection in the AfricaFocus Bookshop of recent books on the crises in Sudan, see

http://www.africafocus.org/books/afbooks.php#sud1 (Amazon USA) or

Sudan and the International Criminal Court: a guide to the controversy

Today, 14 July 2008, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC), Luis Moreno-Ocampo, asked the court to indict the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur. Here, Luis Moreno-Ocampo is taking a bold and momentous step for global human rights and for Sudan. It is also controversial and fraught with danger. Will this be a historic victory for human rights, a principled blow on behalf of the victims of atrocity against the men who orchestrated massacre and destruction? Or will it be a tragedy, a clash between the needs for justice and for peace, which will send Sudan into a vortex of turmoil and bloodshed?

Over the last month, the Social Science Research Council (SSRC) blog has hosted a debate on the imminent indictment, which has attracted diverse contributions by scholars and experts.

Contributors have diverse opinions and have provided arguments from different disciplines and perspectives. In pursuit of its aim of providing social-science expertise on matters of immediate import, the SSRC has hosted this debate as a resource for those interested in delving deep into the complexities of the issues that confront Sudan, the ICC and the United Nations. This article provides a guide to the main strands of the debate.

The application to the court follows from the previous indictments, of Ahmed Harun (then in the ministry of the interior with responsibility for Darfur, now minister of state for humanitarian affairs) and militia leader Ali Kushayb. Both were indicted for their roles in the massacres of 2003 and 2004. Speaking to the United Nations Security Council on 5 June 2008, Luis Moreno-Ocampo indicated his intention to finger the men who instructed Harun.

But the decision Luis Moreno-Ocampo has made on 14 July by naming Presdient al-Bashir makes history. The prosecutor is striking an immense blow for universal jurisdiction. He is seeking to demonstrate that no one can enjoy impunity for crimes. He is taking a step towards a world constitution in which the barriers of national sovereignty are swept away in favor of the rule of law with global reach. This point is emphasised by William Schabas and also by Ronald Jennings.

It is significant that Luis Moreno-Ocampo has indicated that his investigations range more broadly than the period of massacres of 2003-04. In his address to the United Nations Security Council - which referred Darfur to the International Criminal Court with Resolution 1593 in 2005 - he claimed that government actions the subsequent period represent the continuation of a systematic campaign of crimes against humanity. If he does indeed proceed to asking the court to make charges on this basis, it is an ambitious claim. The prosecutor would, in effect, be charging that the entire apparatus of the government of Sudan is involved in a coordinated and systematic, criminal enterprise.

The legal options open to the prosecutor have been analysed by Jens Meierhenrich.

There are three main avenues he could have chosen to pursue:

allege a conspiracy to commit war crimes, crimes against humanity, or genocide

charge senior government figures in Khartoum with joint criminal enterprise to commit a range of crimes

prosecute on the basis of command or superior responsibility for crimes, in effect returning to the 2007 case against Ahmed Harun and following it up the chain of command.

Is the prosecutor on solid ground when he claims that a policy of eradication has continued for the three and a half years since the beginning of 2005? On this point, Moreno-Ocampo's empirical case has been criticised by Julie Flint, who points out how much has changed. Fabrice Weissman of Medecins sans Frontieres (MSF) makes similar points, especially with regard to the displaced camps.

These observers argue that evidence for such a policy, pursued in a determined and coordinated manner, is slender. Socio-economic analyses of Darfur by various authors (reviews of publications on markets and livelihoods, and of the political economy of Sudan) make the point that it is better understood as a 'complex emergency' than an ongoing genocide. Pieter Tesch has also criticised parallels with the holocaust and especially Moreno-Ocampo's controversial comparison with the Nazis.

Julie Flint and these other contributors do not dispute that horrendous crimes have been committed and that responsibility reaches up to the highest echelons of the Sudanese state apparatus.

Nor do they cast doubt on the continuing crisis and the violations perpetrated by Khartoum and its proxies. But they do question the prosecutor's depiction of the current situation, and do question the wisdom of his approach.

The prosecutor's decision to pursue a charge of joint criminal enterprise against a head of state is certain to cause controversy.

The charge has been developed in United States law and is used primarily to catch racketeers and gangsters; it has often been used (such as in the well-known RICO cases) as a charge of last resort, a dragnet to catch individuals who may not have individual culpability for a crime but who are deemed to have common purpose with others who have actually committed the crimes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As discussed by Jens Meierhenrich, this approach could eviscerate the principle of individual responsibility for crimes and set a precedent in international law with very far-reaching consequences.

By the same token that joint criminal enterprise allows a prosecutor to reach into the highest echelons of state power, it is also open to indiscriminate use. For example, it could be applied to make a head of state, or government ministers, criminally culpable for crimes committed by their underlings, even if they had no direct involvement in or even knowledge of those crimes.

Sudanese opinion on the ICC's role is polarised - and not simply 'for' versus 'against'. Many Darfurians are enthusiastic about the indictment of the men they consider responsible for the destruction of their land and the slaughter of tens of thousands of people (see Omer Ismail's contribution). There are already exuberant demonstrations in Khartoum of support for the ICC among Darfur's displaced and its rebels. Many opponents of President al-Bashir, including southerners, are similarly delighted that he has finally received the condemnation that they believe he deserves. Without doubt, Bashir's adversaries - in Darfur, the south and within Khartoum itself - will feel emboldened. The dangers of emotive polarisation leading to bloodshed should not be minimised.

Others are less celebratory; one civil-society activist said that 'This government deserves everything that can be thrown at it. But it is the people of Sudan who will pay the price.' Another comments: 'All of us want justice but justice cannot be achieved in a social vacuum. We should choose the time for justice. Today it is the lives of people that count.' A Sudanese political leader - known for publicly supporting the ICC in principle - regards this as 'a classic case in which justice and stability are at loggerheads.' Many Sudanese - including people who are not supporters of the government - are worried about their country's political stability. Some are concerned that the prosecutor's action is depriving them of their democratic rights to choose their own government (see Abdalbasit Saeed's contribution).

Omar al-Bashir will not surrender himself voluntarily to the International Criminal Court. In resisting, will he be stigmatised, shamed and thus weakened? The possibility of the stigma of an indictment acting as a deterrent to future crime, an end to a culture of impunity, is examined by Nicki Alam. These outcomes seem improbable. Al-Bashir has already vowed never to hand over any Sudanese to the ICC and has accused the court of being a 'terrorist' organisation. He may see an attempt to indict him as an act of war.

The likelihood that al-Bashir will react angrily, seeking to retaliate to avenge his sense of humiliation, is examined in my posting based on the writing of criminologist James Gilligan. In assessing al-Bashir's response, the long-standing rule of thumb for Khartoum elite politics should not be forgotten: the greatest threat to the president comes from those closest to him. His actions will be driven by calculations of internal threat more than by his assessment of how threatening the ICC or the UN troops in Sudan, might be.

In the aftermath of the Justice & Equality Movement (JEM's) attack on Khartoum on 10 May 2008, the government is feeling vulnerable and the army especially feels that it needs to demonstrate its strength. President al-Bashir is also known for his propensity to respond to insult with fury, and is reportedly preoccupied with what he sees as foreign conspiracies to overthrow him. His response cannot be predicted.

The ICC prosecutor may have the law on his side. But whether he can win his case in the court of world opinion is a different matter - especially in Africa. When a common criminal is in the dock, he is on trial. When a sitting head of state stands indicted of crimes against humanity, both he and his prosecutor are on trial. A point made by several contributors is that the ICC does not operate like a regular criminal court. The choice of individuals to indict and the charges to bring against them are political decisions. Luis Moreno-Ocampo's political judgment and the future of the ICC are under scrutiny as much as the record of President al-Bashir.

The ICC's exclusive focus on African cases to date is causing some unease in Africa. It represents an expansion of western power at the expense of African concerns, including national sovereignty and the possibilities of pursuing local mechanisms for justice. Chidi Odinkalu and Beshir Gedda make these points. It is notable that the African Union (AU), an early supporter of the ICC, is showing a distinct lack of enthusiasm for the direction of the court. The AU-ICC cooperation memorandum, which was expected to be finalised by this time, has been put on hold. As Stephen Ellis describes, the precedent of the Charles Taylor prosecution shows that this will be a highly political act.

Beshir Gedda's second contribution argues that Moreno-Ocampo's strategy has less to do with justice and Africa and more to do with international politics: it is aimed at getting United States support for the court. William Schabas makes a similar point: 'A more robust judicial intervention in Sudan from the Court has the potential to restore its flagging credibility.' Several contributors have predicted political turmoil as the most likely outcome of the indictment (they include Mary Harper and Michael Davies's far-reaching 'worst-case scenario' - a frightening prediction that is privately shared by senior United Nations staff). Well-connected individuals fear that the indictment may spell the restriction or expulsion of UN missions, the end of Sudan's comprehensive peace agreement (CPA) agreed in January 2005, and new outbreaks of violence. The prosecutor's step comes at a time when the partnership between the National Congress Party and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) that underpins the CPA is very fragile.

Celia McKeon of Conciliation Resources makes the important point that accountability mechanisms should pay due regard to the need for peace. Under the Rome statute of July 1998 that set up the ICC, the prosecutor is in fact required to ensure that any prosecution is in the interests of justice and the interests of the victims. My posting on the deficiency of the justice provisions in the Darfur peace agreement (DPA) signed in May 2006 makes the complementary point that the UN Security Council's referral of Darfur to the ICC had the unintended consequence of excluding accountability issues from the peace talks, with the outcome that the ICC has become the only judicial mechanism operative with regard to the crimes committed

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Darfur. If - as now seems almost certain - ICC prosecutions are stalled, then there will have been no progress at all in obtaining justice for the victims of atrocities in Darfur.

Chad Hazlett is more sanguine, arguing that Darfur's peace process is stalled and that the adverse consequences of an indictment can be managed. Peace and political stability are not the prosecutor's prime concern. The Rome statute set up the prosecutor as an independent agent concerned with the pursuit of justice. When the UNSC referred Darfur to the ICC on 31 March 2005, it mandated the prosecutor to examine the evidence and pursue criminal prosecution.

Other concerns such as humanitarian relief, peace and civilian protection were dealt with by other UNSC resolutions. The prosecutor is obliged to consider the interests of the victims, but ultimately it is for the Security Council to exercise its powers to defer ICC activities, should it choose to do so. Moreno-Ocampo has, as examined in my posting of 11 June, thrown down a gauntlet to the UN Security Council.

Around the world, human-rights campaigners are expecting a bold step from Moreno-Ocampo which they can hail as the single most important blow for justice and human rights for many years. They argue that such an action by the chief prosecutor will signal that there is no impunity for crimes, even for a head of state, and demonstrate that the international community will stand up for the human rights of victims, whatever the consequences - and thus irrevocably change the world for the better. Moreover, by giving hope and solidarity to the victims of unspeakable crimes in Darfur, these campaigners contend that the indictment of al-Bashir will be a huge step towards realising human dignity, democracy and peace.

Others disagree, and fear the casualties of justice triumphant.

Responsibility now passes to the judges of the ICC, who must now consider the evidence presented and decide whether to indict the men named. In theory, the judges could reject all or part of the application, because they consider the evidence deficient. On past record, this is unlikely.

The UN Security Council could in principle intervene and, using its powers under Article 16 of the Rome statute, defer any prosecution for a year. At present this seems improbable. The prosecutor has checkmated the two countries most opposed to the ICC. The US, which refuses to support the court on principle, has determined that the crimes in Darfur constituted genocide, and both presidential candidates have committed themselves to a tough line on Sudan.

China is unlikely to want to endanger its standing in the world with less than four weeks to go to the Olympic games.

Chad Hazlett makes the interesting point that use of Article 16 can be seen, not as a rebuff to the court, but as a use of the ICC mechanism to bring pressure to bear on the Sudanese government. His posting focuses on how an indictment can be used as an important point of leverage for achieving both justice and peace.

The challenge to the United Nations and the international community will be as profound as to Omar al-Bashir. Sudan's status as a pariah state will be confirmed while al-Bashir's defiant stand would be no more than his habit of nineteen years. But for the international community - respectful of the rule of law and supportive of the ICC, but also committed to the CPA and the national elections, and supporting two huge peacekeeping and civilian-protection missions - the dilemmas are acute. Cornelia Schneider's article on the UN and the ICC makes it clear that the UN forces are not under any legal obligation to execute ICC arrest-warrants - a step that would certainly bring them into sharp conflict with the Sudanese government. But whether it is possible for UN officials and peacekeeping troops to sit at the same table with Sudanese officials whose president and commander-in-chief is officially accused as a war criminal, and to enter into legally-binding agreements with him and his government, remains to be seen.

These legal issues will arise only if the judges of the court decide to uphold an application from the prosecutor and issue an indictment. The focus will now shift to the next act in this drama - the decision of the judges. If past experience is a guide, they will take at least a month to examine the application.

The UN Security Council's approach to the Darfur crisis has deployed a vast array of instruments including sanctions, peace processes, peacekeeping and the ICC. These decisions have rarely been coordinated and prioritised, and the last four years appear increasingly like an exercise in giving powerful new weapons to untrained foot-soldiers who lack a single commander. These weapons may cause less danger to the enemy than the risk of friendly-fire casualties to their own side. Some fear that the Security Council referral of Darfur to the ICC may yet turn out to be the international community's biggest self-inflicted wound.

AfricaFocus Bulletin is an independent electronic publication providing reposted commentary and analysis on African issues, with a particular focus on U.S. and international policies. AfricaFocus Bulletin is edited by William Minter. AfricaFocus Bulletin can be reached at africafocus@igc.org. Please write to this address to subscribe or unsubscribe to the bulletin, or to suggest material for inclusion. For more information about reposted material, please contact directly the original source mentioned. For a full archive and other resources, see http://www.africafocus.org

Copyright AfricaFocus. Distributed by AllAfrica Global Media (allAfrica.com).

Return to Top

Sudan Darfur - Justice Vs. Peace

Washington, DC
AllAfrica.com

the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) asked the court to indict the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur. 'Will this be a historic victory for human rights, a principled blow on behalf of the victims of atrocity against the men who orchestrated massacre and destruction? Or will it be a tragedy, a clash between the needs for justice and for peace, which will send Sudan into a vortex of [further] turmoil and bloodshed?' - Alex de Waal This AfricaFocus Bulletin contains an analysis by Alex de Waal on the impact of the ICC decision to charge Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir, highlighting the threat that insistence on justice will further reduce the chances of peace, by provoking even more violent actions by the Sudanese government. Another AfricaFocus Bulletin sent out today contains an alternative perspective, from the Enough Project, arguing that in fact the increased international pressure on Sudan's leader could be a step forward towards peace.

As this two contrasting analyses show, the impact of the ICC decision is highly unpredictable and hotly disputed, both among Sudanese and among international advocates for peace and justice in Sudan.

Whichever view of the ICC decision is correct, however, the debate does obscure one critical point: the failure of the international community to provide adequate support for the African Union-UN peacekeeping force in Darfur (UNAMID). This operation is understaffed, under-equipped, under-funded, and vulnerable to attacks.

Established one year ago with an authorized strength of up to 19,555 military personnel, 6,432 police, and more than 5,000 civilian personnel, it currently has less than 8,000 troops, less than 2,000 police, and a little over 1,000 civilian personnel.

Critical equipment is lacking, including helicopters, aerial reconnaissance, transport and logistics units. And more than half of the $1.3 billion budget assessed on UN member states for the first year was unpaid as on the end of April. For more detailed information on UNAMID, including monthly reports, see http://www.un.org/depts/dpko/missions/unamid

For previous AfricaFocus Bulletins on Sudan, and other related links, visit http://www.africafocus.org/country/sudan.php

Additional commentaries on the ICC decision include:

July 14, International Crisis Group, 'Opportunities and Risks for Peace' http://allafrica.com/stories/200807141036.html

July 14, Inter Press Service, 'Genocide Charges Split Global Community' http://allafrica.com/stories/200807141818.html

July 16, Suliman Baldo and Marieke Wierda, 'UN Should Stand Fast of War Crimes Case' http://allafrica.com/stories/200807160870.html

July 18, Inter Press Service, 'ICC Indictment Sparks Hope, Fear' http://allafrica.com/stories/200807190001.html

For a well-informed analysis of the background to the conflict in Darfur, there is no better single source than the book by Alex de Waal and Julie Flint, Darfur: A New History of A Long War. The most recent edition was released by Zed Books in May 2008.

It is available at

Amazon.com

http://tinyurl.com/5odnb6

Amazon.co.uk

http://tinyurl.com/58p5bs

Powell's Books

http://tinyurl.com/5putgy

For an additional selection in the AfricaFocus Bookshop of recent books on the crises in Sudan, see http://www.africafocus.org/books/afbooks.php#sud1 (Amazon USA) or http://www.africafocus.org/books/afbooks_uk.php#sud1 (Amazon UK).

Sudan and the International Criminal Court: a guide to the controversy

Alex de Waal

Return to Top

The Case Against Robert Mugabe [press release]

The Chief Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court sent a chilling message to war criminals around the world last week when he requested an arrest warrant against Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe and his cronies are almost certainly paying close attention. A examines the legal options available to hold Mr. Mugabe and others to account for a laundry list of crimes committed during his nearly three decade rule from the massacre of 20,000 Ndebele civilians in the early 1980s to the continuing post-election crackdown against the political opposition. Justice for Zimbabwe should be approached under the combined efforts of a hybrid international tribunal, or a domestic court with international assistance and support, says David M. Crane, a co-author of the report, Professor at Syracuse University College of Law, and former founding Chief Prosecutor of The Special Court for Sierra Leone. The longer Mr. Mugabe abuses the power of the state and thwarts the legitimate and democratic will of the people of Zimbabwe to express their rights, the more the question of accountability gains traction, says ENOUGH Executive Director John Norris. The question of justice in Zimbabwe should ultimately be a question of when, not if. The Impunity Watch Mission is to monitor and address horrific human rights abuses and possible situations of impunity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ENOUGH is a project of the Center for American Progress to end genocide and crimes against humanity. To learn more, go to www.enoughproject.org

Return to Top

The Case Against Robert Mugabe [press release]

A report released jointly today by the ENOUGH Project and Impunity Watch examines the legal options available to hold Mr. Mugabe and others to account for a laundry list of crimes committed during his nearly three decade rule - from the massacre of 20,000 Ndebele civilians in the early 1980s to the continuing post-election crackdown against the political opposition. 'Justice for Zimbabwe should be approached under the combined efforts of a hybrid international tribunal, or a domestic court with international assistance and support,' says David M. Crane, a co-author of the report, Professor at Syracuse University College of Law, and former founding Chief Prosecutor of The Special Court for Sierra Leone. 'The longer Mr. Mugabe abuses the power of the state and thwarts the legitimate and democratic will of the people of Zimbabwe to express their rights, the more the question of accountability gains traction,' says ENOUGH Executive Director John Norris. 'The question of justice in Zimbabwe should ultimately be a question of when, not if.' Click here to read the full report

The Impunity Watch Mission is to monitor and address horrific human rights abuses and possible situations of impunity.

ENOUGH is a project of the Center for American Progress to end genocide and crimes against humanity. To learn more, go to www.enoughproject.org

Return to Top

At the Border, Your Laptop Is Wide-Open

Hearing (statement of Peter P. Swire, senior fellow, Center for American Progress Action Fund and professor of law, Ohio State University Moritz College of ...

Return to Top

Elizabeth Edwards To Be Keynote Speaker For Central Ohio Higher ...

Columbus, OH (PRWEB) July 22, 2008 -- Elizabeth Edwards will visit Central Ohio this October for Ohio Dominican University's Presidential Lecture Series. Elizabeth Edwards is a Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress and wife of former U.S. Senator and presidential candidate John Edwards.

"We are thrilled to welcome Elizabeth Edwards to Central Ohio and to our Institution," said Bishop James A. Griffin, Interim President of Ohio Dominican University. "Ohio Dominican University celebrates Mrs. Edwards' commitment to serving her country and we encourage all to join us at the lecture series."

Elizabeth Edwards shares her husband's deep commitment to improving the daily lives of all Americans and making sure that everyone in this country has the opportunity to succeed. A passionate advocate for children and families and an accomplished attorney and author, she has been a tireless advocate on behalf of many important social causes.

Americans were first introduced to Elizabeth Edwards as she campaigned extensively across the country during her husband's vice presidential and presidential campaigns. The day after the general election in 2004, she was diagnosed with breast cancer. She was in remission until March 2007, when she discovered the cancer had returned. She and her husband made the decision to continue on with the campaign and she kept an active schedule of campaign activities. Her courageous battle with breast cancer has served as an inspiration to women across the country.

Mrs. Edwards recently joined The Center for American Progress as a Senior Fellow. The Center is a think tank dedicated to improving the lives of Americans through ideas and action. In her new role, Mrs. Edwards works on behalf of healthcare issues and writes for the Wonk Room, The Center for American Progress Action Fund's newly launched rapid-response blog.

Elizabeth Edwards is also active in community service; the Wade Edwards Foundation, a foundation started by the Edwards family after their first child, Wade, passed away; a variety of charitable efforts, including fundraising for the March of Dimes, and serving on the UNC Board of Visitors and Books for Kids.

Ohio Dominican University's Presidential Lecture Series was created seven years ago to highlight the Central Ohio Institution's commitment to the arts, education and politics, and to provide the Ohio Dominican and Greater Columbus communities with the opportunity to hear leaders from a variety of fields who have been widely recognized for their contributions.

The series underscores the Ohio Dominican motto: To contemplate truth and share with others the fruits of this contemplation. These lectures are not intended to be an endorsement of any particular speaker or his or her views, but rather, are intended to provide insight into the prevalent social issues of our day.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Return to Top

Bin Laden driver on trial at Guantanamo

The first war crimes trial at Guantanamo Bay has started. Salim Hamdan - who was Osama bin Laden's driver - has pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and supporting terrorism. The judge has barred some of the evidence, as it was gained during interrogation of the defendant when he was held at U.S. bases in Afghanistan.

High-level people like Khalil Sheikh Mohammed - one of the reported masterminds behind the attack on the World Trade Center - might be called to testify in Hamdan's case. But it's not clear whether his testimony will even count as everything he says is considered classified information.

Ken Gude from the American Progress International Rights and Responsibilities Program says the outcome of the trial is a foregone conclusion: "The judges have probably already decided Hamdan is guilty", he said. "So this won't be a real trial, more like a demonstration rather than a trial".

The opening trial comes amid rising pressure against the U.S. administration over the reported torture of prisoners. A video was recently released showing Canadian officials questioning Omar Khadr - the youngest detainee at Guantanamo and a Canadian citizen. The 21-year-old appears to be in a poor psychological state which critics say is the result of mistreatment by U.S. officials in the days leading up to the interrogation. They say he was deprived of sleep, and moved from one cell to another every two hours.

The debate about Guantanamo has also featured in the presidential race. Both Democrat Barack Obama and Republican John McCain have vowed to shut down the prison.

The days of the prison camp at Guantanamo Bay may be numbered. But many issues still remain. Experts say the biggest challenge for the next administration will be what to do with the detainees who won't be tried. And Guantanmo is likely to remain the focus of international criticism over Washington's handling of the war on terror.

Return to Top

How the next president can improve Homeland Security

Given terrorist attacks associated with recent political transitions in Spain, Britain and Pakistan, it is possible that someone inspired by al Qaeda will make another attempt in the United States over the next 18 months. While Sen. Barack Obama discussed the intersection of terrorism and technology earlier this week in Indiana, homeland security has not been a significant campaign issue thus far. But since terrorism could present the next president with his first crisis, there are a number of steps the next president should take, beginning literally the day after the election.

The most obvious is to oversee an effective transition. Immediately after the election, the president-elect's homeland security team should be rapidly vetted, granted security clearances and receive extensive in-briefings- in short, form a shadow government. To its credit, the Bush administration has already laid the groundwork for this. Congress must rapidly confirm key leaders beginning on Inauguration Day. Everyone involved should take politics out of homeland security, a step that is long overdue.

Once in office, the next president should urgently increase federal support to state and local authorities. The best weapon we have to stop the next terrorist attack is less the soldier in Baghdad than the proverbial cop on the beat. Our military is stretched thin, but so are the police. As one example, New York City has 5,000 fewer police on its streets today than on 9/11. Better intelligence, information-sharing and technology can make police more productive, but with growing budget deficits, cities and states will be hard pressed simply to maintain the capabilities we have now.

Rather than cutting grant funding to cities and states as the Bush administration has attempted to do in its last two budgets, the next president must increase funding for community policing and emergency response to help communities cope with higher operating costs and new requirements.

During his first year in office, he should beef up defenses in specific risk areas such as aviation and chemical security. We can anticipate what terrorists might do from what they have already done. Aviation remains a favorite target. Since suicide hijackings have been made more difficult due to improved security at airports, the greater threat now is smuggling bombs on planes. While all passengers and luggage are physically inspected, this is not the case with air cargo that can travel on the same aircraft. Cargo data is screened, but only some of the cargo is inspected. Much more can be.

Insurgents in Iraq have tried to convert chlorine gas tanker trucks into improvised weapons. The District recognized this danger immediately after Sept. 11 and converted its Blue Plains wastewater treatment facility from chlorine gas, which can be exploited by terrorists, to liquid bleach, which cannot. While the Bush administration opposes the concept, the next administration should support new legislation that would push chemical facilities to operate in ways that are more terror-proof.

Not only should there be stronger private sector security standards, but the Department of Homeland Security must have resources to do the job we expect of it. Right now, only 430 agents are dedicated to air cargo and roughly 100 to chemical security. We don't need an army to improve homeland security, but in key areas we need more than the posse we have now.

Finally, he should redefine what we mean by homeland security and develop a new strategy. The new administration should use the development of a first-ever Quadrennial Homeland Security Review, mandated by Congress and due at the end of 2009, to evaluate the current state of homeland security, re-evaluate risks to our society and establish clear missions and priorities that will attract broad-based support. Even as we try to prevent another terrorism attack, we must also prepare for natural disasters like Hurricane Katrina and pandemics, while protecting critical networks and infrastructure from global system disruptions. He needs to find the right balance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He must put terrorism back in perspective. It is a real risk, but not an existential threat. We underestimated the danger posed by Osama bin Laden before 9/11; we have inflated it since. Terrorists win when governments overreact, and this is exactly what we've done. We have occupied Iraq (despite no link to 9/11), the cost of which this year alone will exceed the economic impact of 9/11. We have reorganized our government multiple times. We are a nation of immigrants, but we are less welcoming than we once were. We are a nation of laws, but we have jailed American citizens indefinitely without due process.

We are better than this. The next president can show us how to be safe without compromising our liberties and values. He can help us be better prepared without being afraid. He can build secure borders that are still open to the world. He can make homeland security a priority rather than a political prop.

P.J. Crowley is a senior fellow and director of homeland security at the Center for American Progress.

Return to Top

Late Breaks: Janet and Justin, Vindicated

-Griffin may be biased, but at least his network hasn't misspelled "education" in a segment about...education. [Think Progress]

Return to Top

What's next for the netroots?

This past weekend, more than 2,000 progressive bloggers, journalists, activists and concerned citizens gathered in Austin, Texas for the third annual Netroots Nation conference, formerly known as YearlyKos.

The first convention in 2006 was about crashing the gates. New media was a force to be reckoned with, and the establishment wasn't quite sure how to react. Bloggers were a novelty, and journalists came to figure out the fuss over all the typing, clicking and webcasting. The New York Sun wrote: "Could these laptop-strewn hotel hallways be the 21st-century equivalent of the smoke-filled rooms of yesteryear?" The New York Times reported: "The YearlyKos convention is giving bloggers a three-dimensional presence where they are seen and heard here, sometimes in unison, as well as read online." Time magazine was surprised that the "crowd is older and more professional than coverage of the blogosphere might lead one to expect."

Last year, the netroots descended upon the convention in Chicago as a powerful movement. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer concluded that "these are serious people intent on taking back their country." Seven of the eight Democratic presidential candidates travelled to YearlyKos to participate in a forum discussion, which, according to the Washington Post, "helped cement the bloggers as an increasingly significant constituency inside the party." The netroots were excited about the new progressives in Congress and their role in pushing the movement forward.

This year, the mood was a bit more muddled. Attendees seemed hopeful that the country's climate was more progressive but were already wondering how to remain engaged and strong outside of the election process. After all, Barack Obama didn't even attend the conference this year. (Although a taped message from him did play during the final keynote session.) Where the netroots were banging down the door this year was on accountability.

Whether Obama or John McCain wins in November, these activists will be pushing the new president - and Congress - to hold the Bush administration responsible for its past misdeeds. One of the highlights of the conference was a speech by former Democratic Alabama governor Don Siegelman, who has charged the Bush administration with pushing his prosecution for political purposes. His appearance had to be sanctioned by the court while he appeals his corruption conviction. Speaking with the Nation, Siegelman urged activists to pressure Congress to hold Karl Rove in contempt for defying a subpoena related to the investigation into his case.

Attendees were clearly frustrated and worried that nothing will be done on Siegelman or any other issue. "We could have 10 political conventions, or 20, and the end result would be the same," wrote Hunter, a popular blogger on DailyKos. "We are the fools, the idealists. We know full well that there are two sets of laws, one for the powerful and one for the citizenry, and yet we take the asinine position that perhaps that should not be the case."

One of the first questions posed to House speaker Nancy Pelosi during the Ask the Speaker session on Saturday morning was whether, if Rove is found in contempt of Congress, he would be placed "in that little jail cell that's in the basement of the House." Pelosi expressed support for the efforts of House judiciary committee chairman John Conyers, who is aggressively investigating Rove's politicisation. Some people occasionally shouted out for the impeachment of the president. The day before, Democratic Leadership Council chairman Harold Ford angered the crowd when he said that telecommunication firms should not be punished for participating in the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping programme. Displeased, audience members repeatedly demanded "accountability".

While a few journalists from mainstream national publications showed up to the conference this year, the media circus was far more subdued than in the past - likely due to the lack of novelty and also the lack of presidential candidates. That's too bad, because journalists are a key part of the accountability equation. At a Saturday afternoon panel called The War Pundits, Greg Mitchell of Editor and Publisher magazine raised the media's role in promoting the Iraq war. "As bad as the pundits were before the war," said Mitchell, "it's amazing how little accountability there has been." On Friday, the panellists Rick Perlstein, Digby, Paul Krugman, and Duncan Black noted that the media has internalised the right-wing criticism that they are too liberal, and consequently "bend over backward to please the right."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's clear, however, that even some politicians and "establishment" figures are ready to start crashing down the gates. After all, no one received a warmer welcome than former vice-president Al Gore, whose surprise appearance on Saturday morning received a loud, sustained standing ovation. Speaking about the excitement of Netroots Nation, Gore also managed to sum up the purpose driving so many of this year's attendees: "You will tell them that this was the beginning of an effort that was the start to reclaim the integrity of American democracy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Genevieve Thaler" <gthaler@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	nhstaff <nhstaff@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	11/29/2007 7:48:58 AM
Subject:	NH CLIPS 11/29/07 PM
Attachments:	NH CLIPS 11-29-07 PM.doc

NH CLIPS 11/29/07 PM

HRC
Robert F. Kennedy Jr. Endorses Clinton—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/robert-f-kennedy-jr-endorses-clinton.html

Hillary Clinton's Remarks Today on Health Care—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/hillary-clintons-remarks-today-on-health-care.html

NH for Hillary to Hold Women's Summit Saturday, December 1—NH Insider, 11/29/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/nh-for-hillary-to-hold-womens-summit-saturday-december-1.html

Clinton, Romney snag big name backers—Political Intelligence, 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/clinton_romney_3.html

Clinton goes populist in new Iowa ad—Political Intelligence, 11/28/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/clinton_goes_po.html

Clinton goes on offensive on health care—Political Intelligence, 11/29/07 http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/clinton_goes_on.html

OP ED: Memo to CNN: It's called Google- Boston Herald 11/29/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/blogs/news/presidential_briefing/

Clinton picks up endorsement from Robert Kennedy Jr.- Boston Herald (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/2008/view.bg?articleid=1047836

A life pushing for change- Keene Sentinel 11/29/07
http://www.sentinelsource.com/main.asp?SectionID=31&SubSectionID=37&ArticleID=171383

PHOTO: At the interview- Keene Sentinel 11/29/07
http://www.nhelects.com/

Personal profile: The origins on Democrat Hillary Clinton's inclination to advocacy- Keene Sentinel 11/29/07
http://www.nhelects.com/NHPrimaryArticles.asp?LinkID=91&HTitle=ArticlesTitle

Hillary: "Back to the future"? - Manchester Express (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

RFK Jr. endorses Hillary Clinton- WCVB 11/29/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14727043/detail.html

RFK Jr. endorses Hillary Clinton- WMUR 11/29/07
http://www.wmur.com/politics/14727043/detail.html

RFK Jr. endorses Hillary Clinton- WPTZ 11/29/07
http://www.wptz.com/politics/14727043/detail.html

Clinton on the moral twists of Iraq- NHPR 11/29/07
http://www.nhpr.org/node/14173

DEMOCRATS
EDITORIAL: How close is it among Democrats- Fosters Daily Democrat 11/29/07
http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/GJOPINION_01/711290005/-1/FOSOPINION

Democrats nix debate, cite writer's strike- WCVB 11/29/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14726519/detail.html

EDWARDS
Edwards Video Asked For Weekend Volunteers—NH Presidential Watch, 11/29/07 http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/edwards-video-asked-for-weekend.html

Edwards Campaign Asking Voters to Reclaim America by Signing "America Belongs to Us" Pledge—NH Insider, 11/29/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/edwards-campaign-asking-voters-to-reclaim-america-by-signing.html

BIDEN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Biden: Oil prices cost of Bush failures- Boston Herald (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/2008/view.bg?articleid=1047842

Biden: Oil prices cost of Bush failures- Concord Monitor (AP) 11/29/07
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/N/NH_BIDEN_OIL_PRICES_NHOL-?SITE=NHCON&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Locals set to question Sen. Biden on Iraq- Portsmouth Herald 11/29/07
http://www.seacoastonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS/711290420/-1/NEWS09&sfad=1

EDITORIAL: Biden visit comes at critical time- Portsmouth Herald 11/29/07
http://www.seacoastonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/OPINION/711290388/-1/NEWS09&sfad=1

Biden offers advice to Israeli prime minister- Fosters Daily Democrat (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.fosters.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS0201/71129004

Biden: Oil prices cost of Bush failures- WMUR (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.wmur.com/politics/14726162/detail.html

KUCINICH
Kucinich is the Man: An op-ed piece—Blue Hampshire, 11/28/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2527

Kucinich pushes to get troops out of Iraq- Nashua Telegraph 11/29/07 http://www.nashuatelegraph.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS08/311290098

GOP
Reaction to debate? Share thoughts below—Below Boston, 11/28/07
http://www.soapblox.net/belowboston/showDiary.do?diaryId=1316

Republican youtube debate tonight @8 on CNN; too late to ask Rudy about billing NYC for trysts—Below Boston, 11/28/07
http://www.soapblox.net/belowboston/showDiary.do?diaryId=1315

The Republican Debate: Entertainment On A Quiet Wednesday Evening—Blue Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2529

Thoughts on leaving - which Republicans should?—Granite Grok, 11/28/07 http://granitegrok.com/blog/2007/11/thoughts_on_leaving_which_republicans_sh.html

Blogging at – YouTube? Huh?—Granite Grok, 11/28/07
http://granitegrok.com/blog/2007/11/blogging_at_youtube_huh.html

Torture—Green Mountain Politics, 11/29/07
http://greenmountainpolitics1.blogspot.com/2007/11/torture.html

NH GOP – Help Find Carol Shea-Porter a New Job—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/nh-gop-help-find-carol-shea-porter-a-new-job.html

YOUTUBE STATEMENT: Senator Judd Gregg—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/youtube-statement-senator-judd-gregg.html

Republican debate reaction—Primary Monitor Blog, 11/28/07
http://www.yourconcord.com/primaryblog/republican_debate_reaction

The ATR pledge is not to ATR!—Rob Boyce Blog, 11/29/07
http://robboyce.com/blog/2007/11/28/the-atr-pledge-is-not-to-atr/

Republicans host fight night at debate- Boston Globe (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/massachusetts/articles/2007/11/29/analysis_republicans_tear_down_one_another_with_race_wide_open/

OP ED: Who won the Republican showdown last night- Boston Herald 11/29/07 http://falcon.heraldinteractive.com/blogs/news/lone_republican/

Two GOP debates in final weekend- Union Leader (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Two+GOP+debates+in+final+NH+weekend%3f&articleId=0b6c63c8-c8df-41cd-be9f-9da38226ce64

ABC, Fox News Channel planning competing GOP debates- Concord Monitor (AP) 11/29/07
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/N/NH_COMPETING_DEBATES_NHOL-?SITE=NHCON&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Republicans on the attack- Portsmouth Herald (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.seacoastonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS/711290421/-1/NEWS09&sfad=1

An Editorial: Republicans Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani trade blows over budgets and health care- Keene Sentinel 11/29/07
http://www.nhelects.com/NHPrimaryArticles.asp?LinkID=93&HTitle=ArticlesTitle

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VIDEO: GOP presidential hopefuls take on YouTube- NECN 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/partners/worldnow/necn.html?catID=80780&clipid=1970706&autoStart=true&mute=false&continuous=true

Debate reaction: undecided Republicans weigh in- WCVB (CNN) 11/29/07
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2007/11/29/debate-reaction-undecided-republican-voters-weigh-in/?eref=ib_politicalticker

Thompson, Romney criticize Confederate flag- WCVB (CNN) 11/29/07
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2007/11/29/romney-thompson-criticize-confederate-flag/?eref=ib_politicalticker

ROMNEY
Hey Bid Spender—NH Presidential Watch, 11/28/07
http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/hey-big-spender.html

GOP Group To Air Ad on Romney's Abortion Stance—NH Presidential Watch, 11/28/07 http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/gop-group-to-air-ad-on-romneys-abortion.html

ROMNEY RECORD: Strengthening American Families—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/romney-record-strengthening-american-families.html

ROMNEY RECORD: A Pro-Life Record—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/romney-record-a-pro-life-record.html

ROMNEY RECORD: Enforcing Our Immigration Laws—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/romney-record-enforcing-our-immigration-laws.html

ROMNEY RECORD: Fiscal Responsibility In Washington—NH Insider, 11/29/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/romney-record-fiscal-responsibility-in-washington.html

Romney reviews testy GOP debate—Political Intelligence, 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/romney_reviews.html

GOP group to slam Romney on abortion—Political Intelligence, 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/_a_republican_g.html

Clinton, Romney snag big name backers—Political Intelligence, 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/clinton_romney_3.html

Romney touts his values and experience in new ad- Concord Monitor 11/29/07
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/N/NH_ROMNEY_ADWATCH_NHOL-?SITE=NHCON&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Romney called flip-flopper- Manchester Express (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

GOP abortion rights group chides Romney- WCVB 11/29/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14726273/detail.html

GIULIANI
Will Giuliani adultery story change the race?—Blue Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2525

Giuliani Fairness Question, with Poll—Blue Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2526

Giuliani billed questionable expenses, website says—Political Intelligence, 11/28/07 http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/giuliani_billed.html

In new TV ad Giuliani keeps aim at Romney indirectly by focusing on taxes, Dems- Primary Source 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/politics/primarysource/

Giuliani dismisses report on questionable expenses- Boston Herald (AP) 11/29/07 http://www.bostonherald.com/news/national/politics/2008/view.bg?articleid=1047844

Rudy on the screen and off- Party Line Blog 11/29/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

Giuliani goes on offense- Manchester Express (AP) 11/29/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

Giuliani dismisses claim he hid costs of affair- WBZTV 11/29/07
http://wbztv.com/politics/politicsnational_story_333090059.html

Giuliani dismisses affair bailing charge- WCVB 11/29/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14726402/detail.html

Giuliani takes aim at 'hit job' by paper- WCVB (CNN) 11/29/07

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2007/11/29/giuliani-takes-aim-at-hit-job-by-paper/?eref=ib_politicalticker

Giuliani says Dems will raise taxes in new ad- WCVB (CNN) 11/29/07
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2007/11/29/giuliani-says-dems-will-raise-taxes-in-new-ad/?eref=ib_politicalticker

McCAIN
McCain Blogger Conference Call—Granite Grok, 11/29/07
http://granitegrok.com/blog/2007/11/mccain_blogger_conference_call.html

Graham: McCain needs to win NH to stay in race- Nashua Telegraph 11/29/07 http://www.nashuatelegraph.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS08/311290075/-1/news08

THOMPSON
Thompson goes after GOP rivals- Political Intelligence 11/29/07 http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/thompson_goes_a.html

HUCKABEE
Huckabee Recieves Key Endorsement from Florida Senate Majority Leader Daniel Webster—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/huckabee-receives-key-endorsement-from-florida-senate-majori.html

Huckabee Campaign – 1st Place In Iowa—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/huckabee-campaign-1st-place-in-iowa.html

Debate reaction to Huckabee—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/11/debate_reaction.html

Begging for a new tax?—Primary Monitor Blog, 11/29/07 http://www.yourconcord.com/primaryblog/republican_debate_reaction#comment-13

PAUL
Candidate with largest online "cult following": Ron Paul talks green—Democracy for New Hampshire, 11/29/07 http://www.democracyfornewhampshire.com/node/view/5110

TANCREDO
Tancredo announce NH co-chairs online- Primary Source 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/politics/primarysource/

THE FIELD
Edwards Wins REPUBLICAN CNN Debate – have a laugh—Blue Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2533

Governor Dean's Question—Democratic National Committee Blog, 11/28/07
http://www.democrats.org/a/2007/11/gov_deans_quest.php

Don't Be Anti-Social—NH Political Capital, 11/28/07
http://www.nhpoliticalcapital.com/readblobstory.php?id=162

Are You Experienced?—NH Political Capital, 11/27/07
http://www.nhpoliticalcapital.com/readblobstory.php?id=159

NH today, Nov. 29- Primary Source 11/29/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/politics/primarysource/

New Hampshire political candidates get help from presidential candidates- Keene Sentinel 11/29/07
http://www.nhelects.com/NHPrimaryArticles.asp?LinkID=92&HTitle=ArticlesTitle

Political cartoonist organizes presidential art exhibit- Manchester Express 11/29/07 http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

NH ISSUES
Open Thread: We can talk about it now—Blue Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2532

Granny D: "Love is the only truth that can save us from lies and from anger and sad living"—Democracy for New Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.democracyfornewhampshire.com/node/view/5112

News from truthout.org—Democracy for New Hampshire, 11/29/07
http://www.democracyfornewhampshire.com/node/view/5111

Obama, Romney Win Mock Primary—NH Presidential Watch, 11/29/07
http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/obama-romney-win-mock-primary.html

1, 2, 3, 4…Lets Count The Days Until The Primary—NH Presidential Watch, 11/28/07
http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/1234lets-count-days-until-primary.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Poll: Romney, Clinton Maintain Double Digit Leads—NH Presidential Watch, 11/28/07 http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/11/poll-romney-clinton-maintain-double.html

Suffolk – WHDH Poll: Clinton up 12, Giuliani still in second to Romney—NH Insider, 11/29/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/suffulk-whdh-poll-clinton-up-12-giuliani-still-in-second-to.html

Docu-drama about global nuclear threat to be shown at Manchester Public Library—NH Insider, 11/29/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/11/29/docu-drama-about-global-nuclear-threat-to-be-shown-at-manche.html

Civil Unions soon ok in Granite State- Portsmouth Herald 11/29/07
http://www.seacoastonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071129/NEWS/711290416

Contributions to Hillary Clinton for President are not deductible for federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Walker, Darren" <D.Walker@fordfoundation.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 5/26/2015 4:47:29 PM
Subject: Latest India Media Coverage

Deccan Chronicle reports that Ford Foundation wrote last week to Union Home Secretary, LC Goyal, to seek clarification on its operations. According to the report, the MHA has met with Ford Foundation officials and "assured Ford Foundation that the NGO can be removed from the prior-approval category if the organisation receives the 'all clear' following the scrutiny."

Additionally, today Press Trust of India reports that the Union government defended its decision to cancel the foreign contribution registration of Greenpeace India before the Delhi High Court, saying the NGO had violated the norms by opening five accounts to utilize foreign donations without informing the relevant authorities. Several mainstream media outlets report on this development. There also is continued media coverage of PM Modi's first year in office.

NGOs
The Wall Street Journal covers a draft Chinese law that "treats the entire sector of foreign nonprofits enemies of the state, placing them under the management of the Ministry of Public Affairs." The article mentions that "China isn't alone in stepping up pressure on nonprofits" and highlights India's recent scrutiny of Ford Foundation's finances and its decision to freeze the bank accounts of Greenpeace India.

Modi government
A number of articles and op-eds mention Ford Foundation or Teesta Setalvad in reference to the Indian government's actions against NGOs during Modi's first year in office. Associated Press reports that, despite Modi's "lofty promises of a new pristine world," it is a "mystery how Modi plans to get there." The article highlights that "past governments have opened debate to communities and activists, however, Modi's government has cracked on groups such as Ford Foundation, Greenpeace and Action Aid." An analysis by The Economist's South East Asia bureau chief Adam Roberts, writing in Business Standard , calls Modi's record "mixed" and cites his impressive speeches on various issues with follow up that "has been less convincing." The Economic Times looks at Modi's "battles with legal establishments" during his first year in government and mentions the actions against Teesta Setalvad and Greenpeace India. Kashmir Times also analyzes Modi's first year in government and mentions that the "entire might of the state" was brought against secular campaigners like Teesta Setalvad and Javed Anand on "trumped-up charges because they are trying to bring the culprit of Gujarat-2002 to justice."

Greenpeace India
A number of articles report that the Union government today defended its decision to cancel the foreign contribution registration of Greenpeace India before the Delhi High Court. Press Trust of India reports the MHA charged Greenpeace with violating FCRA by merging its foreign donations with domestic contributions. According to the article, the government affidavit said, "it was found that petitioner (Greenpeace) receives huge amount of foreign contribution running into crores of rupees which is though deposited in FCRA account, is diverted to such other utilisation accounts in which foreign contribution has been merged with domestic receipts contrary to the Act". The Solicitor General also claimed that the NGO was not using the donations for the purpose they were received. Greenpeace said it has lost donations to the extent of Rs 1.25 crore by its Indian contributors due to freeze on its domestic accounts.

Social media activity remains light. Please find a sampling of newly posted tweets below which mention Ford Foundation and Greenpeace.

Articles
Ford Foundation
Deccan Chronicle: MHA allays Ford Foundation's concerns , May 26, 2015

NGOs
The Wall Street Journal: Enemies of the State: Beijing Targets NGOs , May 26, 2015

Modi government
Business Standard: Adam Roberts: Modi govt's mixed record in first year , May 26, 2015
Open Democracy: When internationalization causes more harm than good , May 26, 2015
Newser: After Modi vows cleaner India, critics says gov't is laying ground for assault on environment , May 26, 2015
The Economic Times: How PM Narendra Modi's battles with legal establishment played out in first year , May 26, 2015

Kashmir Times: Modi's disastrous first year , May 26, 2015

Greenpeace India
Jagran Post: Greenpeace opened accounts for foreign donations without informing authorities: Centre to HC , May 26, 2015
First Post India: Centre defends cancellation of FCRA registration of Greenpeace before HC , May 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hindu: Greenpeace violated FCRA: Centre tells Delhi HC , May 26, 2015
Outlook: Centre Defends Cancellation of FCRA Registration of Greenpeace , May 26, 2015
Al Jazeera: India cracks down on Greenpeace and foreign NGOs , May 26, 2015

--

Social media

New Tweets

दुष्यंत @dushyantkh – 6 retweets, 5 favorites crack down of ford foundation funded NGOs is one of the decisive factor for development of india and social harmony #SaalEkShuruaatAnek

May 26, 2015 - https://twitter.com/dushyantkh/statuses/603102940019036161

Narinder Singh @singhns – 0 retweets, 0 favorites
India (Modi) has placed the Ford Foundation on a national security watch list<9K NGOs have had registration canceled http://t.co/dadFcpWrDa

May 26, 2015 - https://twitter.com/singhns/statuses/603177402911617024

Jatin Anand @JatinPaul – 33 retweets, 14 favorites
A day was soon come when states across #India will rise against central interference; another independence day: Bhavna Gaur @the_hindu

- Sushil Kumar @SushiGsl – 0 retweet, 0 favorites
  @JatinPaul @TheHindu @the_hindu Preparing for balkanisation of country named India under pressure of Agencies like FORD Green Peace so on

  May 26, 2015 - https://twitter.com/SushilGsl/statuses/603158354848915456

Prasanna @flyfiddlesticks – 0 retweet, 0 favorites @mariawirth1 did it not find Pakistani voices to substitute for Indians ? Al Jazeera is famous for that.

- Maria wirth @mariawirth1 - 0 retweets, 0 favorites
  @Flyfiddlesticks they found an Indian interviewee who batted for Greenpeace & Ford Found. He even said, court will rule in favor of GP

  May 26, 2015 - https://twitter.com/mariawirth1/statuses/603145462149881857

--

MHA allays Ford Foundation's concerns
Namrata Biji Ahuja
Deccan Chronicle
May 26, 2015
http://www.deccanchronicle.com/150526/nation-current-affairs/article/mha-allays-ford-foundation%E2%80%99s-concerns

New Delhi: The US-based Ford Foundation has approached the Union home ministry by writing to Union home secretary L.C. Goyal seeking a clarification on whether the NGO can "continue its operations normally'' in the country, "including releasing pending grants and payments to organisations where they have received a no-objection from the department of economic affairs.''

Soon after the Ford Foundation shot off a letter to the MHA last week, the top MHA brass has met the officials of the US- based NGO allaying its concerns and explaining the government's move to put the organisation in its prior-approval category, citing national security concerns. The MHA has assured Ford Foundation that the NGO can be removed from the prior-approval category. if the organisation is "all clear'' following the scrutiny.

It may be noted that the MHA move to put Ford Foundation on its watch-list came after the Gujarat government alleged that the organisation was "abetting communal disharmony" through Teesta Setalvad's NGO.

Enemies of the State: Beijing Targets NGOs
The Wall Street Journal
Andrew Browne
May 26, 2015
http://www.wsj.com/articles/enemies-of-the-state-beijing-targets-ngos-1432622054

SHANGHAI—It takes a special kind of courage to run a foreign nonprofit in China these days.

And not just because of the challenge of dispensing humanitarian services across such a vast country, everything from HIV/AIDS awareness campaigns to environmental clean-ups and care for orphans. Regulations are so onerous it's virtually impossible for many civic groups to operate legally.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, thousands persist, often counting on sympathetic local police and officials to turn a blind eye to infractions.

That kind of indulgence may soon be ending. A Chinese draft law treats the entire sector of foreign nonprofits as potential enemies of the state, placing them under the management of the Ministry of Public Security.

To drive home the point, the law is being readied as part of a package of legislation that also includes a national-security law and an antiterrorism law—and it contains similar language, according to Western legal experts who have studied the texts.

Beijing's message is clear, says the director of one children's-education group: "We're not welcome anymore."

"It's insulting," she adds, asking not to be identified.

China isn't alone in stepping up pressure on nonprofits. In Cambodia, nonprofits are alarmed by a proposed law that makes connections between NGO funding and money-laundering. Indian authorities have been scrutinizing the finances of the Ford Foundation and have frozen the bank accounts of Greenpeace's Indian arm.

There's a long history of suspicion about Westerners and their civic works in China: The missionaries who flooded in during the 19th century did so under the protection of gunboats and "unequal treaties" that pried open the country against its will. Chinese authorities today cast nonprofits as agents of a new kind of imperialism seeking to undermine Communist ideology. Lurking at the back of their minds are memories of covert CIA activities in Tibet during the Cold War aimed at destabilizing the regime.

Critics say the new law reflects a gathering sense of siege within the administration of President Xi Jinping.

Increasingly, they say, views of America and the West within the leadership are darkening, driven by fears that what state media calls "hostile foreign forces" are infiltrating the country. During last year's "Umbrella Revolution" in Hong Kong, a Chinese general accused foreigners of whipping up the student unrest, while the nationalist-leaning Global Times railed against "black hands" from abroad.

Undoubtedly, the undercover operations of a few politically motivated nonprofits in China has complicated life for the vast majority offering philanthropic assistance.

Foreign nonprofits are widely viewed as a bridgehead for subversion. Intensely suspicious of any networked activity it doesn't directly control, the government is especially wary of the grants they scatter that have allowed the domestic NGO sector to flourish.

In a preamble, the draft law says its aim is to protect the "rights and interests" of foreign NGOs while "promoting exchange and cooperation."

But it piles on new layers of bureaucracy. Nonprofits will have to pay tax and hire Chinese accountants to conduct regular audits. They'll have to go through approved agencies to hire staff and recruit volunteers. To enforce compliance, police will have unchallenged rights to enter offices, seize documents and inspect bank accounts.

The upshot is that smaller operations may have to pack up and leave, say nonprofit workers. Already, individuals have been forced out. Among them was British national Tim Millar who was working to improve legal protections for the disabled. He had to go after police caught him on a visa technicality.

In a U.S.-China relationship marked by constant frictions, people-to-people exchanges have helped keep overall ties on an even keel. What's deeply troubling to Western legal experts is the law's sweeping definition of NGOs—all groups operating outside the scope of government and commerce. This will bring under police watch not just traditional nonprofits but also the activities of foreign colleges and their alumni clubs, sports and artistic bodies and professional associations.

Theoretically, notes Carl Minzner, a professor at New York's Fordham Law School, it could even complicate trips to China by American high-school marching bands. That's because even the most innocuous NGO activity will require a Chinese sponsor. Since NGOs are being treated as potential security threats, that won't be easy.

"This could wreak serious collateral damage on U.S.-China ties," warns Mr. Minzner.

Some critics believe that the new law reflects a more general anti-Western bias within the leadership.

Fiercely cracking down on advocates of so-called Western values, including human-rights lawyers, academics and bloggers, Mr. Xi is reaching into China's own Confucian culture, as well as its punitive legal traditions, for solutions to China's social problems. Just last week he warned that religions must be free from foreign influence.

Taking their cue, authorities are tearing down crosses from the rooftops of Christian churches in Zhejiang province, where pastors and their congregations organize social welfare for the neediest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lester Ross, the senior partner at the Beijing offices of law firm WilmerHale calls the draft law "totally egregious," although he's hopeful that if authorities hear enough objections they might roll back some of the harsher provisions before it passes, possibly later this year.

Meanwhile, the director of the children's group is digging in for a long struggle between police and nonprofits, one that could leave a deep mark on Chinese society. She'll stay on, she says, "until they throw me in jail."

Adam Roberts: Modi govt's mixed record in first year
Business Standard
Adam Roberts
May 26, 2015
http://www.business-standard.com/article/current-affairs/opinion-modi-govt-s-mixed-record-in-first-year-115052501066_1.html

You don't have to like everything about Narendra Modi to admire some of what he is trying to do. He campaigned in the 2014 elections mostly by promising to bring "good times". Press him on what that means and he talks of cutting poverty, creating jobs, building roads and getting the economy moving faster. These are welcome goals, though he should be far more ambitious in spelling out the reforms he expects to produce them. On some issues he speaks frankly and well. I have been impressed by his speeches on public hygiene, ending open defecation, generating respect for women and girls and more. His follow-up, however, has been less convincing.

In the year since thousands of us sat in the sunshine at Rashtrapati Bhavan and watched his inauguration, I have roamed about and asked others what they make of him. Recently in Ahmedabad and in Vadnagar, I heard Gujaratis say their former chief minister was behaving in some familiar ways, centralising power in himself, sidelining others who might have made a stronger team. In Kashmir, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh and the Andaman Islands, I sought out those beyond the Hindi heartland. Perhaps unsurprisingly, the fervour for Mr Modi is lower in such places than in the West and North.

In an interview with Chandrababu Naidu, in Hyderabad, I traced parallels between Mr Modi's political fortunes and those of other regional leaders with national interests. In Varanasi, I listened to Mr Modi's constituents grumble that their MP had so far brought no noticeable changes there: The river Ganges was no cleaner; there was no sign there of "achhe din". Small businessmen and farmers are notably glum in many places, and routinely told me that they could not believe claims of statisticians that the economy was growing by 7.5 per cent a year. However, in visits to Pakistan, Nepal and Sri Lanka, I have heard foreigners who are impressed: They see renewed confidence, a spring in India's step under Mr Modi.

During 70-odd interviews for a just-completed special report on India, published in The Economist on May 23, I interviewed senior figures in politics, business and the bureaucracy. By and large people are yet willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, believing he could come right on the economy if only domestic investment picks up again. But there is also general disappointment that two Budgets have brought only half-hearted economic reforms. It is troubling that the one really big change expected - the Goods and Services Tax - looks stuck in Parliament.

Maybe meaningful devolution of spending power to states could spread more confidence on the ground. But I doubt Mr Modi has yet done anything close to enough to count as a transformative figure on the economy. He is not obviously yet a liberaliser who believes in a smaller state, though he might be a moderniser who wants a more capable one. He believes technology can improve government, and he wants to shift to cash welfare, not subsidies in kind. Coal auctions were done well. These are welcome. But he has made little effort to open up for the market to do more in India, for example by recapitalising state banks and planning to make them independent of meddling.

With a few exceptions, his team of ministers has disappointed. Spending time with a factory manager in Rajasthan, I was told that nothing new had happened in the past year to make it easier to flourish in business, let alone to hire more people. The finance ministry's mess-up of retrospective and other tax is turning out to be the main flop. Mr Modi should bring in more talent before more time is lost, perhaps from the business world. Arun Shourie's attack that his government is "directionless" was well-placed. Arun Jaitley may be an important minister but it looks increasingly like he runs the wrong ministry.

Many who supported Mr Modi while hoping for a strong economy understood he also had an illiberal, at times intolerant, side. If the economic story is ok but could have been brighter, what about the recent record on social matters? Here Mr Modi is a letdown: He has failed to grab all chances to prove himself a tolerant leader of all Indians. In Kashmir, I heard, to my surprise, that many people were ready to give him a chance to see if he could prove himself as a capable leader. But such tolerance will fade if he fails to clearly disavow Hindu nationalists set on dividing Indians.

Mr Modi should speak out frequently, clearly against religious and other intolerance. Campaigns to "reconvert" non-Hindus to Hinduism, and comments by RSS chief Mohan Bhagwat that all in Hindustan are Hindus, look intended to marginalise or worry non-Hindus. Mr Modi should openly reject such statements. It is not enough to do so in private. He should also have sacked Niranjan Jyoti, his junior minister for food processing, who called non-Hindus "bastards". Not doing so has diminished his own reputation at home and abroad.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Also troubling is his intolerance of non-governmental groups, such as the Ford Foundation and Greenpeace. The US' ambassador to India, Richard Verma, was right to say the current crackdowns on NGOs had "chilling effects" on Indian democracy.

A first year in office should be for building up momentum, setting up a strong team, taking difficult early decisions to bring substantial benefits later. On these scores Mr Modi's record is mixed. In a last area, foreign policy, he has proved energetic and impressive, but that counts for relatively little for most people.

Adam Roberts is based in Delhi, as South Asia bureau chief of The Economist. He tweets as @Arobertsjourno

When internationalization causes more harm than good
Ram Mashru
Open Democracy
May 26, 2015
https://www.opendemocracy.net/openglobalrights/ram-mashru/when-internationalization-causes-more-harm-than-good

Beyond a small club of human rights elites, identifying the organizations that should and could enlist as part of a global movement—sharing organizational identities, voicing consistent messages, and campaigning through the same channels—is difficult. Why? Because internationalization can often do more harm than good, as the example of India's human rights arena makes clear.

The case for making human rights advocacy more representative is undeniable, and three models for doing so have emerged from the discussion so far: decentralization (the shift eastwards and southwards); franchising (the creation of local hubs from the ground up); and partnership (linkages between groups at the domestic and international levels). Each approach offers several benefits, and they lend the experience, resources and reach accrued by INGOs to domestic groundswells of activity.

But the call for a global movement of NGOs by NGOs makes the assumption that linking local and international groups arm in arm is unproblematic. Doing so obscures the enormous diversity of the human rights community when, in fact, this heterogeneity is central. The differences reflect carefully considered choices about identity, strategy and reach on the part of rights groups, and these distinctions make clear that internationalization is not for everyone.

In India the press, official reports and academic literature each list a diverse roll call of organizational types, and this plurality is reflected in the ways rights groups identify themselves. The terms used vary from "community group", "social movement" and "civil-society organization", to "quasi-governmental body", "charity", "research institute" and "grassroots campaign"—to name but a few. These varying labels capture groups championing the full range of causes—from conflict resolution to conservation—and reflect the distinct models, memberships and means of these groups. The process of internationalization, as Johanna Simeant notes, risks burying these differences behind a single organizational logo; a move that would be fatal to the autonomy, independence and freedom of activity that is at the core of many of these outfits.

Internationalization also carries grave risks. "NGO" and "INGO" are categories laden with baggage: in many jurisdictions they are vilified as foreign-interest groups pursuing ideological, financial and professional agendas. However unjust this demonization may be, linking national groups with global movements often exposes local activists to attack. For example, India's government recently cancelled the licences of 8,975 NGOs because of their failure to properly declare funds received from abroad. India has waged a long and bitter war against civil society groups and the increasingly networked operations of the country's NGOs, which have established ties with organizations overseas, has incensed a broad coalition of critics—from cynical corporates to hostile governments—into launching renewed clampdowns.

And internationalization can rarely, if ever, be benign. Partnerships are often asymmetrical trades in which established NGOs buy legitimacy and a local presence in exchange for funds and administrative support. Globalization is not a value-free process; local groups risk having their causes relegated or compromised, and the process may even compromise the effectiveness of large NGOs who risk losing their influence and access to donors by shifting overseas. There is not only a fundamental mismatch between the local needs of domestic groups and the global aspirations of INGOs but, also, the rights arena is both hierarchical and competitive. The process of internationalization could just as much increase these inequalities as reduce them.
Most importantly, however, globalization is an exercise in which power is won and lost. In his article on ActionAid's successful decentralization Adriano Campolina contends that, "giving up power doesn't mean having less power". But, often, this is precisely what is at stake. Links to a local campaign group seeking to indict Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi—for his alleged complicity in riots in 2002 in which thousands of Muslims were killed—culminated in the Ford Foundation, which boasts a long and fruitful philanthropic record in India, being placed on the country's national security watch list.

As laudable as the drive to "go global" is, local rights groups are very often the victims of their circumstances. As Stephen Hopgood rightly highlights, national boundaries can often be hermetic, sealing in the scope and ambitions of rights groups. Internationalization will fail wherever states decide to prevent it and, as the Indian case demonstrates, when doing so governments have numerous tools at their disposal.

Going global is readily presented as an unmitigated good, as a panacea that marks the next phase of human rights advocacy. Indeed it is often cast as an evolutionary process: as inevitable, desirable and necessary for the survival of both local and international groups. This is, no doubt, a compelling and tempting narrative. But, for rights actors, the question becomes one of choosing the right battles, and globalization is, for countless groups, one war too many.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This admission does not set rights advocacy back. Instead, it refocuses attention on an older, alternative strategy: one of attrition, on multiple fronts, mounted at the local, regional and international levels. The rights community should not be too quick to dispense with this. After all, it is an approach that has yielded the impressive gains that we now take for granted. Crucially, reverting to this approach where necessary avoids inflicting the very real harm that comes with assuming that a one-size-fits-all internationalization strategy is the only and ideal one.

After Modi vows cleaner India, critics say gov't is laying ground for assault on environment
Katy Daigle
Associated Press (via Newser)
May 26, 2015
http://www.newser.com/article/ec74be4ffe034c539192454524e090c4/after-modi-vows-cleaner-india-critics-say-govt-is-laying-ground-for-assault-on-environment.html

NEW DELHI (AP) — Four months after becoming prime minister, Narendra Modi stunned Indians by picking up a crude straw broom and, holding it like a dance partner, gently sweeping at a small pile of green leaves on a New Delhi street.

Modi, ever the darling of photo ops and grinning selfies, seemed to be calling for a cultural revolution, defying centuries-old hierarchies that make the idea of an official cleaning a street anathema in Indian society. By leading a new campaign called "Swachh Bharat Abhiyaan" or "Clean India Mission," Modi challenged those divisions while dignifying labor and elevating cleanliness as a nationwide goal.

That was the first and last time the public saw Modi with a broom. As he passes one year in office, India is as filthy as it ever was with some of the world's most polluted air, rivers stinking with sewage and more than half the 1.2 billion population still defecating in the open. Despite lofty promises of a new pristine world filled with smart cities, sparkling waterways, solar panels and toilets for all, it is a mystery how Modi plans to get there.

At the same time, environment experts say, the government is laying the groundwork to dismantle hard-fought laws for protecting the environment. With hundreds of millions mired in poverty, many believe economic growth at any cost is the only thing that matters. The latest budget slashed environment funds by 25 percent, with little outcry. And business leaders have been effusive about Modi's leadership, crediting his constant globe-trotting with boosting investor sentiment and raising India's profile worldwide.

Modi's approach embodies "the idea that like the West we will grow and clean up later," said historian Ramachandra Guha. "But we don't have access to colonies like Europe had," he said. "There is no part of India where no one lives. If you excavate a coal mine, or build a factory on a river, you are depriving someone of land, or clean water, or forests."

India has a long record of making plans that come to nothing. Previous governments also vowed better sanitation, cleaner rivers, renewable energy and various anti-pollution measures.

Modi's promises on the environment include expanding solar power five-fold by 2022, ensuring everyone has access to a toilet by 2019, and cleaning the Ganges river of sewage and pollutants. The sanitation pledge alone requires building 70,000 toilets per day. The country is still 100 million toilets short of its goal while funds for sanitation were halved in the last budget.

Environmentalists worry most about what is to come from Modi's government. They point to a mounting assault on environmental protections meant to check pollution, prevent unfair land-grabbing and establish legal rights for tribal communities to oversee the land they live on.

Specifically, the critics object to the loosening of rules such as requiring local consent for mineral prospecting as well as to longer-term plans for overhauling the country's six keystone environment laws.

One of Modi's first acts as prime minister was to form a committee that within three months issued a report recommending a wholesale shift in environmental regulation. The recommendations include eliminating independent pollution regulators and having industries police themselves.

All project clearances would be handled by a single government-appointed panel and eliminate the need for forest communities to approve diversion of their lands for industrial use. The Subramanian Committee report also suggests revising the mandate of India's environmental courts so that they consider only existing law and not scientific arguments and other considerations.

While it's unclear which recommendations Modi's government will adopt, environmentalists believe it will embrace most of them within legislation soon to be presented in Parliament.

"If the laws aren't working properly, you don't just throw them out. You're supposed to implement them, or make them better," said Leo Saldanha of the Environment Support Group, which has campaigned against the report's recommendations.

"Most of these changes will have adverse implications for decades. Modi won't even be around to see the consequences of what he's doing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Modi and many of his ministers have made clear they see India's environmental laws as roadblocks to economic development, holding up industry and halting infrastructure such as dams, highways and railways.

India's growth languished between 4 and 5 percent for several years as business confidence and investment wilted under the weight of chaotic bureaucracy, policy U-turns and epic corruption scandals. But economists forecast India to overtake China as the world's fastest growing economy this year with a 7.4 percent expansion.

Environmental degradation, meanwhile, is already costing India at least 5.7 percent of its GDP each year, according to the World Bank. Those losses are expected to increase as the compound effects of pollution sicken more people while more of India's forests vanish, soils continue to degrade and aquifers run dry.

Past governments have opened debate to communities and activists, but the Modi government has cracked down on groups such as the Ford Foundation, Greenpeace and Action Aid.

Critics warn Modi may be courting a backlash by undermining the rights of local communities and by sacrificing decades of environmental laws that required rigorous assessment of industrial consequences, even if those laws weren't always implemented.

Fishermen have begun protesting coastal pollution, while tens of thousands of farmers rallied last month against plans to make land acquisitions easier. A decades-long Maoist insurgency continues unabated and with support from forest-dwelling communities who also seek a greater share of the country's natural resource wealth.

"I have this feeling that all of this will ultimately go wrong," said Pushp Jain, director of a Delhi-based environment consulting group ERC.

"If they take away public hearings, which is where affected people can be heard, then you have a problem."

How PM Narendra Modi's battles with legal establishment played out in first year
Samanwaya Rautray
The Economic Times
May 26, 2015
http://economictimes.indiatimes.com/news/politics-and-nation/how-pm-narendra-modis-battles-with-legal-establishment-played-out-in-first-year/articleshow/47423245.cms

The PM may not have planned it, but he got off to a rocky start with the judges and it stayed that way. ET looks at how the battle evolved and where it's going.

No to Gopal, the First Salvo

With its first decision, the Ministry of Law under Modi Sarkar triggers a row and sets the tone for its larger run-in with the Lordships. A Supreme Court collegium decision recommendation to elevate former Solicitor General Gopal Subramaniam as apex court judge is turned down Subramaniam withdraws himself after now erupts.

Apart from taking on the government, those arguing for Subramaniam's eligibility complain the collegium didn't stand up to protect his reputation, prompting CJI RM Lodha to defend himself publically. Subramaniam never appeared in Justice Lodha's court till the day he demitted office.

The Katju Bomb

Within a month, then outgoing Press Council of India chief and former SC judge Markandey Katju writes an article accusing three former former CJIs of making improper compromises in appointing judges during the UPA regime, ostensibly to push for a change in the system of appointing judges, an issue which figured high up on the Modi government's list of to-dos. The ball is set rolling for a National Judical Appointments Commission (NJAC) in August 2014, to replace the collegium system.

Gol's Ganga Mess

Justice TS Thakur, heading the bench hearing a 30-year-old PIL to clean up the river, asks Centre: "You should be more keen than us about cleaning up the river.... After all, you committed yourself to it (in your election manifesto). Tell us, do you want to complete it in this term (ending 2018) or the next term? Or keep the issue alive?" The government submits it will do so by 2018.

PM Hits Back

Narendra Modi says judiciary was perception-driven in its verdicts. He blames these perceptions on five-star activists, denying the legitimate role of civil society in drawing the court's attention to the executive's acts of omission and commission. The allusion to the likes of activist Teesta Setalvad and Greenpeace activist Priya Pillai, not to speak of antiestablishment favourites Prashant Bhushan, was clear.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Setalvad was allowed anticipatory bail in a case of alleged misuse of funds of trusts she floated for the Gujarat riot victims and Pillai was allowed to go abroad without a gag order - the government had demanded that she make a declaration that she would shun anti-India slogans at all international fora.

Who Will Pick Judges

As the PM begins his second year in office, the big battle is about who will pick the judges. The Supreme Court is hearing petitions on the National Judicial Appointments Commission, and there has been many a war of words between the executive and the judiciary on the subject. The outcome of this particular tussle may well become one of the positive or negative highlights of Modi's premiership.

he Ram and Swamy Act

The Modi government rode back to power on one catchy slogan - each person would get `15 lakh credited to his bank account - as the government would leave nothing to chance in recovering black money stashed abroad. Months have rolled on, BJP chief Amit Shah dismisses it as an election jumla, or poll season platitudes.

Though the government enumerates measure after measure it is taking to get the money back, it hasn't been enough to smooth ruffled feathers of the likes of suspended BJP member Ram Jethmalani or Dr Subramanian Swamy, BJP convenor and the latest critic of the government on this score. Much to the government's chagrin, the court has allowed Jethmalani to have the floor in more ways than one. This is one flashpoint that is unlikely to go away, laws or no laws.

Modi's disastrous first year
Praful Bidwai
Kashmir Times
May 26, 2015
http://www.kashmirtimes.com/newsdet.aspx?q=41300

When first-time MP Narendra Modi arrived in New Delhi to be sworn in as India's Prime Minister, he flew in a private aircraft belonging to the Adani Group, although he could have taken a commercial flight or hired a chartered plane. On landing, Mr Modi was greeted raucously with the slogan Har Har Modi, patterned on communal-military lines.

The two events showed where Prime Minister Modi's loyalties and priorities would lie: with Big Business and Hindutva, both of which he had served with pious zeal in Gujarat since the anti-Muslim pogrom of 2002 and through the many crony-capitalist deals he cut later.

Over the past year, he has showered favours on both constituencies, and antagonised many classes and groups, including some who voted for him out of the naive belief that he would bring "development". His honeymoon period has ended, but he doesn't seem to have grasped that.

This was proved by a third development. That's Mr Modi's May 16 statement in Shanghai to an Indian audience: "Earlier, you felt ashamed of being born Indian, now you feel proud to represent the country..." He repeated this in Seoul, adding the religious motif of "sins" committed in past life as the cause of being born Indian: "There was a time when people used to leave [including] businessmen ... These people are ready to come back. The mood has changed."

Mr Modi thus heaped a gratuitous insult on Indian citizens, for which he has deservedly drawn flak. The use of terms like "shame" and "sin" reveals deep insecurity and an inferiority complex in Mr Modi's paranoid persona, which psychologists should analyse.

The boastful claim that the "mood" in India has changed dramatically in his one year in office is meant to cover up that inferiority complex-in the same way that Hitler and Mussolini tried to do by declaring that they had made the German and Italian people "proud" through military aggression and by making the "trains run on time"! These comparisons should seriously worry us.

What's the first-year balance-sheet of Mr Modi's government? Frankly speaking, it's overwhelmingly negative. India has socially regressed in multiple ways, economically become more unbalanced and unequal, and politically got further polarised in an unhealthy, skewed manner.

India's social regression is evident in the growth of rabid communalism, attacks on democratic rights, intolerance towards dissent, spread of authoritarian ideas, Hindutva takeover of educational and cultural institutions, greater licence to male-supremacism and violence against women, spread of insecurity among the religious minorities, all amidst neglect of human development and growing disdain for social cohesion.

The Ramzada-Haramzada abuse, ghar wapsi, attacks on churches and open calls for depriving Muslims of the right to vote are just the crassest forms of the present outbreak of communalism. The government's indulgence towards them sends a clear message: it's India's open season to malign non-Hindus, ban the sale of beef and even slaughter of bulls, impose surya namaskar and the Bhagwad-Gita on school students, and build a cult around Gandhi's assassin Nathuram Godse.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The message is amplified when those charged with Gujarat's "fake encounters" and communal killings, including BJP president Amit Shah, are discharged without trial; but the entire might of the state is brought to bear against secular campaigners like Teesta Setalvad and Javed Anand on trumped-up charges-because they are trying to bring the culprits of Gujarat-2002 to justice.

Other signs of social regression are evident in savage cuts in social sector budgets: by 20 percent in health, 29 percent in Mid-Day Meal schemes, 17 percent in education, 51 percent in women and child welfare, and similar reductions in sanitation, drinking water and rural infrastructure schemes.

Central transfers to the states, which implement many social schemes, were cut by a huge 30 percent. In the National Rural Health Mission, the shortage of primary health centres is over 20 percent and of doctors 70 percent-plus.

The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act had its worst-ever performance under the Modi government. In 2014-15, the number of person-days of work created was 40 percent less than in the previous two years. Only 3 percent of families got the promised full 100 days of work, and 70 percent of wages were delayed-to disastrous effect in a year of acute agrarian distress.

Industrial growth has slowed to about 5 percent, and the investment rate has declined from 37 to barely 31 percent. Employment growth in industry has fallen to its slowest pace in a year, barely a fifth of what's needed to absorb the growing workforce.

The suit-boot-ki-sarkar is shamelessly pro-rich and anti-poor. It's cajoling capital to invest by improving the "ease of doing business" through various incentives. But investment isn't forthcoming because a huge number of companies are financially stressed. Fiftytwo percent of India's top 500 companies are excessively indebted, and 14 percent of bank loans have turned bad.

The Modi government has failed to diagnose this, and believes that the key to stimulate investment is threefold: dismantle environmental regulations, allow unbridled diversion of agricultural land to industry (hence the land ordinance), and "reform" labour laws to allow hire-and-fire policies.

The first approach has meant ruthless "fast-tracking" of industrial-project clearances without scrutiny, violating the Forest Rights Act and coastal zone regulations, and redefining "forests".

The high-level (TSR Subrahmanyam) committee has recommended far-reaching changes in 5 environmental laws, including abolition of Central and state pollution control boards, self-certification of environment-related information by project promoters, and automatic clearances for roads and power-lines through forests earlier declared "no-go" areas, etc. But environmental regulations are no obstacle to industry: over 94 percent of proposals have been cleared since 2007.

Land has become an extremely contentious issue. The UPA's land law was meant to give farmers and those dependent indirectly on agriculture a stake in determining their fate-necessary since some 60 million people have been displaced from land since 1947, mostly without rehabilitation. The NDA's ordinance undermines this rationale. It's opposed tooth-and-nail by a wide spectrum of parties and farmers' organisations. A land agitation could turn politically explosive.

The government is sitting on lakhs of acres it acquired for various defence undertakings and Special Economic Zones, but which it hasn't distributed. The whole idea behind the ordinance seems to give private capital free access to land and what lies under it, especially valuable minerals-in other words, a huge racket. This has become a Modi government obsession.

The planned dismantling of labour protections will rob workers of the right to form unions (for which the minimum membership has been raised from 7 to 100). No permission will be needed to lay off workers or close factories with 100 workers; these account for 90 percent of the total number of units. The factories Act will also be undermined, making a travesty of safety rules. Employment of contract labour for permanent work will become rampant.

Politically, Mr Modi is running the most over-centralised government in India's history. This cannot work without destroying decision-making integrity and creating insecurity among bureaucrats and ministers; indeed, RSS men have been appointed as "officers on special duty" to spy on them. This makes nonsense of democratic government.

Worse, Mr Modi has introduced venomous confrontation into politics, which goes against the spirit of democracy. Intimidating and cornering your opponents, and even your allies, can quickly become counterproductive. Several NDA constituents and Sangh Parivar outfits have turned against the land ordinance. Mr Modi is making enemies out of friends.

Going by the recent Assembly elections, byelections, and local-body polls in different states, the enthusiasm witnessed in favour of Mr Modi in April-May last year has all but vanished. The BJP proved incapable of repeating its Lok Sabha performance in vote-shares/seats even in favourable situations like Maharashtra, Uttar Pradesh or Jharkhand. The edge it established in parts of West Bengal, including a lead over the CPM in Kolkata, has already eroded.

What's becoming manifest now is the effect of the thinness of the original support for Mr Modi. He won 31 percent of the vote, but 52 percent of the Lok Sabha's seats, the highest such disproportion ever. This happened because his support was highly concentrated in a handful of states-not least because of planned communal violence and polarisation along caste and class lines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another factor was Mr Modi's high-octane, corporate-bankrolled, multi-billion-dollar election campaign, which hyped up Gujarat's at-best-modest growth and social indicators as great achievements. Thus a CSDS-Lokniti poll asked people which state in their opinion was India's most developed: 64 percent answered Gujarat, only 4 percent said Maharashtra, and even fewer cited Kerala, India's indisputably most advanced state in social development.

This illusion, partly based on the search for a messiah, is breaking down. People are realising that the "56-inch-chest" man is a hollow caricature of his manufactured bloated image. Mr Modi's troubles are set to worsen in the coming months.

Greenpeace opened accounts for foreign donations without informing authorities: Centre to HC Jagran Post
May 26, 2015
http://post.jagran.com/greenpeace-opened-accounts-for-foreign-donations-without-informing-authorities-centre-to-hc-1432631653

Centre defended its step to cancel FCRA registration of Greenpeace, and told High Court that Greenpeace violated Foreign Contribution Regulation Act by merging its foreign donations with domestic contribution.

However, Greenpeace is determined to keep operating in India even after the Modi government froze its bank accounts, leaving it with no funds to pay wages to hundreds of staff, its country head said.

The Home Ministry blocked foreign funding to the local branch of the environmentalist group in April as part of a wider crackdown against international and domestic Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs) found to have misreported foreign aid.

Modi government took action after found holes in its balance sheet and suspended transactions for six months. "The government has made it impossible for us to operate but our employees are willing to work without pay for one month because they see that the larger commitment has always been to fight against injustice," said Greenpeace India head Samit Aich.

Greenpeace workers - who have campaigned against genetically modified crops, nuclear power and toxic waste management – cited their activism did not hurt the country's economy.

Centre defends cancellation of FCRA registration of Greenpeace before HC Press Trust of India (via First Post)
May 26, 2015
http://www.firstpost.com/india/centre-defends-cancellation-fcra-registration-greenpeace-hc-2263752.html

New Delhi: The Union government on Tuesday defended its decision to cancel the foreign contribution registration of Greenpeace India before Delhi High Court, saying the NGO had violated the norms by opening five accounts to utilise foreign donations without informing the relevant authorities.

The Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA), in an affidavit before Justice Rajiv Shakdher, charged Greenpeace with violating Foreign Contribution Regulation Act (FCRA) by merging its foreign donations with domestic contributions.

The ministry also told the court that on the question of releasing funds for the NGO's day-to-day expenses, "statutory remedy is available under Rule 14 of the Foreign Contribution (Regulation) Rules (FCRR)" which provides that 25 per cent of the unutilised amount in the FCRA account can be used with government approval.

Additional Solicitor General (ASG) Sanjay Jain, appearing for MHA, said Greenpeace has already applied for seeking benefits under Rule 14 which has not been disclosed to the court.

He also claimed that the NGO was not using the donations for the purpose they were received.

The government affidavit said, "it was found that petitioner (Greenpeace) receives huge amount of foreign contribution running into crores of rupees which is though deposited in FCRA account, is diverted to such other utilisation accounts in which foreign contribution has been merged with domestic receipts contrary to the Act".

Greenpeace, during the hearing, told the court that due to freeze on its domestic accounts, it has lost donations to the extent of Rs 1.25 crore only this month which were made by its Indian contributors.

It said if the court does not intervene, then it would lose the same amount of domestic donations in June as well.

PTI

Govt to court: Greenpeace broke rules for opening accounts, use of foreign funds
Press Trust of India (via Calcutta Telegraph)
May 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.telegraphindia.com/1150526/jsp/frontpage/story_22209.jsp#.VWR09c9VhBc

New Delhi, May 26 (PTI): The government on Tuesday defended its decision to cancel the foreign contribution registration of Greenpeace India, telling the Delhi high court that the NGO had violated rules by opening five accounts to use foreign donations without telling the authorities.

The Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA), in an affidavit before Justice Rajiv Shakdher, said Greenpeace had violated the Foreign Contribution Regulation Act (FCRA) by merging its foreign donations with domestic contributions.

The ministry also told the court that Greenpeace, whose accounts here have been frozen, could continue paying for its day-to-day expenses by using the Foreign Contribution (Regulation) Rules.

All it has to do is to get the government's permission to use up to a quarter of the funds available in the FCRA account.

In fact, Additional Solicitor General Sanjay Jain, appearing for MHA, said Greenpeace has already applied for seeking benefits under Rule 14, but has not disclosed this to the court.

He also claimed that the NGO was not using the donations for the purpose they were received.

Greenpeace told the court that the freeze on its domestic accounts had cost it at least Rs 1.25 crore in donations from people in India, during May, and stands to lose the same amount in domestic donations in June as well.

The NGO said Rule 14 of FCRR only pertained to the FCRA account and not to the domestic accounts and disputed the government's contention with respect to non-disclosure of domestic accounts.

Greenpeace violated FCRA: Centre tells Delhi HC Vijetha S.N
The Hindu
May 26, 2015
http://www.thehindu.com/news/national/greenpeace-violated-fcra-centre-to-delhi-hc/article7247537.ece

The Central Government on Tuesday told the Delhi High Court that Greenpeace India violated the Foreign Contribution Regulation Act (FCRA) by merging its foreign donations with domestic ones.

This was in response to a court notice that asked the government whether the global NGO could use its domestic bank accounts for its day-today operations and payment of salaries to its domestic staff.

Greenpeace had filed the plea against the cancellation of its registration, saying it was facing imminent shut-down and it had barely a month to survive with the government freezing its accounts over allegations of foreign funding that were specifically meant to target India's economic and development interests.

The organisation had faced a host of other penalties for which it had approached the court.

The government had suspended Greenpeace India's license for six months and barred it from receiving foreign funds. It had also issued a notice to them to show cause as to why it should not be shut down permanently.

Centre Defends Cancellation of FCRA Registration of Greenpeace Outlook India
May 26, 2015
http://www.outlookindia.com/news/article/centre-defends-cancellation-of-fcra-registration-of-greenpeace/898787

Government today defended its decision to cancel the foreign contribution registration of Greenpeace India before Delhi High Court, saying the NGO had violated the norms by opening five accounts to utilise foreign donations without informing the relevant authorities.

The Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA), in an affidavit before Justice Rajiv Shakdher, charged Greenpeace with violating Foreign Contribution Regulation Act (FCRA) by merging its foreign donations with domestic contributions.

The ministry also told the court that on the question of releasing funds for the NGO's day-to-day expenses, "statutory remedy is available under Rule 14 of the Foreign Contribution (Regulation) Rules (FCRR)" which provides that 25 per cent of the unutilised amount in the FCRA account can be used with government approval.

Additional Solicitor General (ASG) Sanjay Jain, appearing for MHA, said Greenpeace has already applied for seeking benefits under Rule 14 which has not been disclosed to the court.

He also claimed that the NGO was not using the donations for the purpose they were received.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The government affidavit said, "it was found that petitioner (Greenpeace) receives huge amount of foreign contribution running into crores of rupees which is though deposited in FCRA account, is diverted to such other utilisation accounts in which foreign contribution has been merged with domestic receipts contrary to the Act".

Greenpeace, during the hearing, told the court that due to freeze on its domestic accounts, it has lost donations to the extent of Rs 1.25 crore only this month which were made by its Indian contributors.

It said if the court does not intervene, then it would lose the same amount of domestic donations in June as well.

The NGO said Rule 14 of FCRR only pertained to the FCRA account and not to the domestic accounts and disputed the government's contention with respect to non-disclosure of domestic accounts.

Earlier on May 18, the court had sought the Centre's response on Greenpeace India's plea challenging suspension of its FCRA registration and freeze on its bank accounts, both domestic and those meant for foreign contributions.

It had asked the government counsel to take instructions on whether funds of Greenpeace's domestic accounts could be released for day-to-day running, including paying salaries of its volunteers.

Apart from the Centre, the court had also issued notice to and sought the replies of three banks --IDBI, ICICI and Yes Bank -- which had complied with the Home Ministry's directive to freeze the NGO's accounts.

It had also asked Greenpeace to file an affidavit indicating details of its day-to-day functioning expenses, including salaries to be paid to the volunteers or workers, and listed the matter for hearing for today.

MHA on April 9 had suspended the NGO's registration under Foreign Contribution Regulation Act (FCRA) for 180 days, Greenpeace said in its plea.

The Greenpeace petition had said the MHA had earlier issued show cause notice to it asking why its registration should not be cancelled for allegedly transferring monies from its "FCRA designated bank to the FCRA utilisation account and from there to five other undeclared utilisation bank accounts without informing the authority".

The Ministry had also directed the banks to freeze the designated FCRA account as well as the domestic accounts.

Prior to that on February 19, the government had written to the banks with whom Greenpeace had accounts not to credit any amount, the NGO told the court.

India cracks down on Greenpeace and foreign NGOs
Al Jazeera via Yahoo (Maktoob)
May 26, 2015
https://en-maktoob.news.yahoo.com/india-cracks-down-greenpeace-foreign-ngos-111507091.html

India's government has cracked down on hundreds of non-governmental organisations (NGOs), including the environmental watchdog and lobby group, Greenpeace.

The government headed by Prime Minister Narendra Modi told the Delhi Hight Court on Tuesday that "Greenpeace violated Foreign Contribution Regulation Act", according to local PTI news agency.

Greenpeace India, which receives less than 50 percent of its funding from overseas, approached the court to challenge the government's decision to block its bank accounts after it was accused of violating rules governing international financial transactions.

In a massive clampdown against NGOs, the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) recently cancelled the licenses of 8,975 organisations for allegedly failing to file annual returns.

Pranonjoy Guha Thakurta, a board member of the Greenpeace India Society told Al Jazeera that the move was an "act of intimidation and harrassment" by the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the government was treading on "shaky ground".

"Sixty percent of the money Greenpeace receives is from ordinary citizens, not corporations or government entities. According to the law, the government has no right to block these funds," he said.

"Greenpeace and its supporters have been agitating against the establishment of a nuclear power plant in southern India, Tamil Nadu. Greenpeace has been adgitating against government policies."

The right-wing government headed by Modi has also placed the US-based Ford Foundation on a security watch list, ordering government approval of any of its activities in the country.

Critics argue the government's decision to restrict the movement of foreign funding to local charities is an attempt to stifle the voices of those who oppose Modi's economic agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CONFIDENTIALITY

This email may contain material that is confidential, privileged and/or work product for the sole use of the intended recipient. Any review, reliance or distribution by others or forwarding without express permission is strictly prohibited. If you are not the intended recipient, please contact the sender and delete all copies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tara McGuinness" <tara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/5/2008 6:54:10 AM
Subject: [big campaign] McCain's Remarks Today

Please see the following excerpt from the remarks as prepared for delivery today by Senator John McCain during his scheduled visit to the nuclear power plant in Newport, Michigan:

Solving our national energy crisis requires an "all of the above" approach. That will require aggressive development of alternative energies like wind, solar, tidal and bio-fuels. It also requires expanding traditional sources of energy like off shore drilling, clean coal, and nuclear power like the power produced at this plant here in Michigan.

Senator Obama has said that expanding our nuclear power plants "doesn't make sense for America." He also says no to nuclear storage and reprocessing. I couldn't disagree more. I have proposed a plan to build additional nuclear plants. That means new jobs, and that means new energy. If we want to enable the technologies of tomorrow like plug-in electric cars, we need electricity to plug into.

Now, nuclear power alone is not enough. Drilling alone is not enough. We need to do all this and more. That is why I am calling for an "all of the above" approach. I am also calling on Congress to come back into session to deal with this pressing energy challenge. I am prepared to take time off the campaign trail and I hope Senator Obama is too.

It is time for America to get serious about energy independence. Our nation is sending $700 billion overseas every year to countries that don't like us very much. When I'm president that's going to stop. We're going to achieve energy independence, and we're going to do it by using every resource at our disposal to get the job done.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com
Date: 6/26/2015 10:51:18 AM
Subject: Re: Letter

Jake,

Right after the paragraph #5, is the paragraph to which I referred. It says, in part, "Most importantly, it is vital for the United States to affirm that it is US policy to prevent Iran from producing sufficient fissile material fron a nuclear weapon-or otherwise acquiring or building one-both during the agreement and after it expires."

This should a point Hillary could take-up.

I hope this is helpful. Best wishes,

Stu

----- Original Message -----
From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, June 26, 2015 01:07 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: Letter

Stu - which line in the letter are you referring to? I don't have it in front of me but don't recall a specific section on fissile material.

> On Jun 26, 2015, at 12:39 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>
> Dear Jake,
>
> The Washington Institute letter complicates not only Kerry's efforts, but also Hillary's response, especially the insistence after the 10 year period that Iran have less nuclear fuel than needed for one bomb.
>
> I will be with Dennis Ross this weekend in Jerusalem, since we co-chair the Jewish People's Policy Institute, and we have our annual board meeting. I will get more texture on the letter.
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Breckenridge, Anita" <Anita_Breckenridge@who.eop.gov>
Date: 5/7/2015 10:19:31 AM
Subject: Fwd: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun <vergun@alumni.stanford.edu >
Date: Thu, May 7, 2015 at 3:28 PM
Subject: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request
To: John Podesta <podesta@law.georgetown.edu >

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Please glance at them to see if you could use them to inspire or highlight your own work as you have inspired us.
Miko's: https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com
Isaac: https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com

Thank you so much.
With Love and Blessings to you and Michelle and your daughters,
Pam Vergun

Sent from my iPhone

Dr. Pamela Bea Wilson Vergun, M.P.A.

Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun vergun@alumni.stanford.edu
3545 NW Ashland Place
Beaverton, Oregon 97006
Hm: 503-645-6642
Mo: 503-332-7633

Wherever you live, sign Isaac's petition to the City of Beaverton's Mayor Doyle and the City Council:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

https://campaigns.gofossilfree.org/petitions/divest-the-city-of-beaverton-from-fossil-fuels-and-nuclear-power
Thanks!
And, for more on Miko and Isaac's work to help protect our planet, please visit their websites:
Miko: https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com
Isaac: https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory M. Klass" <gmk9@law.georgetown.edu>
To: "Paul Rothstein" <rothstei@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 3/20/2015 11:50:42 AM
Subject: Re: Beware of philosophical arguments?

Kant's philosophy apparently remains highly salient in Russia. This from The Telegraph two days ago:

'Kant is a moron': vandals critique the philosopher's home

Police in Kaliningrad are searching for vandals who daubed graffiti on the side of a home once lived in by Immanuel Kant - no reason was given

On Mar 19, 2015, at 6:55 PM, Paul Rothstein <rothstei@law.georgetown.edu > wrote:

Ironic that Kant essentially preached that you should act toward others as you would want to be treated. (Simplified version.)

Paul

Paul Rothstein
Professor of Law
Georgetown University

"Law never is, but is always about to be." –Justice Benjamin Cardozo

---

From: Julie Cohen
Sent: Thursday, March 19, 2015 4:54 PM
To: Law Faculty and Visitors
Subject: Beware of philosophical arguments?

www.independent.co.uk/news/world/europe/russian-man-shot-in-quarrel-over-immanuel-kants-philosophy-8820327.html

Julie E. Cohen
Professor of Law
Georgetown University Law Center
jec@law.georgetown.edu
http://www.juliecohen.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
To: "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
Date: 2/2/2015 8:27:00 AM
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Sent from my iPhone

On Feb 2, 2015, at 10:07 AM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:

> Agree
>
> On Feb 2, 2015, at 9:41 AM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com > wrote:
>
> > I think this piece turned out well.
> >
> > But when we define our goals, we have to be clear that we are concerned with helping people who are getting crushed by rising costs and stagnant incomes, not that we're worried about offending high income groups (our donors). My guess is that this sentence will cause us some problems on the left.
> >
> > > One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking.
> >
> > Mandy Grunwald
> > Grunwald Communications
> > 202 973-9400
> >
> > -----Original Message-----
> > From: Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >
> > To: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
> > Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >; Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com >; Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; Cheryl Mills <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >; Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >
> > Sent: Sun, Feb 1, 2015 11:38 pm
> > Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
> >
> > http://www.wsj.com/articles/clinton-consults-experts-to-define-economic-pitch-1422837490
> >
> > Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch
> >
> > By Peter Nicholas
> > Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.
> > One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.
> > She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.
> > As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.
> > Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.
> > In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.
Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.
Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.
The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.
"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.
Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.
The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.
Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.
Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.
Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.
Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.
More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.
A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.
"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 1, 2015, at 6:54 PM, Nick Merrill < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

Ran the quote past HRC and she asked (with no prompting) that "average" come out. So here's what I shipped off to Peter Nicholas at the Journal. AS for the NYT, looks like it won't run for a few days if not next Sunday, so will circle back on that as it develops.

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote. "

From: Joel Benenson < jbenenson@bsgco.com >
Date: Sunday, February 1, 2015 at 5:39 PM
To: Cheryl Mills < cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
Cc: NSM < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Mandy Grunwald < gruncom@aol.com >, Robby Mook < robbymook2015@gmail.com>, John Podesta < john.podesta@gmail.com >, Jacob Sullivan < Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>, Philippe Reines < pir@hrcoffice.com >, Huma Abedin < huma@hrcoffice.com >, Dan Schwerin < dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >, Jim Margolis < Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, John Anzalone <

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

john@algpolling.com>, Cheryl Mills < cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >, Jennifer Palmieri < jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>, Kristina Schake < kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Subject: RE: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Definitely

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:35 PM
To: Joel Benenson
Cc: Nick Merrill; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

can we test every day americans next time?

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 5:27 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
When we tested deck is stacked against "average Americans, with too many breaks for those at the top" vs. Gov regs and rules hurging biz and stopping them from creating jobs – by 49-41 among all voters and 56-33 with our MOR (middle of the road voters) . I think it's how they see themselves in this environment, which remains their big pain point that she is fighting to fix.

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.
Joel

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:22 PM
To: Nick Merrill
Cc: Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake

Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Looks good. I think you can take out average and still communicate you mean folks in middle with "hardworking" (who likes to be average?)

if average is important I might use everyday.

cdm

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 4:36 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:
Great, thank you.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I¹ve been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. She laid out challenges that we face in the midterms, and now she¹s thinking through how we would address them should she run. Will reinforce that when I circle back with these guys today.

Here¹s the quote again incorporating peoples¹ thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we¹re missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

"Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On 2/1/15, 4:05 PM, "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

>Yes.
>
>-----Original Message-----
>From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
>Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 4:05 PM
>To: Robby Mook
>Cc: Joel Benenson; Nick Merrill; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe
>Reines; Cheryl Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John >Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
>Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>
>I like it too.
>
>There's a word missing toward the end. I assume it should say "...she >will present SOLUTIONS to our toughest challenges..."
>
>Thx
>
>Mandy Grunwald
>Grunwald Communications
>202 973-9400
>
>
>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:39 PM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:
>>
>> Adding Jenn and Kristina
>> Joel I agree w your edits. In particular I want to avoid any >>expectations around how big or bold her ideas will be.
>> Nick I'm sure you're already doing this but I also would push hard on >>background that we can't judge a candidate who has yet to announce--give >>her a chance to speak for herself. I know that's impossible but worth >>trying to get them to acknowledge that she's not a candidate and this is >>all speculation.
>>
>>
>>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:14 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
>>>
>>> Thanks Nick.
>>>
>>> Going for a little more conversational here with this:
>>>
>>> "Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that >>>they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has >>>waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when >>>she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly >>>laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes >>>gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on >>>a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, >>>but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present to our toughest >>>challenges and she will take nothing for granted and she will fight >>>for every vote."
>>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Nick Merrill [mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com]
>>> Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 2:46 PM
>>> To: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Robby Mook; Cheryl >>>Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Mandy
>>>Grunwald; Cheryl Mills; Joel Benenson
>>> Subject: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>>>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>> As I mentioned on our call on Thursday, both the WSJ and the NYT are >>>working on stories about how HRC might approach economic policy issues >>>as a candidate. Both will have a dose of personnel name-gaming, and >>>I've spoken to both to steer them towards progressive names, which they >>>seem to both have on their own.
>>>
>>> I want to give both stories something on the record that addresses the >>>core of the story, but also speaks some of the things we all felt >>>needed a little proactive addressing, like inevitability and timing.
>>>
>>> On the inevitability question, John I tried to stick to the language >>>you suggested, though I did take the liberty of striking the word
>>>"idiot."
>>>
>>> "Increasing access to opportunity and fighting for upward mobility has >>>been an uninterrupted pursuit of hers in every job she's held. You >>>heard it from her on the campaign trail last fall, where she laid out >>>the challenges we face. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide >>>range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a >>>calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will take >>>nothing for granted, she'll present bold ideas, and she will fight for >>>every vote."
>>>
>>> Feedback welcome, but I'd like to ship this later today.
>>>
>>> Nick

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jeff Harris" <jeff@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Jeff Harris" <jeff@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 10/8/2008 12:56:54 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 10/08

08 Election Daily News Clips
October 8th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

10:50am BUSH: Meets with the Prime Minister of Grenada at the White House

1:35pm McCain and Palin: Hold a "Road to Victory" rally at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania

2:25pm BUSH: Signs H.R. 7081, the United States-India Nuclear Cooperation Approval and Nonproliferation Enhancement Act at the White House

5:15pm McCain and Palin: Hold a "Main Street USA" rally in Strongsville, Ohio

9:00pm McCain and Palin: Joint interview airs on Fox News' "Hannity and Colmes"

10:00pm Palin: Interview airs on Fox News' "On the Record with Greta Van Susteren"

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain, Obama clash over causes, cures of crisis (AP 10/08/08)
By CHARLES BABINGTO
NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- Barack Obama and John McCain clashed repeatedly over the causes and cures for the worst economic crisis in 80 years Tuesday night in a debate in which Republican McCain called for a sweeping $300 billion program to shield homeowners from mortgage foreclosure.
http://customwire.ap.org/dynamic/stories/P/PRESIDENTIAL_DEBATE?SITE=FLROC&SECTION=POLITICS&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT&CTIME=2008-10-08-00-07-38

Obama and McCain Clash Over Economy (NYT 10/08/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY
Senators John McCain and Barack Obama debated for 90 minutes on Tuesday night before a nation in economic crisis, each promising anxious Americans that he had the better plan and vision to lead the country through what both men said was the most dire domestic situation since the Great Depression… Mr. McCain chose not to use the evening — the second of three scheduled debates — to attack Mr. Obama's background or character. But in a moment that caught the attention of people in both parties, he appeared agitated at one point as he dismissively criticized Mr. Obama's record in the Senate and referred to his opponent only as "that one."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/us/politics/08debate.html

Economic Crisis Dominates Debate: McCain and Obama Differ Over Causes and Solutions (WaPo 10/08/09)
By Dan Balz, Anne E. Kornblut and Michael Abramowitz
NASHVILLE, Oct. 7 -- On a day when the stock market took another sharp plunge, presidential candidates John McCain and Barack Obama clashed repeatedly here Tuesday night over the causes of the economic meltdown that has shaken the country and offered sharply contrasting prescriptions for how to restore stability.
McCain played the role of the aggressor throughout the 90-minute debate, accusing his Democratic rival of favoring major tax and spending increases and of relying too often on big government programs to reshape the nation's health-care system. He said he would do more to shake up Washington and bring cooperation to the capital.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/07/AR2008100703372_pf.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Economy dominates the McCain-Obama matchup (LA Times 10/08/09)
By Bob Drogin
McCain, the Republican nominee, unveiled the major surprise of the night as he sought to turn around his faltering campaign after weeks of sinking polls.
As his Democratic rival watched from a nearby stool, McCain promised to launch a federal program to buy failing mortgages directly from homeowners and mortgage providers and replace them with fixed-rate mortgages. A fact sheet from his campaign said the plan would cost taxpayers roughly $300 billion.
"Is it expensive?" McCain asked. "Yes. But we all know, my friends, until we stabilize home values in America, we're never going to start turning around and creating jobs and fixing the economy."
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-assess8-2008oct08,0,6881351.story

McCain, Obama spar over economy in debate (USA TODAY 10/08/09)
By Kathy Kiely and David Jackson
NASHVILLE — John McCain and Barack Obama exchanged blame and offered proposals to address the nation's financial crisis during Tuesday's presidential debate, with McCain promising aid to struggling homeowners and Obama saying the government must assure the massive federal financial rescue package works as planned.
The town hall-style debate focused immediately on the economy and stayed on it for much of the night, with McCain calling for the Treasury Department to buy up troubled mortgages -- with some conditions -- and renegotiate them with homeowners at the current value of homes. His campaign estimated the cost of the program at $300 billion.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-10-07-debate-tuesday_N.htm?loc=interstitialskip

Analysis: Sharp tone, no gaffes in town hall debate (USA TODAY 10/08/09)
By Susan Page
NASHVILLE — When John McCain was counted out for the Republican nomination last year, he used town-hall-style meetings — more than 100 in every corner of New Hampshire — to fuel his comeback in January's Granite State primary.
Now, his support flagging one month before November's election, the Arizona senator hoped the casual format in his second debate against Democrat Barack Obama on Tuesday would help him shake up another race that seemed to be sliding away.
But the evening was less freewheeling than most town halls — the rules negotiated between the campaigns imposed time limits and prevented follow-ups — and most of the back-and-forth echoed the candidates' stump speeches and TV ads. The Nashville http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-10-07-analysis_N.htm

Analysis: Obama gains, McCain seeks game-changer (AP 10/07/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
WASHINGTON (AP) -- Barack Obama made strides toward easing voters' concerns about his candidacy in Tuesday night's debate. John McCain, despite raising pointed questions about his rival's readiness, didn't create the game-changing moment he'll need between now and Election Day.
There are still four weeks to go, but time is running out on McCain.
Poised and confident, Obama directly confronted his greatest hurdle - and did it by turning the tables on McCain during a foreign policy question.
http://customwire.ap.org/dynamic/stories/D/DEBATE_ANALYSIS?SITE=FLROC&SECTION=POLITICS&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT&CTIME=2008-10-07-23-53-00

A debate for sobering times (Salon.com 10/08/08)
By Walter Shapiro
With the economy nose-diving, McCain did not achieve the surge he needed, while Obama looked masterly as the candidate of reassurance.
McCain came across as solid and competent (though his incessant talk of "earmarks" was enough to prompt viewers to reach for their earmuffs). But with four weeks left before the election and with his poll numbers collapsing along with the Dow Jones Average, McCain needed a debate performance that would support a domestic surge in his fading electoral prospects. Such a stirring comeback was not on the calendar for Tuesday night -- and now McCain has to gamble on a breakthrough when the two candidates meet for the final time at Hofstra University on Oct. 15.
http://www.salon.com/news/feature/2008/10/08/debate2/print.html

Debate Tactics Reflect Shift in Contest's Dynamics (WSJ 10/08/08)
By GERALD F. SEIB
Sen. Barack Obama wanted the second presidential debate Tuesday night to be about the economy. Sen. John McCain, by contrast, wanted the debate to be about Sen. Obama.
They both got their wish.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122343918239914493.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

For the New Contagion, the Same Old Prescriptions (WaPo 10/08/08)
By Steven Pearlstein
Against a backdrop of an unfolding meltdown in global financial markets and the near-certainty of a U.S. recession, the two candidates for president used the occasion of a much-anticipated town hall meeting last night to repeat all the talking points they were making long before the recent bank failures, the free fall of stock prices and the federal government's expensive rescue efforts.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/08/AR2008100800090_pf.html

Body language: confident Obama, combative McCain (AP 10/08/08))
By JOCELYN NOVECK
NEW YORK (AP) -- The McCains and the Obamas moved about the stage separately for a little while after their debate, greeting people on the stage, but not each other. Then John McCain tapped Barack Obama's back briefly and Obama turned and reached his hand out. Rather than shaking it, McCain directed him to his wife, Cindy.
If it wasn't clear on TV, photos showed that the two men did shake hands after Tuesday's contest. But that awkward physical moment highlighted a reality that viewers were reminded of repeatedly Tuesday evening: There's no love lost between these two men.
And it was McCain, slipping in the polls and increasingly on the attack in recent days, who appeared to have far more trouble concealing his apparent distaste for his opponent.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/D/DEBATE_IMAGE?SITE=TXMCA&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Long History for Proposal on Mortgages by McCain (NYT 10/08/08)
By JACKIE CALMES
The Obama camp is correct that the new $700 billion bailout of the financial system gives the Treasury the authority to buy troubled mortgages. But the law leaves unclear how the authority is to be used, according to a person who was privy to the recent legislative negotiations between the White House and Congress and who is not affiliated with either campaign.
The mortgage renewal idea actually originated with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, said Charlie Black, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain. And Mrs. Clinton, who proposed the idea in a recent newspaper column, borrowed it from a Depression-era New Deal agency, the Home Owner's Loan Corporation.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/us/politics/08mortgage.html?pagewanted=print

In Debate, McCain Touted Mortgage Plan Already Proposed By Obama (Huff Po 10/07/08)
By Seth Coulter Walls
It was the first question of the evening: how to turn the economy around and help those ensnared in the housing crisis. And in John McCain's first answer, he bragged about a bold new proposal he would implement as president -- that Obama already fought for in the recently passed bailout bill.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/10/07/in-debate-mccain-touted-m_n_132828.html

Skyline Debate: First Thoughts (WaPo blog 10/07/08)
By Chris Cillizza
RESOLVED: There was no game changer.
Tonight's second presidential debate between Barack Obama and John McCain featured areas of agreement, a few areas of marked contrast on issues and absolutely no mention of Charles Keating, Bill Ayers or Tony Rezko. As almost always happens in these one-on-one encounters, the candidates played far nicer with each other than their campaigns had been doing in the days and hours leading up to tonight's set-to in Nashville.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/thefix/2008/10/the_nashville_skyline_debate_f.html?hpid=artslot

GOP likes 'that one' too (Politcio blog 10/07/08)
By Ben Smith
A Republican official emails, on background:
The most memorable line of the night belonged to John McCain. McCain pointed out that "That One" vote for the 05 energy bill. Look for Republicans to note in coming days that "That One" also voted for higher taxes at least 94 times; "That One" has associations with unrepentant terrorists, etc…
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/1008/GOP_likes_that_one_too.html?showall

"That One" Debate. One More To Go. (Time blog 10/07/08)
Posted by Michael Scherer
A few thoughts on the debate:
My guess is "that one" will be the moment remembered from this one. Why? Because it can be used as shorthand for the overwhelming mood of the evening. There was deep tension between the two men. McCain appeared to hold Obama in low regard. Obama appeared to treat McCain like a disruptive student in his law school class. The teacher acknowledged the dissenter, explained why he was wrong, and moved on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.time-blog.com/swampland/2008/10/that_one_debate_one_more_to_go.html

The Second Presidential Debate (Time blog 10/07/08)
By Karen Tumulty
Summing up? I'm not sure this was a good night for Barack Obama, but I think it was a bad night for John McCain. And these last two debates were supposed to be his best ones.
http://www.time-blog.com/election_debates/2008/10/the-presidential-debates-round.html?xid=site-cnn-partner

You Guys Are Nuts (National Review Online 10/07/08)
By Andy McCarthy
With due respect, I think tonight was a disaster for our side. I'm dumbfounded that no one else seems to think so. Obama did everything he needed to do, McCain did nothing he needed to do. What am I missing?
http://corner.nationalreview.com/post/?q=MmFkOTk5MTNhZjVjMmYzYzhlY2RiYmQzN2Y3ZGZjMTg=

"That One," McCain Calls Obama In Debate (VIDEO) (Huff Po 10/07/08)
By Seth Colter Walls
During a discussion about energy, McCain punctuates a contrast with Obama by referring to him as "that one," while once again not looking in his opponent's direction (merely jabbing a finger across his chest). That's not going to win McCain any Miss Congeniality points. Nor will it reassure any voters who believe McCain is improperly trying to capitalize on Obama's "otherness."
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/10/07/that-one-mccain-calls-oba_n_132802.html

Un - Change – D (Hotline blog 10/07/08)
By Jennifer Skalka
McCain hit Obama at every possible turn. But the criticism -- that Obama is going to tax voters into oblivion, that he would invade Pakistan, that he was wrong about the surge in Iraq and that he would fine Americans for not purchasing health insurance -- could've played as too negative.
http://hotlineblog.nationaljournal.com/archives/2008/10/un_change_d.html

Count 'em (MSNBC First Read, 10/07/08)
From NBC's Carrie Dann
"Fundamental" -- 9 for Obama (including 2 "fundamental change") and 6 for McCain
Bush -- 9 Obama, 3 McCain (all efforts to distance himself from a Bush policy)
And, as the Obama camp has pointed out tonight, Obama brought up "the middle class" four times, while McCain did not mention the phrase. He did not utter it in the last debate either, which turned into a day-after ad.

No shake (Politcio blog 10/07/08)
By Ben Smith 11:16 PM
I didn't immediately see this, but it's another moment in the theater of the debate: McCain doesn't take Obama's offered hand.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/1008/No_shake.html?showall

Obama Leaves Nashville Intact (Time blog 10/07/08)
By Mark Halperin
Once again, no big moments or news.
McCain spent much of the evening trying to define Obama on his terms, but never broke all the way through.
First 30 minutes focused on the economic crisis. Other issues included foreign policy, health care, energy and more.
Mark Halperin's grades:
Obama: B+
McCain: B
http://thepage.time.com/2008/10/07/game-on-20/

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Still Targets Pennsylvania, Ohio: Republican's Campaign Faces Mounting Pressure as Recent Polls Show Obama Gaining Ground (WSJ 10/08/08)
By ELIZABETH HOLMES
The McCain campaign said it remains committed to Pennsylvania and Ohio, which account for a combined 41 electoral votes. Although it has pulled out of Michigan, the McCain campaign holds out hope for Wisconsin, with 10 electoral votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some Republican strategists have quietly expressed concerns that the game plan may be squandering campaign resources sorely needed elsewhere. Areas around the Columbus, Ohio, suburbs, home to working-class Democratic swing voters, remain strong for Sen. Obama. In Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh areas are trending Democratic, and there are doubts about Sen. McCain's ability to turn out voters in the middle parts of the state that are more rural. Meanwhile, longtime Republican strongholds like Virginia and North Carolina now appear to be in play.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122342100824013057.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

Analysis: McCain's contrition ends over Keating (AP 10/07/08)
By LARRY MARGASAK
WASHINGTON (AP) -- Nearly 20 years of John McCain's contrition over his role in a 1980s banking scandal vanished this week in 17 minutes and 30 seconds.
It took that long for John Dowd, McCain's lawyer in the Keating Five investigation, to make the mea culpas disappear in a telephone conference call with reporters.
Dowd said Monday the Arizona senator, now the Republican presidential nominee, was the victim of "a classic political smear job" and a "cheap shot" by Democrats who investigated him. The lawyer said the Democratic chairman of the Senate ethics committee during the investigation was a "stooge" of his leadership.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/M/MCCAIN_KEATING?SITE=FLTAM&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

McCain linked to group in Iran-Contra affair (AP 10/07/08)
By PETE YOST
WASHINGTON (AP) -- Republican Sen. John McCain served on the advisory board to the U.S. chapter of an international group linked to ultra-right-wing death squads in Central America in the 1980s.
The U.S. Council for World Freedom also aided rebels trying to overthrow the leftist government of Nicaragua. That landed the group in the middle of the Iran-Contra affair and in legal trouble with the Internal Revenue Service, which revoked the charitable organization's tax exemption.
The council created by retired Army Maj. Gen. John Singlaub was the U.S. chapter of the World Anti-Communist League, an international organization linked to former Nazi collaborators and ultra-right-wing death squads in Central America. After setting up the U.S. council, Singlaub served as the international league's chairman.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1848122,00.html

McCain and the U.S. Council for World Freedom (WaPo blog 10/07/08)
By Glenn Kessler
When John McCain severed his ties with a group linked to ultra-rightwing death squads in Central America may make a difference considering some of the literature associated with the U.S. Council for World Freedom.
McCain has said he resigned from the Council's board in 1984 because he was uncomfortable with the group's activities, but his name was still on the group's letterhead in 1986. He also attended the group's "Freedom Fighter of the Year" award ceremony on Oct. 3, 1985.
On July 15, 1985, the group's newsletter featured an article by Robert H. Goldsborough that appears to belittle concerns about then-President Reagan's decision to visit a cemetery with 49 graves of Waffen-SS officers.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/10/07/mccain_and_the_us_council_for.html

Forget Ayers. McCain Served On Advisory Board Of Whacked Out Council For World Freedom (Talking Points Memo 10/07/08)
By Greg Sargent and Eric Kleefeld
In a much discussed story, the Associated Press reported today that John McCain served in the mid-1980s on the advisory board of a right-wing group called the Council for World Freedom, which has been controversial because of the group's aid to the Nicaraguan Contras and the presence of anti-Semites in its ranks.
Now we've gotten a hold of another fun little nugget that shows how whacked out this group really is: A newsletter from the group from July 1985 that lashed out at people who criticized Ronald Reagan for visiting the Bitburg cemetery in Germany, which includes the graves of members of the SS.
http://tpmelectioncentral.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/10/mccains_and_council_for_world_freedom.php#more

Social Security (NPR 10/07/08)
By David Welna
McCain said Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill's sitting down to strike a deal on Social Security is a model for what to do now. Problem is, those two gents agreed to raise taxes to cover the Social Security gap...and McCain says on his campaign website he WON'T raise taxes to fix Social Security.
http://www.npr.org/blogs/politics/2008/10/social_security.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain Urges More Weapons for Taiwan (WaPo blog 10/07/08)
By Glenn Kessler
Sen. John McCain today issued a statement urging the administration to add submarines and F-16s aircraft to a $6 billion package of military equipment for Taiwan that the White House unveiled last week.
As it happens, the lobbying firm helmed as recently as May by McCain's chief foreign policy coordinator had a $200,000 contract with Taiwan to provide "advocacy ... with the U.S. Congress and executive branch," which it renewed in June, according to documents filed with the Justice Department.
In 2005, Scheunemann signed the contract between his firm, Orion Strategies LLC, and Taiwan's Washington office. On June 4 of this year, his partner, Mike Mitchell, signed a renewal of the contract, which calls for quarterly payments of $50,000.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/10/07/mccain_urges_more_weapons_for.html#more

GOP movie star Chuck Norris appears to suggest that McCain may die during his first term (America blog 10/07/08)
By John Aravosis (DC)
'If John takes over the presidency at 72 and he ages 3-to-1, how old will he be in four years? Eighty-four years old — and can he handle that kind of pressure in that job?' Norris said, as Huckabee looked on. 'That's why I didn't pick John to support, because I'm just afraid the vice president will wind up taking over his job within that four-year presidency.' added the action star."
http://www.americablog.com/2008/10/gop-movie-star-chuck-norris-appears-to.html

Advisers worry about 'grumpy McCain' (Politico 10/07/08)
By: Mike Allen
But what friends call "grumpy McCain" is showing up regularly on the campaign trail, and several top advisers worry that it's hurting his campaign by making him appear peevish and hunkered down when the country is looking for a larger and more optimistic brand of leadership.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1008/14364.html

Obama outscores McCain in veterans' group's report card (The Hill 10/07/08)
By Roxana Tiron
Barack Obama outscored his Republican rival, Vietnam veteran John McCain, in a report card issued by an influential, nonpartisan veterans' group.
The Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA's) Action Fund gave the Arizona senator a "D" as part of its congressional report card. Obama received a "B" from the group.
McCain is among three senators who scored a "D." Only one senator, Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), received an "F."
http://thehill.com/campaign-2008/obama-outscores-mccain-in--veterans-groups-report-card-2008-10-06.html

Behind Obama's Rise: An NBC/WSJ Stat (The Atlantic blog, 10/07/08)
By Marc Ambinder
Voters, the survey finds, believe Obama responded to the crisis more effectively than McCain did. Thirty-four percent say they felt more reassured by Obama's approach, versus 29 percent who said they felt less reassured.
That's compared with just 25 percent who were reassured by McCain's response, versus 38 percent who were less reassured.
In other words, McCain's response earned him a net negative rating; Obama's response earned him a net positive rating. Hard evidence that Obama did himself well by staying calm and McCain hurt himself by suspending the campaign, dramatically returning to Washington, and having little to show for it.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/10/behind_obamas_rise_an_nbcwsj_s.php

How McCain Lost His "Base" (The Atlantic blog, 10/07/08)
By Marc Ambinder
In 2000, McCain was the only real "hero" in the race, and the media sort of lived through him. Now, the media can sort of live through Obama's "change" movement.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/10/premise_of_denying_that_mccain.php

PALIN NEWS

Palin Plays to Conservative Base in Florida Rallies (NYT 10/08/08)
By JULIE BOSMAN
From Jacksonville in the northeast to Pensacola in the Panhandle, the fiery crowds gathered to jeer at any hint of liberalism, boo loudly at the mere mention of Senator Barack Obama's name and heckle the traveling press corps (at a rally in Clearwater, one man hurled a racial epithet at a television cameraman).
If there were undecideds, independents or swing voters among them, they were awfully hard to spot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Florida is still a too-close-to-call battleground state, with most recent polls showing Mr. Obama ahead, but not by much. That Ms. Palin campaigned there in Republican strongholds like Pensacola suggests an effort to increase turnout among the party's base.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/us/politics/08palin.html?pagewanted=print

Lawmakers defend Palin probe before Alaska Supreme Court (CNN 10/07/08)
ANCHORAGE, Alaska (CNN) -- Alaskan lawmakers investigating Gov. Sarah Palin's firing of her public safety commissioner defended their probe to the state Supreme Court on Tuesday, three days before the deadline for their report.
Palin's Republican allies have asked the court to shut down the legislators' probe, and the justices are scheduled to hear arguments on the issue Wednesday. In a brief filed Tuesday afternoon, lawmakers allege the shutdown request is meant entirely "to avoid a negative impact on the fortunes of one political party."
http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/10/07/palin.investigation/index.html?eref=rss_topstories

Palin on the Plane (NYT blog 10/07/08)
By Julie Bosman
Ms. Palin said recently that she was disappointed with the campaign's decision to pull out of Michigan, and, when prompted, she followed up on those comments.
"With Michigan, you know, I'm not going to forget about Michigan," she said. "The campaign isn't either. Todd and I particularly here, he and I, we were just talking about this, how important it is that Michigan understands that what we're working on, these economic recovery proposals."
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/10/07/palin-on-the-plane/

Palin Family Could Apply for Free Federal Health Care (Washington Independent 10/08/08)
By Laura McGann
ANCHORAGE, Alaska — When Gov. Sarah Palin said during the vice presidential debate Thursday that her family has gone through periods where they've been uninsured and she understands what it's like for Americans "to sit around the kitchen table and try to figure out how are they going to pay out-of-pocket for health care," she forgot to mention something.
Unlike the vast majority of Americans, her husband and children had a good chance of qualifying for free, federally funded, comprehensive health care under a program of the Dept. of Health and Human Services' Indian Health Service.
http://washingtonindependent.com/10743/palin-family-qualifies-for-free-federal-health-care

Palin Attacks Biden While He's At Mother-In-Law's Funeral (Huff Po 10/07/08)
By Sam Stein
While the presidential campaign has taken a decidedly personal and vicious tilt these past few days, one individual who has generally been left out of the fray has been Sen. Joe Biden. That's because the Delaware Democrat has been off the trail bereaving the loss of his mother-in-law to a heart attack.
As such an informal detente has been in place when it comes to attacking him. But on Tuesday, Sarah Palin broke the truce.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/10/07/palin-criticizes-biden-wh_n_132753.html

Palin stretches truth in campaign speeches (AP 10/07/08)
By BETH FOUHY
JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) -- Republican vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin tells audiences the election is about the "truthfulness and judgment" needed to be president. But the Alaska governor often stretches the truth herself.
She has exaggerated the nature of Barack Obama's personal ties to a former 1960s radical and falsely claimed the Democratic presidential candidate plans to raise most people's taxes.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/P/PALIN?SITE=IADES&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

Palin Rips Obama on Social Security 'Fear and Panic,' but Tangles Health Policy Descriptions (WaPo blog 10/07/08)
By Perry Bacon Jr.
PENSACOLA , Fla. -- Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin accused Barack Obama of practicing "old-style politics" and misleading voters in his attacks on Sen. John McCain's Social Security views, continuing her criticism of the Democratic nominee…Palin did not detail exactly how McCain's Social Security reforms would work in the speech beyond saying he would not change it for people who are already retired.
http://voices.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/10/07/palin_rips_obama_on_social_sec.html

The Palins' un-American activities: Imagine if the Obamas had hooked up with a violently anti-American group in league with the government of Iran. (Salon.com 10/07/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By David Talbot
"My government is my worst enemy. I'm going to fight them with any means at hand."
This was former revolutionary terrorist Bill Ayers back in his old Weather Underground days, right? Imagine what Sarah Palin is going to do with this incendiary quote as she tears into Barack Obama this week. Only one problem. The quote is from Joe Vogler, the raging anti-American who founded the Alaska Independence Party. Inconveniently for Palin, that's the very same secessionist party that her husband, Todd, belonged to for seven years and that she sent a shout-out to as Alaska governor earlier this year. ("Keep up the good work," Palin told AIP members. "And God bless you.")
AIP chairwoman Lynette Clark told me recently that Sarah Palin is her kind of gal. "She's Alaskan to the bone ... she sounds just like Joe Vogler."
http://www.salon.com/opinion/feature/2008/10/07/palins_unamerican/

Alaska to review per diem payments to Palin (AP 10/07/08)
By BRETT J. BLACKLEDGE
ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) -- Alaska's top finance officer will review payments made to Gov. Sarah Palin for nights she charged the state for staying in her own home.
Finance Director Kim Garnero said she must determine whether the payments made to Palin in the future should be considered income.
Garnero said, "That's something we need to confer with the governor's office on."
Palin has received more than $17,000 in per diem payments since taking office in December 2006 for 312 nights she stayed in her Wasilla home about an hour's drive from Anchorage. The state provides a home for the governor in Juneau.
http://www.foxnews.com/wires/2008Oct07/0,4670,PalinTaxReturns,00.html

Milbank: McCain-Palin's Attacks On Media Have Spawned Unprecedented Crowd Hostility Toward Press (Talking Points Memo 10/07/08)
By Greg Sargent
Milbank says that after the Palin attacked the New York Times and Katie Couric in her stump speech yesterday in Florida, he and other reporters were pelted with boos, with some saying things like "screw you" and "fucking liberal media."
http://tpmelectioncentral.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/10/milbank_mccainpalins_attacks_o.php

Claim Palin was union member hard to pin down: Obvious sources don't know, but that isn't end of the story (Las Vegas Sun 10/07/08)
By Michael Mishak
But the details of Palin's former union membership have proved elusive. What union did she belong to? When? What was her trade? In a politically active union town such as Las Vegas, her labor affiliation is a matter of some interest.
http://www.lasvegassun.com/news/2008/oct/07/claim-palin-was-union-member-hard-pin-down/

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Cool Hand Barack (WSJ 10/08/08)
Despite McCain's best efforts, Obama glides through his contradictions with ease.
Ahead in the polls, Barack Obama used last night's debate to portray himself as a nonradical if vague agent of change. Despite John McCain's best efforts, the Arizona Senator didn't knock Mr. Obama from his cool evasion or even do much to rebut the Democrat's routine talking points. This isn't enough to change the dynamics of the race.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122343890280614449.html

Palin's Kind of Patriotism (NYT 10/08/08)
By THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN
Criticizing Sarah Palin is truly shooting fish in a barrel. But given the huge attention she is getting, you can't just ignore what she has to say. And there was one thing she said in the debate with Joe Biden that really sticks in my craw. It was when she turned to Biden and declared: "You said recently that higher taxes or asking for higher taxes or paying higher taxes is patriotic. In the middle class of America, which is where Todd and I have been all of our lives, that's not patriotic."
What an awful statement. Palin defended the government's $700 billion rescue plan. She defended the surge in Iraq, where her own son is now serving. She defended sending more troops to Afghanistan. And yet, at the same time, she declared that Americans who pay their fair share of taxes to support all those government-led endeavors should not be considered patriotic.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/opinion/08friedman.html?_r=1&oref=slogin&pagewanted=print

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mud Pies for 'That One' (NYT 10/08/08)
By MAUREEN DOWD
John McCain has long been torn between wanting to succeed and serving a higher cause. Right now, the drive to succeed is trumping any loftier aspirations. He cynically picked a running mate with less care than theater directors give to picking a leading actor's understudy. And he has been running a seamy campaign originally designed by the bad seed of conservative politics, Lee Atwater.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/opinion/08dowd.html?pagewanted=print

Who Is John McCain? (WaPo 10/08/08)
By E. J. Dionne Jr.
Last night's debate raised a different question: Who is the real John McCain? Is he the man who used to tout himself as a problem-solver, or is he the desperate candidate who lurches from attack to attack?
The first McCain showed up last night, insisting that our "situation today cries out for bipartisanship." But is that the McCain who would govern? Is that the McCain who is authorizing all those attack ads? Is that the McCain we'll see tomorrow, and the day after?
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/07/AR2008100702438_pf.html

It's Time to Think Big on Tax Cuts: McCain should revive his support for an alternative flat-tax system. (WSJ 10/08/08)
By JACK KEMP and PETER FERRARA
John McCain needs to show the nation that he has the economic recovery plan to restore long-term economic growth. To do that, he needs to refocus his campaign with a new tax plan. Mr. McCain should come out for an alternative, optional flatter tax system, which he has already supported.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122342333629113303.html

Health Insurance For All: How the GOP Can Frame the Issue (WaPo 10/08/08)
By Michael Gerson
It is a shame that a discussion of health-care policy has come near the end of the presidential campaign, when the level of discourse is at its lowest.
In the midst of assailing John McCain's mental health -- he is diagnosed as both "erratic" and "out of touch" -- Barack Obama and Joe Biden have pressed an attack on McCain's health-care plan that is deceptive in almost every detail.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/07/AR2008100702437_pf.html

Politics of Attack (NYT 10/08/08)
Editorial
Ninety minutes of forced cordiality did not erase the dismal ugliness of [McCain's] campaign in recent weeks, nor did it leave us with much hope that he would not just return to the same dismal ugliness on Wednesday.
Ms. Palin, in particular, revels in the attack. Her campaign rallies have become spectacles of anger and insult. "This is not a man who sees America as you see it and how I see America," Ms. Palin has taken to saying.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/08/opinion/08wed1.html?pagewanted=print

Gay is a choice? Not that again: Palin's view ignores the fact that, as in religion, the attraction is undeniable. (LA Times 10/08/08)
By Nathaniel Frank
So one of Gov. Sarah Palin's best friends is gay. Her pal "happens to have made a choice that isn't a choice that I have made," Palin told Katie Couric last week. That language resurfaced in the vice presidential debate, when Palin insisted that she was "tolerant" of Americans "choosing relationships that they deem best for themselves." Calling homosexuality a choice is the time-tested way politicians signal their belief that it is the wrong choice.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-frank8-2008oct08,0,3944795.story

McCain's dilemma (LA Times 10/08/08)
Editorial
His options limited, the GOP candidate struggled to regain the initiative against Obama in the second presidential debate.
John McCain boasts that he knows the difference between tactics and strategy, so he must recognize that the final weeks of his campaign against Barack Obama are plagued with difficulties in both realms. His strategic goal -- to run as the more experienced, worldly and wiser candidate -- is undermined by an electorate stubbornly unwilling to regard him as more presidential than his rival. And his tactical response, to challenge Obama with increasing ferocity, is only making matters worse.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-ed-debate8-2008oct08,0,1049724.story

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BUSH NEWS

Bush: We're Going to Get Through This (Fox News 10/07/08)

WASHINGTON — An upbeat and jovial President Bush acknowledged Tuesday the challenges that Americans are facing in the global financial crisis but expressed confidence that the U. S. economy will recover.

"There's no doubt that people from all walks of land and all aspects understand that we're having serious times," he said at an office supply company in the Washington suburb of Chantilly, Va.

"We also know that we're the most dynamic econmy in the world, that we've been through tough times before and we're going to come through this time again," he said.

Bush defended the moves his administration has taken to address the economic problems, including the $700 billion bailout bill that was approved by Congress last week and immediately signed into law by him.

http://www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,433834,00.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

Fed slashes interest rate by half percentage point (AP 10/08/08)

By TOM RAUM and JEANNINE AVERSA

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Federal Reserve on Wednesday cut a key interest rate by 0.5 percent, striving once more to steady reeling financial markets just days after President Bush signed a $700 billion bailout bill into law.

The Fed said it was lowering announced that rate to 1.5 percent, noting that it was acting in concert with central banks overseas.

http://customwire.ap.org/dynamic/stories/F/FINANCIAL_MELTDOWN?SITE=FLROC&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT&CTIME=2008-10-08-07-44-51

Federal Reserve to buy up short-term commercial debt (LA Times 10/08/08)

By Maura Reynolds

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Reserve said Tuesday that it would become a lender of last resort to corporate America and signaled a possible interest rate cut, but the stock market nose-dived again as the financial crisis continued to defy the best efforts of policymakers.

http://www.latimes.com/business/la-fi-bailout8-2008oct08,0,822022.story

Group's Ad Blames Crisis on Democrats (WSJ 10/08/08)

By BRODY MULLINS and T.W. FARNAM

WASHINGTON -- A conservative political organization will begin airing nationwide TV advertisements Wednesday that criticize congressional Democrats for their ties to mortgage giants Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae, an early example of what will likely be a flood of spots running up to Election Day focused on the financial crisis.

The group sponsoring the $1 million advertising buy, the American Issues Project, is the same organization that spent nearly $3 million on a television campaign to tie Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama to former radical William Ayers.

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122342367451513361.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

Ad spending by independent groups rises in race's homestretch (CNN blog 10/07/08)

By Mark Preston

So far this election cycle, spending by anti-Obama and anti-McCain groups is dead even with each totaling $6.6 million so far this election cycle. In the last two weeks, Republican issue groups have spent $2.3 million, while Democratic issue groups have accounted for about $1 million.

But there has been a recent uptick in the frequency of third-party funded ads, said Evan Tracey, CNN's consultant on television advertising http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/10/07/ad-spending-by-independent-groups-rises-in-race%E2%80%99s-homestretch/

Judge orders 17 Guantanamo detainees released to U.S. (McClatchy 10/07/08)

By Marisa Taylor

WASHINGTON — In a dramatic setback for the Bush administration, a federal judge ordered the U.S. government Tuesday to immediately release and transfer to the United States 17 Chinese-born Muslims detained for almost seven years at Guantanamo.

The decision marked the first time a court has ordered the transfer of Guantanamo detainees to the U.S. and could prompt the release of dozens of other Guantanamo detainees who have been cleared for release by the military but who can't leave because the government hasn't found a country to send them to.

http://www.mcclatchydc.com/homepage/story/53595.html

What are the odds of a terrorist attack? (MSNBC 10/07/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Domenico Montanaro
From NBC's Robert Windrem
Is this an opportune time for a terrorist attack? Could al Qaeda use the financial distress and political uncertainty to magnify its power?
U.S. intelligence officials suggest that while al Qaeda may want to be "part of the conversation" in the presidential election, there is no "specific or extraordinary" threat information, nothing to indicate that terrorists are capable of taking advantage of the current situation.
"They attack when they can, when they have an opportunity," said one intelligence official, adding that terrorists have wanted to attack the U.S., have tried and failed on several occasions since Sept. 11th, without success.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/10/07/1508504.aspx

New U.S. intelligence report warns 'victory' not certain in Iraq (McClatchy 10/07/08)
By Jonathan S. Landay, Warren P. Strobel and Nancy A. Youssef
WASHINGTON — A nearly completed high-level U.S. intelligence analysis warns that unresolved ethnic and sectarian tensions in Iraq could unleash a new wave of violence, potentially reversing the major security and political gains achieved over the last year.
U.S. officials familiar with the new National Intelligence Estimate said they were unsure when the top-secret report would be completed and whether it would be published before the Nov. 4 presidential election.
More than a half-dozen officials spoke to McClatchy on condition of anonymity because NIE's, the most authoritative analyses produced by the U.S. intelligence community, are restricted to the president, his senior aides and members of Congress except in rare instances when just the key findings are made public.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/homepage/story/53605.html

Feds question new voter checks in 6 states (AP 10/07/08)
By KATE BRUMBACK
Associated Press Writer
ATLANTA (AP) -- Federal officials have asked election officials in six states to investigate whether social security number checks are being improperly run on people registering to vote.
Social Security Commissioner Michael Astrue sent a letter Friday to the secretaries of state of Alabama, Georgia and battleground states Indiana, Nevada, North Carolina and Ohio. The letter noted they had submitted "extraordinarily high levels" of verification requests.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/V/VOTING_CHECKS?SITE=NVLAS&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

RNC IE expanding buy to Maine, N.C. and Fla. (Politcio blog 10/07/08)
By Jonathan Martin
The RNC's independent ad arm is broadening its ad buy to include two more red states, another indication of GOP efforts to bolster their defenses in states they won four years ago.
The committee tomorrow will expand on an ad buy that began last week to include North Carolina and Florida, two states where Barack Obama has been vastly outspending John McCain on the airwaves in recent weeks.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/1008/RNC_IE_expanding_buy_to_Maine_NC_and_FL.html?showall

The Fed Can't Save Markets (US News blog 10/07/08)
By Kirk Shinkle
The Fed is buying up commercial paper and is now hinting at an interest rate cut.
So what's the Dow doing?
Falling. Again.
http://www.usnews.com/blogs/the-ticker/2008/10/7/the-fed-cant-save-markets.html

Retirement accounts have lost $2 trillion (Breitbart 10/07/08)
By JULIE HIRSCHFELD DAVIS
WASHINGTON (AP) - Americans' retirement plans have lost as much as $2 trillion in the past 15 months, Congress' top budget analyst estimated Tuesday.
The upheaval that has engulfed the financial industry and sent the stock market plummeting is devastating workers' savings, forcing people to hold off on major purchases and consider delaying their retirement, said Peter Orszag, the head of the Congressional Budget Office.
http://www.breitbart.com/article.php?id=D93LQUFO0&show_article=1

350,000 New Registered Voters in Virginia Since January 1, 2008! (Raising Kane 10/07/08)
by: Lowell
See the "flip" for the detailed numbers by locality, but the bottom line is that Virginia has about 350,000 more registered voters now than it did on January 1, 2008. Actually, it's even better than that, since the numbers below do not yet reflect voter registrations between October 1 and October 6. From a Democratic perspective, it's even better than THAT, as I'm hearing that of the 350,000 (or more) new voters, 80% may be Democratic! Keep in mind that John Kerry lost Virginia to George W. Bush by 262,000 votes in 2004, and that 80% of 350,000 is...280,000. :)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.raisingkaine.com/showDiary.do;jsessionid=36B19E81123421F8A3561211B3F9219E?diaryId=16521

Record Pa. voter registration pads Democrats' edge (AP 10/07/08)
By PETER JACKSON
Democrats saw an increase of more than 500,000 new voters in the past year. Republicans saw their ranks shrink by about 28,000.
Statewide, there are now almost 1,170,000 more Democrats than Republicans registered in Pennsylvania. There are at least 4,387,027 Democrats and 3,217,464 Republicans.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hGs4lqPk5U1QkqfgJXE4rSVapwngD93LSV3O0

Can Obama's Grass-Roots Army Win Missouri? (Time 10/06/08)
By Karen Ball
Nationwide, Obama is massively outspending McCain on payroll: $2.7 million for salaries in August alone, compared with $1.1 million for McCain, according to federal election reports.
http://www.time.com/time/nation/article/0,8599,1847473-2,00.html

Elizabeth Edwards attacks McCain health plan (USA Today 10/07/08)
RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Elizabeth Edwards calls Republican presidential candidate John McCain's health care plan a "perfect storm" for working families.
Edwards spoke out against McCain's plan to deregulate the insurance industry and give families a tax break to pay for care at an event Tuesday at the Virginia Capitol. She says the plan would backfire, resulting in lost care for more than 580,000 Virginians.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-10-07-edwards-mccain_N.htm?csp=34

Kenya deports anti-Obama author (CS Monitor 10/07/08)
Jerome Corsi, author of "Obama Nation: Leftist Politics and the Cult of Personality," tried to launch his new book, but violated immigration rules, Kenyan officials say.
By Rob Crilly | Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor
Nairobi, Kenya - The neoconservative author of an anti-Barack Obama book was detained and ordered out of Kenya on Tuesday night for not having a proper work permit, said Kenyan officials.
http://www.csmonitor.com/2008/1008/p04s01-wogn.html

Stevens's Lawyers Question Motives of Star Government Witness (WSJ 10/07/08)
By BRENT KENDALL
WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens sought Tuesday to undermine the credibility of the star government witness against the senior Republican lawmaker, saying witness Bill Allen had several personal and financial incentives to cooperate with prosecutors.
Sen. Stevens's lead lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, told jurors that Mr. Allen, an oil executive who founded Veco Corp., could protect his family from criminal charges by helping the government build its public corruption case against Sen. Stevens, a former close friend.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB122338915106111461.html?mod=rss_Politics_And_Policy

Russian forces in Georgia appear to begin pullout (AP 10/08/08)
By MATT SIEGEL
KARALETI, Georgia (AP) -- Russian forces began the final stage of a pullback from positions outside Georgia's separatist South Ossetia region, bulldozing a camp at a key checkpoint as EU monitors looked on. A Russian general said the withdrawal would be completed Wednesday.
Moscow must withdraw its troops from buffer zones surrounding South Ossetia and another breakaway region, Abkhazia, by Friday under an agreement brokered by French President Nicolas Sarkozy after Russia's war with Georgia in August.
http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/stories/E/EU_GEORGIA_RUSSIA?SITE=DEWIL&SECTION=HOME&TEMPLATE=DEFAULT

POLLS

CBS Poll: Uncommitted Voters Say Obama Won (CBS News 07/08)
Oct. 8, 2008(CBS) Uncommitted voters named Barack Obama as the winner of the second presidential debate as well, according to a CBS News/ Knowledge Networks poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Immediately after the debate, CBS News interviewed a nationally representative sample of 516 debate watchers assembled by Knowledge Networks who were "uncommitted voters" - voters who are either undecided about who to vote for or who say they could still change their minds. Forty percent of these uncommitted debate watchers said Obama won the debate, 26 percent said John McCain won, and another 34 percent thought it was a tie.
http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/10/08/politics/2008debates/printable4508430.shtml

CNN Poll: Obama won the night (CNN blog 10/07/08)
By Paul Steinhauser
NASHVILLE, Tennessee (CNN) — A national poll of debate watchers suggests that Barack Obama won the second presidential debate.
Fifty-four percent of those questioned in a CNN/Opinion Research Corporation survey conducted after the debate ended said that Obama did the best job in the debate, with 30 percent saying John McCain performed better.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/10/07/cnn-poll-obama-won-the-night/

Obama Leading In Ohio, Poll Finds: Edge Is 6 Points In a State Looming Large for McCain (WaPo 10/08/08)
By Jon Cohen and Dan Balz
Washington Post Staff Writers
Tuesday, October 7, 2008; A01
Aided by the faltering economy, Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama has the upper hand in the race for Ohio, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll, putting Republican John McCain at a disadvantage in a state considered vital to his chances of winning the White House in November.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/06/AR2008100602373_pf.html

Evangelicals Take on McCain (Christian Broadcast Network, 10/06/08)
By David Brody
October 6, 2008
The fact that McCain isn't polling as well with younger Evangelicals seems to indicate Obama's youthful vision of hope (the way the younger generation sees it) resonates to a degree with this group. In my reporting I have noticed that the younger crowd is tired of all the partisan bickering coming from Washington. And while John McCain has been a guy who's been able to work across the aisle, he's also been around Washington for a long time. That perception doesn't do him any favors.
http://www.cbn.com/cbnnews/459310.aspx

Obama takes a solid lead in Ohio (Public Policy Polling, 10/07/08)
Raleigh, N.C. – Barack Obama leads John McCain 49-43 in Ohio, the newest survey from Public Policy Polling finds.
http://www.publicpolicypolling.com/pdf/PPP_Release_Ohio_1007785.pdf

More State Polls (Time blog 10/07/08)
Posted by KYLETRYGSTAD
New polls out in Colorado, Nevada, Ohio and Wisconsin:
Colorado - Insider Advantage (Oct. 6, 485 LV)
Obama 51 (nc vs. last poll, Sept. 17)
McCain 45 (+4)
Obama leads by 4.0 points in the RCP Average for Colorado
Nevada - Insider Advantage (Oct. 6, 468 LV)
Obama 49 (+1 vs. last poll, Sept. 30)
McCain 47 (nc)
Obama leads by 3.0 points in the RCP Average for Nevada
Ohio - PPP (Oct. 4-5, 1239 LV)
Obama 49 (+5 vs. last poll, Sept. 13-14)
McCain 43 (-5)
Obama leads by 4.0 points in the RCP Average for Ohio
Wisconsin - SurveyUSA (Oct. 5-6, 672 LV)
Obama 52
McCain 42
Obama leads by 5.2 points in the RCP Average for Wisconsin http://time-blog.com/real_clear_politics/2008/10/more_state_polls_1.html

Obama's lead widens to 7 in latest Ipsos/McClatchy poll (McClatchy10/07/08)
By Steven Thomma
NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Barack Obama has opened his biggest lead over John McCain of the fall campaign, according to a new Ipsos/McClatchy poll that puts him ahead nationwide by 7 percentage points.
Obama's gain appears to come from two key factors.
First, voters are ever more anxious about the faltering economy and trust Obama by a 15-point margin over McCain to steer it. Second, their confidence that McCain's running mate Sarah Palin is qualified to step into the presidency if necessary has fallen sharply http://www.freep.com/article/20081007/NEWS15/81007086

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "American Security Project" <info@americansecurityproject.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 1/28/2016 2:45:09 PM
Subject: Latest News from the American Security Project

ASP Newsletter: Radicalization Part 1: The Process, Accepting Refugees Undermines ISIS, and Upcoming Event

View this email in your browser

January 28, 2016

Facebook
Twitter
Website
YouTube
Google Plus

Top Stories

Radicalization Part 1: The Process

Following the Paris attacks and the mass shooting in San Bernardino, California, radicalization has once again come to the fore as a topic of great intrigue. Even though it is now apparent that these violent episodes were linked to international terrorism, the precise nature of the suspects' paths to radicalization still remains a mystery.

Click here for more...

Accepting Refugees Undermines ISIS

ASP in the News

Chairperson of ASP's Business Council for American Security Dante Disparte in Huffington Post
Dante Disparte, Huffington Post

ASP Senior Fellow Andrew Holland in Latin America Energy Advisor
Inter-American Dialogue Latin America Energy Advisor.

ASP CEO BGen. Cheney in Politco
Bryan Bender, Politico

ASP CEO BGen. Cheney Interviewed On International Security Concerns
John Bersia, UCF

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ISIS desperately needs a highly-skilled civilian population. As refugees with these skills continue to flee and as ISIS continues to expand, their gains will see much less people, and hence less human capital.

Click here for more...

Upcoming Events

ASP and Lloyd's of London Risk and Resiliency Forum

Date	February 17, 2016
Time	12:00pm – 4:30pm
Location	Arnold & Porter LLP, 601 Massachusetts Ave NW, 11th Floor, Washington DC 20001

The American Security Project will host Lloyd's and ASP Risk Forum: Pathways to City Resilience in partnership with Lloyd's , JLT , and Risk Cooperative . This is an invitation-only opportunity for policymakers, business leaders and regulators to introduce the findings of the City Risk Index and share best practices and insights on risk assessment, mitigation, adaptation and transfer to help U.S. cities and institutions build greater resilience

To request an invitation, contact:

events@americansecurityproject.org

On Our Blog

American Competitiveness

Dante Disparte Featured in Huffington Post

Nicole Bohannon

In a new post published in the Huffington Post, Disparte discusses the many opportunities to reverse the island's economic woes, which have triggered one of the largest non-conflict related resettlements in recent history.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Click here for more...

Asymmetric Operations

Five Things to Watch for from ISIS in 2016

Pascale Siegel

Daesh will not go away in 2016, despite our repeated pledges and the West's renewed commitment. Here's five things to watch for from ISIS in 2016.

Click here for more...

Breaking the Brand: A New Way to Dismantle Perceptions of Terror

Esther Babson

American Security Project's Adjunct Fellow, Matthew Freear, was featured in this month's RUSI Newsbrief, arguing for "counter-branding" versus "counter-narratives" in the fight against terrorist branding.

Click here for more...

Radicalization Part 2: The Process

Anil Powers

It is important to keep in mind that Islamist radicalization can occur in a variety of locations, from heavily scrutinized mosques, to prisons, and even on the Internet.

Click here for more...

Radicalization Part 3: Mitigating the Threat of Terrorism

Anil Powers

To mitigate the threat of terrorism, governments have two options: adopting a proactive policy or a reactive policy. Within each policy approach, an array of programs and plans are already in effect or have been implemented to mitigate the threat of terrorism.

Click here for more...

Siege Tactics in Syria: Instability for the Future

C. Alexander Doyle

As 20,000 Syrian civilians face life threatening starvation, the Syrian government and rebel forces continue to use siege tactics as a way to gain a political advantage in local ceasefires and peace talks. Their use of starving citizens as bargaining chips will eventually lead to greater instability in the future as well as a stronger ISIS.

Click here for more ...

Climate and Energy

Resource Transparency and SEC Rulemaking

Andrew Vaccaro

The Securities and Exchange Commission has announced new regulations under Section 1504 of the 2010 Dodd-Frank Financial Reform Act. Unfortunately, the proposed rules fall short of providing the best possible solution. Fortunately, there is still time to offer a solution with greater resource transparency for everyday citizens.

Click here for more...

General Fusion is Named to the 2015 Global Cleantech 100

Esther Babson

For the second year in a row, the Business Council for American

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Security member General Fusion, a leader in the development of fusion power, was listed in the top 100 Global Cleantech companies of 2015.

Click here for more...

U.S. Navy Launches "Great Green Fleet"

C. Alexander Doyle

The Navy launched the “Great Green Fleet”, with a ceremony in San Diego yesterday, a major milestone towards a 2020 goal of having 50% of its energy supplied by alternative energy resources.

Click here for more...

Where Will Oil Prices Go?

Andrew Holland

The beginning of 2016 has seen a collapse in oil prices, to levels that few would have predicted even a year ago. What's going on, and why?

Click here for more...

National Security Strategy

Iran and Saudi Arabia Headed for a Cold War Over a Heated One

Nicole Bohannon

The sudden and dramatic breakup of Saudi-Iranian relations has put the world on watch as the situation develops. Now, as diplomatic ties between them are officially severed, war is inevitable. Correct? The short answer: probably not.

Click here for more...

Iranian Revolutionary Guard: Rough Seas Ahead?

Ken Robbins

ASP Senior Adjunct Fellow Ken Robbins on what the recent events in Iran could mean in the long-term.

Click here for more ...

Saudi Arabia Ratchets Up Regional Tensions with Iran

Asha Castleberry

The diplomatic rift between Iran and Saudi Arabia is a clear sign that sectarian and national rivalries are getting worse in the region.

Click here for more...

Nuclear Security

S.2461 and NextGen Nuclear Energy

Andrew Vaccaro

The Senate will consider an amendment to the Senate energy bill, offered by Senator Crapo of Idaho, on advanced nuclear research. The Crapo amendment consists of the text of his recently introduced bill S.2461, the "Nuclear Energy Innovation Capabilities Act."

Click here for more...

The Iran Deal in Action

Maggie Feldman-Piltch

As Iran removes the core of their nuclear reactor and fills it with cement opening the door for the easing of sanctions in just a manner of days, it is clear times are changing.

Click here for more...

What to do About North Korea's Nuclear Weapons

Matthew Wallin

With North Korea’s recent claims of having tested a hydrogen bomb, there is renewed concern about the situation on the Korean peninsula and the North's expanding nuclear program. Yet despite a possible increase in nuclear weapons capability, the strategic situation on the Korean peninsula has not changed since North Korea crossed the nuclear threshold.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Click for more...

Public Diplomacy

Ch-Ch-Changes in the US Anti-Extremist Messaging Strategy
Matthew Wallin
Rather than boosting large, officially labeled messaging centers overseas, the US should focus on skill-based training centers that are not focused on CVE.
Click here for more …

About the American Security Project

The American Security Project is a non-profit, nonpartisan public policy and research organization dedicated to fostering knowledge and understanding of a range of national security issues, promoting debate about the appropriate use of American power, and cultivating strategic responses to 21st century challenges.

American Security Project

1100 New York Avenue, NW • Suite 710W • Washington, DC 20005
Phone: 202.347.4267 | Fax: 202.470.6631
unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
To: "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 3/15/2015 6:56:46 PM
Subject: RE: Earned Media Update

After i suggested this earlier in the week i talked to few people on the Hill. The challenge is getting a member of congress to do it... because they think they will be called upon to make the same disclosure. I pointed out that they don't believe private emails should be made public, so there is no hypocrisy. But there is nervousness just the same.

Maybe a retiring senator like Mikulski. I'll keep working it, too.

From: Robby Mook [robbymook2015@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, March 15, 2015 9:36 PM
To: John Podesta
Cc: Joel Benenson; Jesse Ferguson; Margolis, Jim; John Anzalone; Mandy Grunwald; Kristina Schake; Jennifer Palmieri
Subject: Re: Earned Media Update

...who is willing to say Members should turn over their emails!!
Lowey?
Israel?
SJL?

On Sun, Mar 15, 2015 at 9:34 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Better off with an H R C warrior. Who is her most fearsome House ally?
>
> JP
> --Sent from my iPad--
> john.podesta@gmail.com
> For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com
>
> On Mar 15, 2015, at 8:50 PM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:
>
> > Do we think Cummings would do that? Certainly worth an ask.
> >
> > On Sun, Mar 15, 2015 at 8:48 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
> > > Who is the right person to raise a simple question of the audacity of members of congress asking others to release their emails when they don't ?
> > >
> > > Do we have some D who can squarely at Gowdy and demand he release all his emails for that last two years so people can see for themselves how politically motivated his investigations are?
> > >
> > > ---
> > >
> > > From: Jesse Ferguson [mailto:jesse@jesseferguson.com]
> > > Sent: Sunday, March 15, 2015 5:13 PM
> > > To: Joel Benenson; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; john.podesta@gmail.com ; Mandy Grunwald
> > > Cc: Robby Mook; Kristina Schake; Jennifer Palmieri
> > > Subject: Earned Media Update
> > >
> > > Hello All – Two quick things.
> > >
> > > 1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.
> > >
> > > 2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post : "Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records." [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. "He did exactly what Hillary did," said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: "When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio's spokeswoman said they had been deleted." (WSJ, 3/13/15)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press , "Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival." [AP, 3/7/15]

Roll Call , "But the legislative branch, which has effectively exempted itself from the Freedom of Information Act, can keep its emails and other correspondence hidden for 20 years or more — and some forever." [Roll Call, 3/10/15]

Congressman Jason Chaffetz, who chairs the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, was caught by ABC News with a personal email address – a gmail account – on his Congressional business card. [ABC, 3/3/15]

In fact, people have called on Trey Gowdy to release his email if he wants to oversee this investigation. [MSNBC, 3/11/15]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To: "Rhoades Ha, Danielle" <danielle.rhoades-ha@nytimes.com>
Date: 4/21/2015 4:15:43 AM
Subject: Re: Media Inquiry

Danielle, please clarify one thing, and please share this with Ms. Ryan, your bureau chief in Washington. CNN just reported that Schweizer is "partnering with the New York Times" for his book, but your reply stated only that the Times had access to some material in the book." Is the "partnership" limited to Schweitzer giving the Times the equivalent of a review copy of the book, i.e. an advance copy? Or is there something more that comprises this "partnership"?

Here is my problem with this that I will write about, once I get the facts correct. I have no problem with a partisan Republican writer/operative writing a book about "Clinton cash"; nor do I have a problem if his sources include Republican oppo research teams; nor do I have a problem with Amy Chozick writing a story that cited the book and repeated old news that was known before her story which included no new "news" except for the fact there is a book, even if Chozick's story was a de facto book promotion story. I do have a problem with Chozick opining in her news story that the Schweitzer book takes on some theoretical importance because he is "partnering" with the Times, Fox News, etc.

My problem would be if the NYT has some sort of partnership, relationship, with such a hard-core partisan book that makes the NYT an effective agent of, or collaborator with, a partisan political operator or operation seeking to influence an election. The places the NYT reputation and clout on the side of a partisan political project, as opposed to merely receiving an advance copy and then doing independent news stories.

Please note, a) while I am a columnist who supports Hillary Clinton I have publicly written critically of foreign donations to the Clinton foundation, and b) while I am a columnist in the opinion section of the paper I have higher standards for fact-checking than many beat reporters in the news sections that cover politics, which is why I am investing the time to get this story right.

I am trying to resolve the contradiction between your response yesterday, and Chozick's suggestion in her story that the Times, Fox News, etc have some "exclusive" arrangements (Chozik's description) with Schweizer and that these relationships make the book "more unsettling" (Chozik's description). In law school we called this the "ipsi dipsi", that a partisan book should have more credibility because of an exclusive relationship with a nonpartisan newspaper that denies to me that such a relationship exists, which puts the NYT in the position of giving its imprimatur to the credibility of a partisan attack, which I can understand with Fox News but not the New York Times.

For now I am simply trying to ascertain one fact: what beyond an early copy of the book constitutes the relationship that exists between the NYT and the author?

My thanks.

Brent

Sent from my iPad

On Apr 20, 2015, at 1:51 PM, Rhoades Ha, Danielle <danielle.rhoades-ha@nytimes.com > wrote:

> Hi, Brent -
>
> Eileen forwarded your query.
>
> I can confirm that there was no payment of any sort. Please attribute the response below to Carolyn Ryan, Washington, DC bureau chief and Political editor, The New York Times. It represents our response on the matter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We had access to some material in the book, but we wanted to do our own reporting."

Danielle
Danielle Rhoades Ha
Executive Director, Communications
The New York Times Company
O: 212-556-8719 M: 917-379-6928
Danielle.Rhoades-Ha@nytimes.com
@daniellerha

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Brent Budowsky <brentbbi@webtv.net >
Date: Mon, Apr 20, 2015 at 9:27 AM
Subject: Media Inquiry
To: "eileen.murphy@nytimes.com " <eileen.murphy@nytimes.com >

Ms. Murphy, my name is Brent Budowsky, columnist for The Hill newspaper in Washington. For an upcoming column I have a question:

Mr. Peter Schweizer will soon be publishing a book "Clinton Cash" etc. which makes serious allegations against Bill and Hillary Clinton. In her story about this book dated April 19, your reporter Amy Chozick includes the following: "But 'Clinton Cash' is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations including The Times, The Washington Post and Fox News have exclusive agreements with the author to pursue the story lines found in the book."

My question to the New York Times is: exactly what is this exclusive agreement between Mr. Schweizer and the New York Times? Is their any compensation to be offered by the New York Times to Mr. Schweizer or his publisher, or any compensation offered to the New York Times, by Mr. Schweizer or his publisher, in any form? In other words what exactly is the quid pro quo of this arrangement?

The working title of my column will be "Holy War against Hillary Clinton", and one of my topics will be the relationship between the conservative and Republican media infrastructure that organizes these attacks, which is certainly their right, and how the major media reports on these attacks.

This inquiry is purely fact-checking an effort to be accurate and fair in my column. I seek to ascertain the nature and details of the "exclusive relationship" between the NYT and the author and publisher of this book, and I will be candid and tell you I find this relationship strange and troubling. Normally an author publishes a book, and news organizations assign reporters to report on the content of the book without collusion or compensation beyond the normal book promotion and reporter/author relationships.

I may well request a formal interview with Mr. Baquet to discuss this "relationship", but for now I would appreciate in the spirit of fact-checking and fairness the details of this "relationship."

I can be reached via this email and at (202) 296-6177 .

In advance I appreciate your consideration,

Brent Budowsky

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jonathan Garthwaite" <THeditor@TownHallmail.com>
To: Friend <JohnPodesta@gmail.com>
Date: 2/11/2016 9:04:16 AM
Subject: The FBI Just Revealed THIS Shocking News About the San Bernardino Terrorists

Townhall.com
CELEBRATING 20 YEARS

Having trouble viewing this email? View it in your browser

Fresh, Conservative, Intelligent Reporting | Facebook
Twitter

Columnists | Tipsheet | News | Cartoons | Videos

Obama Lays Groundwork to Confiscate Retirement Accounts

Banks Get Green Light to Seize Your Bank Accounts - No Crime Required!

IRS Loophole Allows You To Store Your IRA or 401K at Home.

Must Reads

Bad News: Millennials, America's Largest Generation, Prefer Socialism Over Capitalism

Katie Pavlich

State Department: 'Of Course' Hillary's Classified Email Spillage is 'Very Serious'

Guy Benson

Intelligence officials familiar with the recently-confirmed FBI criminal investigation into the matter say the secrets that Clinton knowingly put at risk were some of the most sensitive in existence.
[Keep Reading]

Have a Question For The Presidential Candidates? Ask Here!

Katie Pavlich

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When socialist Bernie Sanders beat Democrat Hillary Clinton in a landslide Tuesday in New Hampshire, he crushed her among young voters by a whopping 83 percent.
[Keep Reading]

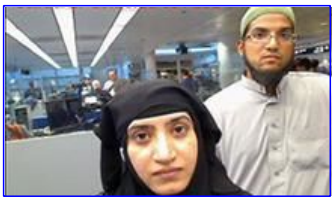
The Enemy Within–and It's Not Donald Trump
Matt Vespa

Oregon Occupier: We'll Leave Here 'Dead Or Without Charges'
Cortney O'Brien

Congressional Black Caucus Endorses Hillary, Not One Vote for Bernie
Cortney O'Brien

Iran Celebrates Capturing Americans With Parade
Justin Holcomb

The FBI Still Hasn't Unlocked the San Bernardino Terrorists' Phone
Christine Rousselle



Bernie Sanders Meets With Al Sharpton And This Tweet Sums It Up Perfectly
Katie Pavlich

Obama Lays Groundwork to Confiscate Retirement Accounts.

Banks Get Green Light to Seize Your Bank Accounts - No Crime Required!

IRS Loophole Allows You To Store Your IRA or 401K at Home.

We've partnered with Change.org to bring you Conservatives Speak! This is a special project that allows you, the citizen, to submit questions to the presidential candidates for consideration.
[Keep Reading]

Obama Lays Groundwork to Confiscate Retirement Accounts.

Banks Get Green Light to Seize Your Bank Accounts - No Crime Required!

IRS Loophole Allows You To Store Your IRA or 401K at Home.

Columnists & Tipsheet

New Jersey Man Slays Child
Ann Coulter

Obama EPA "Clean Power" Rule Dealt Devastating Blow At SCOTUS
Kevin Glass

San Diego Declares War on our Founding Fathers and Men, Too
Todd Starnes

In Search of Fixes for a Fossilized Economy
Victor Davis Hanson

Feeling the Bern
Derek Hunter

Saudi Singer on Egyptian TV Criticizes Radical Islam, Defends the West
Larry Elder

Day of the Demagogues
Mona Charen

That 'Controversial' Doritos Commercial
Cal Thomas

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VIDEO: US Says Russian Campaign in Syria Helping ISIL

The U.S. says Russia's counterterrorism campaign in Syria is actually helping the Islamic State.
[Keep Reading]

Churchill's Grandson Furious Reply To Anti-Nuclear Defense Minister

Andre Walker

WESTMINSTER, United Kingdom The grandson of Britain's wartime Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, has raised eyebrows in the House of Commons for angrily refusing to meet the Labour Party's newly appointed Defense Secretary.
[Keep Reading]

VIDEO: Ted Cruz: It's Me vs. Donald Trump At This Point

Hours after his respectable third-place finish in New Hampshire, Ted Cruz suggested the GOP presidential contest is now a referendum between him and Donald Trump.
[Keep Reading]

Jay Carney: Obama Would 'Prefer' to See Clinton as Democratic Presidential Nominee Over Sanders

Leah Barkoukis

If she doesn't get indicted, that is.
[Keep Reading]

Oh, Canada: Cost Of Liberal Party's Proposals Projected To Soar Into The Billions

Matt Vespa

Nice job, Liberals
[Keep Reading]

Rotary Club Awkwardly Kicks Jeb Bush 'Out the Door'

Justin Holcomb

The cloud of awkwardness and clumsy misfortune continues to loom over Jeb Bush's head while on the campaign trail. At a rotary club rally in New Hampshire on Tuesday, Jeb was interrupted during the middle of his speech and ushered off stage.
[Keep Reading]

Political Cartoons

Bearing Arms

"Why Not Just Shoot Him In The Leg?" | Bob Owens

Why Yes–Carry Permits Are Surging In Minnesota | Matt Vespa

Man Robs Store With Fake Gun, Gets Shot By Clerk's Real One | Bob Owens

Thief Who Stole More Than 85 Guns Receives Probation In Plea Deal | Bob Owens

Did Travis Haley Have A Negligent Discharge? | Bob Owens

Political News

Cruz app data collection helps campaign read minds of voters | AP News

Campaign signs get new life to help people with disabilities | AP News

3 killed in attack on customs post in central Mali | AP News

Change would allow handguns at Tennessee legislative complex | AP News

Virginia school district nixes video on race after criticism | AP News

Obamacare in Full Effect
Plus: 2014 Senate Races

Obama Lays Groundwork to Confiscate Retirement Accounts

Banks Get Green Light to Seize Your Bank Accounts - No Crime Required!

IRS Loophole Allows You To Store Your IRA or 401K at Home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Connect with Us

Facebook

Twitter

_____SUBSCRIPTION INFO_____

This newsletter is never sent unsolicited. It was sent to you because you signed up to receive this newsletter on the Townhall.com network OR a friend forwarded it to you. We respect and value your time and privacy. If this newsletter no longer meets your needs we will be happy to remove your address immediately.

You can unsubscribe from the Townhall Daily by clicking here .

Or Send postal mail to:
Townhall Daily Unsubscribe
1901 N. Moore St - Suite 701, Arlington, VA 22209

* Copyright Townhall and its Content Providers.
All rights reserved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 5/3/2015 7:30:38 AM
Subject: Re: Clinton Cash and Week Ahead issues to discuss tomorrow am

I agree with Jen we should try to avoid Tuesday if that is possible. I like having her do it Wednesday, if we can make it til then -- saying a couple declarative sentences rejecting the basic premise [and expressing pride in Foundation's work], pointing to website, and then pivoting to positive message.

On Sun, May 3, 2015 at 1:33 PM, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Friends - I wanted to lay out some issues to consider related to Clinton Cash and making news next week for discussion on Monday morning's call. Hope you are enjoying great weather in the meantime. JP
>
> HRC ENGAGEMENT ON CLINTON CASH
>
> The biggest question for this group is if and how HRC engages on Clinton Cash this week and what are the "two lines" she would deliver.
>
> Reminder on this week's events for her. WJC on Today show on Monday; HRC in Vegas on Tuesday in front of the pool for an immigration event; fundraiser and lunch with the Mayor in SFO on Wednesday; LA fundraisers on Thursday; Bay Area fundraiser on Friday. All of the fundraisers are closed. To restate what we all discussed on Thursday and Friday - I would rather she not engage with press while we are in Vegas. Like to keep her on immigration and we handle response.
>
> Below is a written statement Dan had drafted when we thought she might engage on this last week - so gives folks something to react to:
>
> Statement from Hillary Clinton:
> The suggestion that I or President Obama or any other senior official in this administration would ever allow decisions about national security to influenced by personal considerations – let alone some charitable donations – is absurd. Anyone who's had to sit in the Situation Room and make life and death choices would understand that. And if anyone ever donated to the Clinton Foundation in the hopes of influencing official government policy, they'd be a fool. Even the author himself has now admitted that he found zero evidence of any wrong-doing or quid pro quo. Unfortunately, the incredible life-saving work of the Clinton Foundation has gotten lost in these attacks. More than 9 million people with HIV/AIDS around the world have benefited from more affordable medicine because of the Clinton Foundation. Millions of American children have access to healthier food. Farmers in Africa are growing better crops. Women entrepreneurs are starting businesses. I'm so proud of the work that Bill, Chelsea, and all the professionals at the Foundation have done and continue to do. And I hope that people will judge the Foundation on that record of accomplishment, not on baseless conspiracy theories
>
> CLINTON CASH RESPONSE/LAUNCH OF "THE BRIEFING"
>
> On Tuesday morning we will launch The Briefing page on our website. This page will be where supporters and others can get information and points on what she is for, but also where we would post pushback on the book. Below is what we currently plan to post on Tuesday related to the book.
>
> We are also considering a Podesta post that we would put on Medium and our site that unveils the concept of The Briefing, debunks the book a bit, and notes that while we will respond aggressively to attacks - we know that they are just designed to stop her bc R's know that she has right vision/policies to win and will not be distracted from our main highway of selling the positive. John and I discussed yesterday and think it is important that supporters and press know that we will deal aggressively with unfair attacks, but our real focus and her's is her proactive vision. Important that we do not appear beleaguered.
>
> Clinton Cash Content for The Briefing:
>
> 1) a comprehensive post that debunks the book with all of our attacks in one place;
>
> 2) a short video narrated by Brian Fallon highlighting most egregious errors (we will need more time to do comprehensive version we discussed with HRC on Friday, but think it is worth doing short one for the book release on Tuesday);
>
> 3) a number of social media products that our supporters can share and are designed to get buzz with press and supporters and further discredit the author and the book;
>
> 4) the products we have already put out over the course of the last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jacob Roberts" <jacob@progressiveaccountability.org>
To:	"big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date:	10/23/2008 5:07:08 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] MMR: McSocialism, Maverick to win, Palin's still a drag, McCarthyist revivalism, Bush still MIA, someone finally tells Bounds to pipe down, Morning 10/23/08

Highlights:

1. MSNBC: The difference between Obama's and McCain's socialism: qui bono
   HOLTZ-EAKIN: "This is...uh...prior to the 2001 tax cuts what John McCain had was a tax proposal that put the middle class first in line--absolutely appropriate at the time. Right now what Barack Obama is proposing is to raise taxes in a dangerous way for the sole purpose of sending checks to people who owe no income tax liability."
2. MSNBC: Pawlenty sells McCain as a bi-partisan straight-shooter
   PAWLENTY: "We can win here with the right year and the right candidate and I think, with a maverick, populist kind of straight-shooter like John McCain he's got a shot."
3. CNN: Palin pile-on: VP is certified drag on the ticket
   DANA BASH: "To win he needs suburban and independent voters and evidence is mounting, that with those groups, Palin hurts."
4. CNN: GOP strategist dismisses efforts to revive McCarthyism in the 21st century
   ED ROLLINS: "I don't think this is part of a large strategy. I think they all wish they would have been quiet."
5. CBS: The disappearing president – Bush conspicuously absent from campaign trail
   PLANTE: "But other than...one fundraising trip to Phoenix, the President has been a no-show. His Press Secretary says Mr. Bush has had a lot on his plate, the last few months."
6. FNC: Fox anchor encourages Tucker Bounds to keep it brief
   MEGYN KELLY:" Wow, OK, too long."

No Video

1. NBC – SARAH PALIN: "So be it. If that will allow some curiosity-seekers, perhaps to have oh one more thing that they can either check the box off that they can find something to criticize perhaps or find something to rest them assured over, fine."
2. NBC - BRIAN WILLIAMS: "Well, let's be very blunt. We have waited patiently. Fifty-five days since Sarah Palin was named to this ticket to get this interview since her naming as vice-presidential nominee. The campaign insisted that most of our sit-down interview, she be seated next to the nominee, John McCain. We were allowed time with cameras, with just Sarah Palin but only a few minutes later. I think, elapsed time, in all, 28 minutes to ask what were weeks worth of pent-up questions."
3. NBC - DAVID GREGORY: "Mr. Bush is on the distant sidelines. He may be a big target on the campaign trail, but you're not gonna find him anywhere near the trail itself. Rallying republicans in New Hampshire, John McCain was running away from the one guy other than Obama who might defeat him."
4. ABC – JAKE TAPPER: "Palin says the clothes belong to the Republican party, she's just wearing them, so she does not have to pay taxes.[...] The question is whether this woman who represents "Joe Six Pack" and "Hockey Moms" will appear to be skirting the rules."

Clips:

Highlight #1

MSNBC Anchor asks Spokesman to Differentiate between McCain's and Obama's Socialism, Spokesman Says Obama Wants to Redistribute Wealth to Different People (MSNBC 10/23/08 3:03pm)

DOUGLAS-HOLTZ EAKIN: There's the simple evidence that Barack Obama himself has said, on at least two occasions, that raising taxes in a bad economy is probably not a good idea and he even maybe thought that he should defer his. Now his--he's since lost his judgment on that, but it doesn't take a whole lot of economic research to show that, if you're gonna raise taxes on the one part of our economy that's created 331,000 jobs and that's the small businesses with fewer than 50 employees, you are endangering the one bright spot in the US economy and John McCain is not going to do that.

[...]

QUESTIONER: Why is it that someone like my father who goes to school for 13 years gets penalized in a huge tax bracket because he's a doctor. Why is that--why does he have to pay higher taxes than everybody else? Just because he makes more money how is that fair?

JOHN MCCAIN: I think it's, to some degree, because we feel obviously that wealthy people can afford more. Here's what I really believe: that when you reach a certain level of comfort there's nothing wrong with paying somewhat more and frankly I think that the first people who deserve a tax cut are working Americans with children that need to educate their children. They're the ones that I would support tax cuts for first.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LESTERHOLT: [H]ow is that different from what Barack Obama is saying now?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: This is...uh...prior to the 2001 tax cuts what John McCain had was a tax proposal that put the middle class first in line--absolutely appropriate at the time. Right now what Barack Obama is proposing is to raise taxes in a dangerous way for the sole purpose of sending checks to people who owe no income tax liability. Now the US tax code has a long tradition of progressivity and John McCain embraces that. Right now the top 1% pay 40% of the taxes. The top 5% pay 60% of the taxes. So there's a lot of progressivity out there. That's very different from a proposal that says lets' simply take more money for the sole purpose--not of meeting goods and services, but of sending it to people who are paying no tax liability and labeling it a a tax cut.

[...]

HOLTZ-EAKIN: We have compared out telephone calls made, our doors knocked, our volunteers to previous efforts; particularly the Bush-Cheney effort in 2004. They all come in favorably.

Highlight #2
Governor Pawlenty Insists the GOP has a Bi-Partisan Maverick on its Ticket (MSNBC 10/23/08 8:04am)
TIM PAWLENTY: Minnesota's always a challenging state for republicans but we can win here with the right year and the right candidate and I think, with a maverick, populist kind of straight-shooter like John McCain he's got a shot [...].

[...]

PAWLENTY: I think a couple basic messages are most powerful, Mika. First of all, we don't want the country to be run by a runaway train of democrat ideas and bad liberal ideas. We need a check and balance on that so having Senator McCain there would do that plus he could work across the party aisle to get things done. Number two I'd continue to push the idea that Barack Obama is not experienced. He'd be the least-prepared president in modern history of the country and third, he's out of the mainstream even in terms of centrist, center-left politics. He is a[n] extreme liberal and so I think those are three things that would concern the country and give people a chance to have a second look at Senator McCain.

Highlight #3
Sarah Palin Hurting McCain's Chances with Independents, Suburbanites (CNN's American Morning, 10/23/08)
JOHN ROBERTS: McCain has consistently had strong poll numbers on the issue of National Security, but there is one issue where poll numbers keep getting worse for the candidate- and that is his choice of a running mate. Dana Bash has got more for us now on that front, Dana?

DANA BASH: [...] The boisterous and rather large crowd here for John McCain and Sarah Palin is what's known as the Palin effect, she's helping rally the faithful. The problem for McCain is the increasingly negative impact Palin seems to be having on those he needs to win, who don't come to these rallies.

BASH (V.O.): With or without Sarah Palin by his side, John McCain warms up his crowds with this:

JOHN MCCAIN: I'm so proud of the enthusiasm that Sarah Palin has sparked across this country.

BASH: But what started as pure praise for his running mate, has morphed into a staunch defense [...] aimed at Swing Voters, increasingly less likely to vote for McCain because of Palin. Especially, independent female voters, McCain aides had hoped she'd appeal to, like Susan McGraw.

SUSAN MCGRAW: I don't think she's ready for the Big Boys, you know, should something happen to McCain.

BASH: Palin's negatives among key voters are climbing at a stunning rate. A fresh Pew Research Center poll shows just last month, independent voters unfavorable view of Palin has spiked, going from 27% to 50%. Even more dramatic, among independent women, from 28% to 56% with an unfavorable opinion of Palin.

SARAH PALIN: Our opponent, is someone who sees America as imperfect enough to pal around with terrorists who targeted their own country.

BASH: Pew's Andrew Cohutt says rhetoric like that has backfired.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

COHUTT: Obviously she's been front and center in going after Obama, and I think it's hurt her.

BASH: And a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal Poll suggests worry about Palin's experience is really dragging McCain down. On a list of concerns about McCain, questions about Palin's qualifications ranks first, even higher than his link to Bush policies. But Palin remains wildly popular with the party's base. And republican leaders in GOP strongholds like Hamilton County, Ohio insist she's still a plus.

MARK TRIANTAFILOU: When people find out she's coming, to this region, you know, our phones ring like crazy, so we still see tremendous energy, people are excited about her candidacy.

BASH: It's a trade off that some pollsters and even some republicans say could prove too costly. Yes, McCain needs his republican base and [...] Sarah Palin helps. But, to win he needs suburban and independent voters and evidence is mounting, that with those groups, Palin hurts.

Highlight 4
Ed Rollins Writes off Burgeoning Resurgent McCarthyism as Unfortunate Blunders (CNN 10/23/08 8:57am)
KIRAN CHETRY: Republican Vice Presidential Candidate Sarah Palin took some heat this week for suggesting that there are parts of the country that are more quote Pro-American than others. She later apologized, but we've seen this topic a lot recently, last week, Minnesota Republican Congresswoman Michelle Bachmann was under fire for her controversial comments to Chris Matthews, let's listen.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: You believe that Barack Obama may, you're suspicious because this relationship may have anti-American views?

MICHELLE BACHMAN: Absolutely, I'm very concerned that he may have anti-American views.

CHETRY: Well, Bachman went on to say that the media should see, she would welcome the media looking at whether certain members of congress were Pro-American or Anti-American and yesterday she issued this apology.

BACHMANN: I want to be clear, that I don't believe that Barack Obama is anti-American, nor did I say that he is anti-American, also, I don't question Barack Obama's patriotism.

CHETRY: Michelle Bachmann is up for re-election, her congressional seat may now be up for grabs. And there's more, North Carolina Congressman Robin Hayes telling a crowd of McCain supporters last weekend, quote Folks, there's a real America and liberals hate real Americans that work and accomplish and achieve and believe in and believe in God. Now, he also apologized, saying after reading it, there's no doubt that it came out completely the wrong way, this is definitely not what I intended. So, is this a new GOP tactic, and could it work, or could it backfire? Joining us now to talk about it is Republican Strategist and CNN Contributor Ed Rollins. Are these just sort of people that the GOP in general wishes would keep quiet, or is this part of the larger strategy?

ED ROLLINS: I don't think this is part of a large strategy. I think they all wish they would have been quiet. They've all three were forced to apologize and the Congresswoman who would've sailed to election now has an opponent who has a million dollars raised in 24 hours against her, so you can't think out loud, you need to be very careful what you say. Particularly, where there's a camera everywhere, where there's an iPhone or whatever, so you have to be very careful what you say and you can't attack people's patriotism in this country.

CHETRY: So you think that just by some of the comments that she made, her congressional seat is now up for grabs?

ROLLINS: Well, the instant ability to raise money when you've got a million people on an email list who've contributed and all you need to do is send one email out and there's a million dollars there, which is makes your opponent a very competitive race.

CHETRY: You also don't need to have a lot of money to be able to turn the words of somebody else into really a commercial, if you will, and email it out...

ROLLINS: And the combination of Facebook and the combination of cable network, you can get these on cable network and have a big impact quickly.

CHETRY: [...] One republican hasn't (apologized) yet and that's Randy Kuhl of New York, and this is what his democratic opponent posted on the web:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RANDY KUHL (in Youtube vide): I firmly believe that the democratic majority wants the American public to suffer and to hurt so that they can make some political gains at election time and I think that's wrong.

ROLLINS: That's an absurd statement, I mean, no offense to the congressman, but he would have been better to argue what the democrats want to do, they want to raise your taxes, they want to spend more money but the idea that one party wants to hurt the country is just not realistic and there's a backfire to it.

Highlight #5
CNN Interview with Alan Raymond Foreshadows Potential Election Day Struggles (CNN 10/23/08 7:34am)
JIM ACOSTA: We're not going to give away exactly how Raymond (blocked NH Democrats Phone lines on Election Day) but Federal Prosecutors say two top Republican party officials hired Raymond, who then hired operators of a phone bank in Idaho to make the calls to New Hampshire. [...]Where the former Democratic Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan says the ensuing flood of hang up calls shut down her office[...]The operation also jammed the lines at this Union Hall, firefighter Jeff Duval was lining up car rides to help senior citizens to the polls.

DUVAL: It almost to me felt like an election might have been stolen.

[...]

ACOSTA: An hour and a half into the jamming operation, came this email from a republican official, who also plead guilty: "Chairman wishes not to proceed with this project, it violates federal law." The feds eventually came knocking at his office. [...]This operation didn't just effect voters in New Hampshire, the balance of power in the senate was on the line that year, and the senate race here, between democrat Jean Shaheen and Republican John Sununu was decided by just 19,000 votes.

Highlight #6
Megyn Kelly to Tucker Bounds: "Wow, OK, too long" (FNC 10/23/08 10:31)
TUCKER BOUNDS: Gotta love Joe Biden indeed. He's willing to tell the truth during the primary and during the general election. The important words that Joe Biden said is watch, the world is looking… God bless Joe Biden for telling the American people the truth, even if it was behind closed doors. People need to know that Barack Obama is a risk, he's a risk in the white house cause he doesn't have the proven experience…. There's a third person that actually ahs some input in this debate and that's Hillary Clinton. She said… that John McCain and Hillary Clinton would have a record of accomplishment and success that they would take to the White House and Barack Obama would just have a speech he would have in 2002.

[…]

We have 5 secretaries of state and 300 generals and flag officers that have endorsed Barack, John McCain, not Barack Obama… leaning on one endorsement, I've never seen a campaign lean on one endorsement so vigilantly… let's look exactly how Barack Obama has responded when he's been tested in the past. Let's look at when the American people were considering how the best way forward was in Iraq. Barack Obama opposed the surge, he said after the surge was working and we were seeing success in Iraq that he didn't want spin about the surge. He has shown, when Russia invaded a neighbor in Georgia, he told the [sic] invading country to show restraint… the third and most salient point… is that he said he would sit down unconditionally with … dictators around the world, elevating those regimes… he is not ready and if we do vote for him, we're voting a risk into the white house…

MEGYN KELLY: Wow, OK, too long.

--
Jacob Roberts
PAO
208.420.3470 (c)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/23/2015 5:53:43 AM
Subject: Fwd: Politico: Book blowback hits Clinton's NYC donor kick-off

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Jesse Lehrich <jlehrich@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Thu, Apr 23, 2015 at 12:40 PM
Subject: Politico: Book blowback hits Clinton's NYC donor kick-off
To: HRCRR <hrcrr@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >

http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/hillary-clinton-new-york-city-donor-kick-off-117281.html

Book blowback hits Clinton's NYC donor kick-off

Annie Karni and Gabriel Debenedetti

Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman John Podesta had hoped to spend Thursday morning rallying fundraisers in Manhattan – but he also found himself fielding concerns about a spate of unsettling investigations into the Clinton family's personal fundraising.

Podesta sought to energize and activate hundreds of longtime Hillary Clinton donors and bundlers for what could be the country's first $2 billion presidential campaign.

But during a question and answer period, the most pointed query from donors to Podesta was, how do we respond to questions raised by a new book linking millions in Bill Clinton speaking fees to wealthy foreign donors angling for influence with the highest-ranking officials of the U.S. government – including his wife, the former secretary of state?

During the meeting, Podesta was asked if supporters would be given potential responses to the allegations, including a Thursday report in the New York Times detailing $2.35 million in previously undisclosed contributions to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation by the owner of a Russian uranium mining company hoping to get federal approval for its U.S. operations.

Podesta, according to several attendees and Clinton staffers interviewed by POLITICO, attempted to reassure donors the campaign would respond to the allegations – without letting them interrupt what is supposed to be a month of ramping up and fundraising. "If we try to chase every media story, we chase our own tail. We're not going to do that," the donor recalled Podesta saying.

He told them that spokesman Brian Fallon had issued a very detailed response to the allegations in the book, and that negative stories and attacks were simply par for the course for the Clintons.

Fallon distributed an updated memo to the campaign's surrogates and allies on Thursday, going a few steps further than his Tuesday night memo questioning Schweizer's credibility.

Fallon's new memo labels the book a "forthcoming smear project," and name-checks GOP Sen. Rand Paul, Sean Hannity, and George W. Bush in the opening paragraph. He writes that the primary conclusion to draw is that Schweizer's book "fails to produce a shred of evidence supporting the theory that Hillary Clinton ever took action as Secretary of State for the purposes of supporting the interests of donors to the Clinton Foundation."

Over three pages of the memo – titled "It's Official: Book Attacking Hillary Clinton Full of Discredited, Disproved Attacks" – Fallon details a series of reports in Time magazine, Yahoo News, The Daily Beast, and POLITICO questioning pieces of Schweizer's reporting or conclusions.
"This isn't the first baseless smear against Hillary Clinton, and it certainly won't be the last," he writes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that might not be enough to quell the firestorm on a day when a spokesman for Clinton's foundation told Reuters that the charity would review and refile its non-profit tax forms for several recent years — to correct errors and omissions. And some longtime Clinton backers were feeling a little queasy.

"I think it should be a concern, yes. It's a legitimate concern and I think that Sec Clinton needs to be able to explain this in a straightforward, constructive, thoughtful way," said Clinton fundraiser Peter Buttenwieser, a philanthropist from Philadelphia. "And I think the sooner that she does that, the better. And I assume that she will rise to the occasion and work through this, it's part of running and I think it's critical that she do it and not wave it off."

Yet foundation officials flatly refused to address any of the allegations during a Thursday morning conference call previewing an upcoming trip to Africa by Bill and Chelsea Clinton.

The book at the heart of the controversy, "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Help Make Bill and Hillary Rich," by conservative author Peter Schweizer, is not out until May 5. But it has already emerged as a major flash point in the early days of Hillary Clinton's quest for the Democratic presidential nomination, with its examination of ties between the Clinton Foundation, the Clintons' personal wealth, and Hillary Clinton's years as head of the State Department.

Hundreds of attendees from the tri-state area came to Manhattan early Thursday morning to attend the meeting at a midtown office building, where top Clinton aides Podesta, Dennis Cheng, Robby Mook and Amanda Renteria briefed "Hillstarters" – fundraisers who the campaign is asking to raise $2,700 from 10 different people - on campaign strategy and delivered a PowerPoint presentation showing how to get people to make donations through the campaign's website.

--
Jesse Lehrich
Rapid Response
Hillary For America
781-307-2254
@JesseLehrich

--
Kristina Schake
Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
To:	"Marc Elias" <melias@perkinscoie.com> "charles baker" <charlie.baker@deweysquare.com> "Kristina Schake" <kristinakschake@gmail.com> "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	3/21/2015 1:38:17 PM
Subject:	Brock

Marc, can we communicate with Brock about getting a copy of this Clinton Cash book? We need it very urgently if possible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com> "John Podesta" <jp66@hillaryclinton.com> "Phil Schiliro" <pschiliro@sb-atalaya.com> "Heather Samuelson" <hsamuelson@cdmillsgroup.com> "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com> "Cheryl Mills" <cheryl.mills@gmail.com> "Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	1/28/2016 2:50:56 PM
Subject:	Pushback on classification & other documents
Attachments:	20160113 Officials Mentioning Drones.docx 2016128 Drone Email.docx North Korea Email.docx 2016 01 28 Overclassification.docx Bad Retro Classification.docx Shelby and Grassley Hypocrisy On Leaks.docx

Friends,

A big thanks to the team here, attached are some pushback documents that can help for tomorrow. Please let us know if we can provide any more information.

Tony

"Officials Mentioning Drones" - this doc is a collection of leading Democrats, Administration Figures, and Republicans discussing the drone program in public, in Congress, and in the Congressional Record. Please note Sen. Burr's comments in this doc.

"Drone Email" - this doc that's characterizing the alleged email discussing drone strikes in Pakistan, and what we know about it. Furthermore, it highlights several chains in HRC's emails that have been released publics where the drone strikes do appear to be discussed by knowledgeable people without TS classification.

"North Korean Email Pushback" - this doc is about one of the original alleged TS emails about the North Korean nuclear program. It has those characterizations as well a dozen instances of public reporting on the North Korean nuclear program citing satellite imagery.

"Overclassification" - this doc is a long collection of quotes and pushback from national security experts and figures attacking the problem of the overclassification and why it needs to change.

"Bad Retro Classification" - This doc is a collected examples of absurd retroactive classification, including from HRC's own emails. It also shows how over 20,000 documents have been public record to be classified later.

"Shelby and Grassley Hypocrisy" – this doc shows how Republican Senators Shelby and Grassley's push on classification is hypocritical given past stances/actions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Unruh-Cohen, Ana" <Ana.UnruhCohen@mail.house.gov>
To: Sara.Latham@ptt.gov
john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 12/13/2008 12:08:01 PM
Subject: Re:

Got it thanks

Ana Unruh Cohen, Ph.D.
Select Committee on Energy Independence
& Global Warming

From: Sara Latham
To: Unruh-Cohen, Ana; 'john.podesta@gmail.com'
Sent: Sat Dec 13 14:41:49 2008
Subject: FW: person John mentioned on the phone

From: Denis McDonough
Sent: Saturday, December 13, 2008 2:28 PM
To: Sara Latham
Subject: Re:

Adm John Nathman, 4*, excellent man. Want to take care of him. Was a navy pilot, bit is bif on nuclear power.

From: Sara Latham
To: Denis McDonough
Sent: Sat Dec 13 13:58:54 2008
Subject:

hi, John asked me to check with you - Nackman ? from the navy, 4 star general?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	1/9/2015 9:03:50 AM
Subject:	1.9.15 CTR Weekend TPs
Attachments:	1.9.15 Weekend Package.docx

Hi all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both attached and below.

1.9.15 Weekend Package

1. Hillary Clinton Tough on Terrorism
2. Secretary Clinton Stemming the Tide of Climate Change
3. ICYMI: Roll Call opinion: Rep. Tim Ryan: "Progressives Are Ready for Hillary"
4. Hillary Clinton: A Lifetime Champion of the Middle Class

TALKING POINTS: TOUGH ON TERRORISM

BACKGROUND: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.

- Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
- Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
- Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.
- Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.
- Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.
- Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.
- Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
  - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
  - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.
- Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.

- Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.

Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

TALKING POINTS: SECRETARY CLINTON STEMMING THE TIDE OF CLIMATE CHANGE

"It took a lot of work by a lot of people to create the problem of climate change over the last centuries. And it will take our very best efforts to counter it." – Secretary of State Hillary Clinton

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton looked to the future, planning for our generation and the next generation of Americans when she prioritized the fight against climate change as a matter of foreign policy.

- Secretary Clinton appointed a Special Envoy for Climate Change to serve as an advisor on international climate change policy.

- She established the Bureau of Energy Resources to address the threat of climate change posed by the world's energy consumption.

Secretary Clinton led the way through partnerships and developed incentives to encourage cooperation and progress toward reducing our footprint on the environment.

- Secretary Clinton helped negotiate an unprecedented agreement between all major economies to commit to curb carbon emissions through 2020.

- She launched the Climate and Clean Air Coalition, a thirty-seven country partnership that is making important strides to reduce methane emissions all over the world.

- Recognizing that dirty cookstoves kill nearly 2 million people a year and are harmful to the environment, Secretary Clinton took action and launched the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves in order to save lives and protect our planet.

- She signed an agreement with Brazil to strengthen cooperation as the U.S. and Brazil work together to meet the grave challenge of global climate change.

Roll Call opinion: Rep. Tim Ryan: "Progressives Are Ready for Hillary"

By Rep. Tim Ryan

January 8, 2015, 5:00 a.m. EST

The progressive values and policies that Hillary Rodham Clinton represents have Democrats and Americans across the country more excited than ever. But lately, pundits and some in the media have attempted to drive a narrative that the progressive wing of the Democratic Party is not unified behind Hillary. As a progressive myself, and one who proudly hails from the ultimate battleground state of Ohio, this could not be further from the truth. Clinton's record speaks for itself.

Progressives support Clinton because of her experience and leadership on many of the issues that matter most. In Arkansas, she expanded childhood education throughout the state. As first lady, she worked to increase access to health care for every American. As a senator, she repeatedly fought to increase the minimum wage and extend unemployment benefits. While secretary of State, she worked to empower women and expand LGBT rights and more recently, through the Clinton Foundation, she has developed initiatives to help children and low-income families.

Simply put, Clinton understands the importance of investing in the fundamental building blocks that make America the envy of the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As an economic populist, protecting and growing our economy while putting Ohioans back to work is a consistent priority of mine. Being progressive is about assuring the safety of our citizens and our economy with a strong manufacturing base, both old-line manufacturing and the newer fields of advanced and additive manufacturing. I believe we can achieve this by re-establishing the United States of America as the world's leading innovator in advanced manufacturing — with my district's national additive manufacturing and 3-D printing facility and through the No. 1 ranked university incubator in the world — both right here in Youngstown, Ohio. These types of ideas and innovation are happening in places such as Youngstown largely thanks to a long-term vision for our nation and public-private partnerships, something Clinton has spent a lifetime forging as a first lady, senator and secretary of State.

I know that Hillary Rodham Clinton shares these same progressive and American values. Throughout her career, she has consistently worked to advance middle-class families, ensuring that Ohioans and all Americans can make more money and have the means to support their families.

Democrats have unified behind Clinton in an unprecedented way, in part, because of her advocacy on these core progressive policies that ensure everyone has a fair shot at success. From the people who know her best and for those like me who have fought alongside her to ensure that everyone has access to the American Dream, there is no question that Clinton has the message and vision — and will have the agenda — to be the Democratic Party's standard bearer to lead America on the world stage.

I am ready for Hillary. Should she run for president, she would be the best person to lead our country forward. I believe her progressive and American values can lift up all Americans and I know the people of Ohio stand ready to assist her should she decide to run.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

BACKGROUND: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that hardworking Americans can succeed. In uncertain times, families need faith that opportunity for their children and grandchildren is alive and well. Hillary Clinton wants the American Dream to be a real possibility for every child and every family across our nation.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families. Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and corporations in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

BOTTOM LINE: Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, fighting to increase wages, strongly advocating for progressive tax policies and access to education and healthcare to help middle-class families – Hillary Clinton has fought for an America and a future where everyone can rise to their potential.

HILLARY CLINTON'S RECENT STATEMENTS ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

In her many public appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has continued to advocate for the middle class by sharing her vision all over the country:

In a speech to a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf, "Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start.'" According to Politico, Clinton "gave one of her strongest political speeches since her 2008 campaign ended in June 2008 as she headlined a women-focused event for Democratic gubernatorial Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania. Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start,' as well as women's pay equity and her gauzy first days as a new grandmother. For the first time in months, Clinton's public talk was neither a dry recitation of public policy nor a self-reflection about her tenure as secretary of state." [Politico , 10/9/14]

Clinton's language at a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf was "some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class." According to Politico, "The remarks were some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class. They came after she was accused of being out of touch for her comment in June about being 'dead broke' when she left the White House, and for giving paid speeches at exorbitant prices." [Politico , 10/9/14]

The theme of Clinton's speech at an event for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf was working families. According to BuzzFeed, "The thread running through Clinton's message here in Pennsylvania, the state she won six years ago in a primary against Barack Obama, was working families — a theme she teased repeatedly throughout her speech with populist undertones, mentions of her granddaughter, and stories about her own trips as a child to Scranton, where Clinton's father, Hugh, was born to a working-class immigrant family." [BuzzFeed , 9/9/14]

In Pennsylvania, Clinton criticized the power of corporations, siding with middle-class families. According to the Wall Street Journal, "Though she and her husband have raised more than $1 billion from U.S. companies and corporate officials over the last two decades, Mrs. Clinton signaled that she sided with everyday families struggling to pay bills and keep afloat. Corporations, she said, 'seem to have all the rights, but none of the responsibilities of people …' She decried practices that pay women less than men for the same work and took aim at politicians who've belittled women's rights. 'A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families,' she said." [Wall Street Journal , 9/9/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she would fight to restore and re-open the middle class. According to TPM, "The notion of 'upward mobility' was central to Clinton's message to the New American audience in May. She described it as 'time-tested wisdom' that was 'at the heart of what I believe is the basic bargain of America.'… Here is how Clinton described that basic bargain of America, as she sees it, in May: 'No matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you'll have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she can address income inequality and gender inequality. According to TPM, "So income inequality has been a big part of the message. But it's also been married to inequality between the sexes. At both the New American and CAP events, the same factoid made an appearance: That three-quarters of jobs that rely on tips -- like 'waiters, bartenders and hairstylists' as she said on both occasions -- are held by women…. And she said Thursday that these issues should be used to mobilize voters -- in the 2014 midterms and moving forward." [TPM , 9/22/14]

In recent speeches, Clinton has taken a tougher stance on big business, likely in "an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism" she may need in 2016, according to Reuters. According to Reuters, "Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country.… This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs (GS.N) chief executive Lloyd Blankfein. Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest." [Reuters , 11/2/14]

During a New Hampshire midterm event, Clinton discussed expanding economic opportunity and raising the minimum wage. According to the Boston Globe, "Clinton spoke in New Hampshire about expanding economic opportunity, raising the minimum wage, and protecting women's rights. She acknowledged that, across the country, there is 'a lot of anxiety and insecurity.' But the former secretary of state and US senator from New York struck a hopeful note: She bookended her remarks talking about her new granddaughter and said seeing another generation in the family focuses the mind on what's important. Clinton said she and her husband were raised to believe the American Dream was within your reach if you worked hard. 'You should not,' Clinton told a packed gymnasium, 'have to be the grandchild of a governor or a senator or a former secretary of state or a former president to believe that the American Dream is in your reach.'" [Boston Globe , 11/2/14]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In midterm campaign appearances, Clinton has been echoing populist notes. According to Bloomberg, Clinton "has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America…. And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash." [Bloomberg, 10/27/14]

During a midterm appearance in New York, Clinton clarified earlier comments about companies and job creation, while maintaining the same theme: "Clinton's for the little guy." According to Bloomberg, "Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to 'be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades.' 'So-called trickle-down economics has failed,' Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. 'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.' While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, 'Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.'…The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

While campaigning for Democrats in the midterm election, Clinton frequently tells voters that "everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance." According to a CNN, an investigation into Clinton's most common lines on the trail found that Clinton frequently tells voters, "'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance...' Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on. 'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves,' Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. 'That was one of the most important lessons of my life.' Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too." [CNN , 10/28/14]

In a San Francisco speech, Clinton revealed some of what may be her economic message: "Who's on your side?" According to the Washington Post, "Here in San Francisco on Monday, Clinton gave a spirited call to arms to Democrats as she road-tested what is likely to be her economic message if she runs again. The November midterms, she said, come down 'to a simple question: Who's on your side?' She sounded close to her party's populist marrow when she decried the erosion of economic security for many working Americans, and a long way from her tone-deaf remark earlier this year about being 'dead broke' when she and Bill Clinton left the White House in 2000. 'It's time to elect leaders who will fight for everyone to get a fair shot at the American dream,' Hillary Clinton said." [Washington Post , 10/21/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she could finish the economic recovery begun by Obama. According to TPM, "Clinton seems to have a handle of the line she wants to toe: Obama saved us from worse economic struggles (as his defenders have been saying for years), but the work isn't over. Implicit, of course, is that she -- if she runs -- would finish the job. 'We haven't seen a full recovery from the economic crash,' Clinton said Thursday at CAP. 'When the president came in, he deserves an enormous amount of credit for staunching the bleeding and preventing a further deterioration and getting us out of that ditch we were in. But we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared.' 'It's not just about more jobs for more people and better paying jobs,' she said. 'It's making sure that the people themselves get to keep those benefits and build that future back that they are so desperate to see for themselves.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

In an interview with PBS this summer, Hillary said : "Bill and I have had terrific opportunities, both of us…have worked hard, but we've been grateful for everything that we've been able to achieve, and sadly that's just not true for most Americans today…It's important that we all try to figure out what we're going to do, and that's what I've done my entire life, fighting for a higher minimum wage, or family leave…equal pay for equal work…I think my record speaks for itself."

At a speech at the Aspen Ideas Festival in June, Hillary said : "At the end of the day, we're all on the same team. We're on the American team. And we've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing again and producing results and renewing the American Dream so that Americans feel that they have a stake in the future and that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 7/16/2008 3:30:18 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 07/16/08

Main Topics: McCain's NAACP Speech, McCain and National Security, Romney Inteviews, New Ads Attacking McCain

Summary of Shift: Heavy McCain coverage devoted to his NAACP convention speech. McCain's attempt to woo African American voters was scrutinized as a new poll suggested only 2 percent of that electorate said they would vote for him. The other big McCain headline concerned national security. McCain's claim to add more troops to Afghanistan was examined with some questioning just where these troops are going to come from. There's also a new poll suggesting that McCain has the clear advantage on such issues, but Obama is starting to make headway on the issue. Planned Parenthood's new ad criticizing McCain's gaffe on Viagra and warning women that McCain is oblivious on their issues, got a lot of earned media attention. Mitt Romney made the rounds, talking on all the cable networks and his changing relationship with McCain was investigated.

Tonight's other headlines concerned the state of the economy. Inflation is up, crude oil was down, and the market made big gains today. The state of Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, and the nation's bank systems are still being heavily talked about. Obama continues to be called a flip-flopper. And the Bush administration changes their policy and opens up discussion with Iran, sending the Undersecretary of State to meet with Iranian leadership.

Highlights:

1. McCain's Speech at NAACP Conference Scrutinized
a. CNN: McCain's Attempts to Woo Black Voters at NAACP Conference Scrutinized
b. MSNBC: McCain Looking for White Voters with NAACP Speech
2. CNN: McCain's National Security Advantage and How Obama is Going After It
3. MSNBC: Is the Surge Working and Where are the Troops for Afghanistan Going to Come From?
4. Romney Makes Rounds Stumping For McCain
a. CNN: Romney Interview on CNN; Discusses Economy Difference Between McCain and Bush, and More
b. FNC: Romney Interview: "We Should Be Drilling Everywhere We Can"
c. MSNBC: Romney Boosts McCain's Military Strategy, Attacks Obama's
5. CNN: McCain and Romney's Evolving Relationship Examined; From Foes to Friends, To More?
6. CNN: Surrogates Get Segment Devoted to all Their Gaffes
7. New Ads Attacking McCain Get Earned Media Attention
a. CNN: New Planned Parenthood Ad Played and Discussed on Situation Room
b. MSNBC: Pariser Explains Thrust of New MoveOn Ad
8. MSNBC: RNC Chair Dodges Questions about McCain's Policy on Birth Control by Touting McCain's Health Care Policy
9. MSNBC: McCain's Campaign Has a History of Fudging Policy Numbers
10. MSNBC: John McCain Can't Seem to Sell Himself as Change Candidate
11. MSNBC: McCain needs to emphasize his life story more (No Clip)
12. MSNBC: McCain's disconnect with the present century not that important (No Clip)

Clips:

Highlight #1
McCain's Attempts to Woo Black Voters at NAACP Conference Scrutinized (CNN, 07/16/08, 4:03pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] John McCain confronts a huge political problem head on. Today he gave an enthusiastic speech in front of a less than enthusiastic audience of African Americans, meeting with the nation's oldest civil rights group. He's trying to win them over and he's trying to win over other African American's as well. But by several indicators he's looking at a rather steep uphill battle. […] So how did he do in front of the NAACP convention today, Dana?

DANA BASH: Well he did basically what he had to do, and actually something that we're told he was urged to do by several prominent black republicans who met with John McCain last week and urged him not to give up on the black vote. He came in part because of that, and in part to beef up his brand as someone willing to reach out.

If your audience is the NAACP and your opponent would be the first black president, you start here.

JOHN MCCAIN: Don't tell him I said this, but he's an impressive fellow in many ways.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BASH: That was John McCain's biggest applause line, an icebreaker about Barack Obama. Who got a thunderous reception two days earlier. McCain was greeted by mostly polite clapping. One person, so indifferent he read the paper. McCain came armed with new education initiatives.

MCCAIN: The worst problems of our public school system are often found in black communities.

BASH: He pushed merit pay for teachers and his Obama for opposing school vouchers.

MCCAIN: All that went over well with the teacher's union, but where does it lead families and their children who are stuck in failing schools?

BASH: The reaction, dead silence. McCain's chances at winning black votes are incredibly steep. A fresh New York Times poll shows 89 percent of black voters support Obama. Just 2 percent say they'll vote for McCain.

MCCAIN: Whether or not I win your support, I need your goodwill and your council.

BASH: But McCain came looking for mostly just that, goodwill, to show he's a different kind of republican. After George Bush was elected he did not attend the NAACP conference for six years. McCain came and even opened it up for questions, knowing he get some tough ones. Like from this teacher in an Obama t-shirt, who says teachers can't afford food.

TEACHER: What are you going to do Senator? We can't continue this way.

MCCAIN: I want to reward good teachers.

BASH: If nothing else here, kudos for coming.

GRETCHEN WOODS: After hearing him today, I may listen to him again.

BASH: Now democrats were quick to send out a list of black forums this campaign season that John McCain has skipped. But many NAACP members that we spoke to after this speech said they don't plan to vote for Senator McCain but they do respect him for coming, and especially for taken questions. That's something, Wolf, that Obama did not do.

McCain Looking for White Voters with NAACP Speech (MSNBC 07/16/08 5:55pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: . . . I'm a little bit Machiavellian about this, although a do completely salute that performance . . . you know, I think he wants to make sure he seems like a person who has no ethnic problem in this race. That he's not going to exploit in anyway the differences in our backgrounds and I think that helps him with white voters to be blunt about it.

JOAN WALSH: I think it does too. A lot of Republicans were really irritated by the failure of the Bush administration to go to the NAACP regularly, to meet with black leaders because it plays well with white, to be honest, independents who want to believe we're a society with a lot more racial harmony than we have. So I think he did a great job. It was probably Maciavellian, he is running for president, he is a politician. But, it was a nice moment . . .

MATTHEWS: Are you talking about my hero, Machiavelli?

WALSH: Nothing wrong with that, no.

Highlight #2
McCain's National Security Advantage and How Obama is Going After It (CNN, 07/16/08, 7:05pm)
BILL SCHNEIDER: On Tuesday Barack Obama gave his big speech on Iraq and Afghanistan. John McCain's response? Obama doesn't know anything.

MCCAIN: Why not take your first trip ever to Afghanistan before you come out with a speech on what we need to do? I mean, it's remarkable, I've never seen anything like it.

SCHNEIDER: McCain has extensive military experience. 11 officers signed a letter endorsing him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OFFICERS: He's experience, he's well-liked, and he knows what he's talking about.

SCHNEIDER: Nearly 3/4 's of Americans believe McCain would make a good commander in chief. Obama has no military experience, voters are not sure whether he would make a good commander in chief. As a result, McCain has the advantage on national security issues, like terrorism and handling a national crisis. Obama opposed the troop surge in Iraq, but now acknowledges that violence has declined.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama refuses to acknowledge that he was wrong.

SCHNEIDER: Obama claims he was right. Not because the surge didn't work, but because it was a dangerous distraction.

[…]

Right now, Obama and McCain are rated at about the same on Iraq, Iran, and international affairs. Which means he has neutralized McCain's advantage on foreign policy. And he's trying to do the same thing on national security. […] McCain is trying to triple demonstrate to those same independent voters how little he knows.

Highlight #3

Is the Surge Working and Where are the Troops for Afghanistan Going to Come From? (MSNBC 07/16/08 5:18pm)

CRHIS MATTHEWS: The surge of US troops in Iraq is coming to an end . . . did it work? Did it create a strong Iraqi government? . . . back two years ago this country was on the [verge] of getting out of Iraq and the President made the case, before we leave, let's make one big last hurrah . . . has that succeeded . . . ?

JOHN SOLTZ: It's never succeeded. From a tactical level, sure you put the best American troops on the ground and you take names and you clear streets but the Iraqis want us out of Iraq. So the major reason it failed is Afghanistan is a two brigade mission, a three brigade mission, if you had taken those five combat brigades that you'd sent to Iraq for the surge and you'd sent them to Afghanistan, you would have . . . seven brigades on the ground in Afghanistan . . . so the surge is a policy of retreat that George W. Bush and John McCain have supported against al-Qaeda and bin Laden . . . it's been a failure.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Your verdict on the goal of the surge. Has it been met?

ERIC EGLAND: Yes, Chris, we've made tremendous progress in the last sixteen months.

MATTHEWS: At what? At what? At giving the government in that country a chance to form itself?

EGLAND: Sure, yeah . . . improved security situation and improved political progress . . . the political progress on the ground at the local level has been tremendous and that has bubbled up . . . that's why it's a little hard for people to answer that question who answer it out of ideology to not be able to admit that hey, we have made tremendous progress out there.

[. . .]

MATTHEWS: Lets take a look at what Sen. McCain said yesterday . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: It's by applying the tried and true principles of counterinsurgency used in the surge . . . that we will win in Afghanistan. With the right strategy and the right forces we can succeed in both Iraq and Afghanistan and they are not disconnected . . . I know how to win wars. I know how to win wars. If I'm elected president, I'll turn around the war in Afghanistan just as we have turned around the war in Iraq with a comprehensive strategy for victory. I know how to do that.

MATTHEWS: Of course the question it holds there . . . if we won the war in Iraq we'd be coming home by now. He didn't win the war in Viet Nam, we lost the war in Viet Nam in terms of our ambitions there. So what wars have we won under John McCain? . . . you could argue that the surge has left has an environment over there where maybe the government can get its act together. But that's not done yet. We haven't done that yet.

[. . .]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SOLTZ: John McCain is a man who's caused this country to lose a war in Afghanistan by being obsessed with Iraq. He's plan yesterday that he released to counter Sen. Obama's plan. It was like amateur hour over at the McCain campaign. You can't increase the size of the army, stay in Iraq a hundred years and send three more combat brigades to Afghanistan without the draft—

MATTHEWS: Ok, that's the question . . . can we fight the war in Iraq on the level we're fighting it and fight the war in Afghanistan on the level we have to?

SOLTZ: Absolutely not you can't do it. That's why the Obama campaign has a realistic plan and Sen. McCain has amateur hour that leads us to the draft.

[. . .]

EGLAND: Yeah. With the current facts on the ground I think we can. Gains in Iraq means we can continue to bring home those surge forces which will free up forces that we can use in Afghanistan . . . these are dynamic battle grounds and we need leaders who are open to the facts on the ground as they change. . .

[. . .]

SOLTZ: The bottom line is the McCain camp plan doesn't add up. You either have to have a draft or adopt Sen. Obama's position. That's why yesterday they backtracked from sending three combat brigades there to send NATO troops. It's amateur hour at the McCain campaign. They've supported a policy of retreat with bin Laden for the last six years with George Bush.

Highlight #4

Romney Interview on CNN; Discusses Economy Difference Between McCain and Bush, and More (CNN, 07/16/08, 4:30pm)

WOLF BLITZER: Let's talk about issue number 1, the economy right now. Obama keeps saying, if you like President Bush's economic policies, vote for John McCain because you are going to get a whole lot more of the same. With the exception of McCain being much tougher on pet projects, pork barrel spending, is there any real difference between McCain and Bush on the economy?

MITT ROMNEY: Well, the answer is of course, but of course the greatest difference is between McCain and Barack Obama. But with regards to Bush, first of all, he will cut spending, not just on pork barrel projects but discretionary council will be cut back. He'll also cut back on entitlement excesses and then he's going to go after our energy policy in a very aggressive way, by making sure that we one, get a cap and trade program. But also, he's going to develop nuclear power, wind power, solar power, additional drilling in this country, offshore, it's an entirely different approach to energy, it's getting us energy independent. And with regards to trade, he does believe in trade around the world, but trade that's fair, that protects American jobs.

BLITZER: But so does President Bush.

ROMNEY: But the big difference between John McCain and Barack Obama is with Barack Obama. That's where the big difference lies. Where Barack Obama wants to raise taxes, John McCain wants to lower them. John McCain unlike either the President or Barack Obama, has said lets lower taxes on middle income Americans. $2700 dollar a year savings by getting rid of the AMT, as well as doubling the personnel exemption.

BLITZER: But Barack Obama says you're only going to be paying more taxes if you make more than $250,000 dollars a year. If you're a middle class income tax payer, you're going to have a cut in taxes. He says McCain will have a bonanza for rich people, he will have a savings for the middle class.

ROMNEY: You know, sweet talk is awful nice, but it doesn't compare with straight talk. And in the case of John McCain, he said look, the tax changes he's going to put in place are changes to reduce taxes for middle income Americans. And Barack Obama's been all over with regards to taxes, but I do understand that he voted this year twice to increase taxes on people making $32,000 dollars a year and above. So he's not a guy who's going to shy away from more government spending and more government taxing. So they come from different places in regards to taxes. From energy they're miles apart. Where Barack Obama says we can't drill offshore, and John McCain says we can and should. And John McCain want to fast track nuclear power plants, so there's a big difference.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]

BLITZER: Let me ask you this, if you're the vice president of the United States and they say go ahead and meet with the Iranian leadership, are you ready to do that?

ROMNEY: Well, first I'm going to reject the hypothesis that I'm the vice president of the United States. But I can tell you that whoever is the vice president of the United States is going to take their signals from whoever the president is and he'll follow the president or she'll follow the president's guide, whether or not he agrees with it. When you're the vice president, you do what you are told.

BLITZER: Fair point. Let's talk about another sensitive issue that's come up over the past few days. The issue of gay adoption. John McCain told the New York Times he opposes adoption by homosexual couples, although the campaign later said they wanted to clarify, saying that this should really be an issue left up to the states. What do you think about this whole issue?

ROMNEY: You know, I know exactly just how Senator McCain feels on this, and I think most Americans feel the same way. Which is that we recognize that the ideal setting for raising a child is where there is a mom and a dad. And the great majority of states recognize that as well. But typically states have said, look, we're encourage adoptions where there's a mom and a dad, but we're not going to make it illegal for other circumstances for adoption to occur as well and we're going to let the courts decide what's in the best interest of the child. And so, you don't make it illegal necessarily, or have a national policy that says you can't have gay adoption. You let the states decide what's in the best interest of the child. And that's, as I understand it, about where Senator McCain is on this issue.

BLITZER: Is that ok for you, if whatever state said, you know what it's fine for gay couples to adopt kids, that would be ok with you?

ROMNEY: I didn't oppose that here in Massachusetts, my view was the best setting for a child to be raised is when there's a mom and a dad, but I did not say lets put in place a law that would prevent a court from deciding that a child instead of being in an orphanage should be with a same sex couple or with a single mom or a single dad. You leave that up to the court, and let them make the decision.

BLITZER: A lot of people are suggesting that you're the front runner right now for John McCain's running mate. Have you already started being vetted, in other words, have you been asking, asked questions, are you submitting documents, IRS returns, has that process already started?

ROMNEY: Well, first of all, with regards to all the people who might be on some sort of a short list, the only one that really counts in that regard is John McCain, and I don't think he's told anybody what his thinking is. And with regards to a vetting process, you know, anything of that nature, I'm going to direct to the McCain campaign, I don't want to engage in any speculation with regards to the V.P. sweepstakes. And my own view is, I expect to support the administration and the McCain team. I don't expect to be a part of it.

Romney Interview: "We Should Be Drilling Everywhere We Can" (FNC, 07/16/08, 1:36pm)
MARTHA CROWLEY: There was an article out there today and the headline of it says, will Romney's combative style net him a V.P. nod? I'm not sure if you saw that but they're calling you combative for these kind of statements as the one I just referenced. What do you think about that?

ROMNEY: Oh, I'm an awful sweet guy. You wouldn't consider me combative, would you?

[…]

John McCain has been a leader in his last 25 years in the senate, and after that his military record, not just in Vietnam but in his long service is that of a leader and in a time like this, we need a leader.

CROWLEY: At a time like this, a lot of people say we need somebody who knows what is going on in the economy. There's a fear in this country that the banks may be seriously in trouble. What would you do, what would you advise in handling, what's the first thing you would you say we got to do to get this thing under control?

ROMNEY: Well, I think it is important for people to understand that the federal government does stand behind our banks, and their deposits in our banks are safe. And then there are banks, if you will, quasi-financial institutions like Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, where these banks are providing, if you will, the kind of strength to stand behind our mortgages and keep our mortgage market alive and strong. And the federal government has said, hey we're standing behind you guys as well. It's been very clear that the federal government and federal reserve are going to stand behind the lending institutions in this country. People don't need to worry about losing their deposits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CROWLEY: But Governor, let me ask you something, in your very savvy financial mind in your own life, have you changed anything? Are you concerned about it? Have the moved anything into more conservative investments for a little bit more cash, anything along those lines?

ROMNEY: No, haven't made any changes in that nature. My investments are held in a blind trust, so I don't get the chance to do that anyways. But I can tell you this, this is a time when people are looking to make sure that their investments are held wisely, and people who are investing in American corporations and financial institutions, I have every reason to believe if they're well managed that they will do fine. But Americans are hurting because of high gas prices and Americans are hurting because they see the value of their home having taken a dip. And of course, their savings have also declined in value in the stock market, and I have to tell you, we are going to have to make sure that we finally take action, particularly on the energy front.

CROWLEY: […] I want to know what you think about drilling in Anwr. Is that something we should we be doing right now?

ROMNEY: We should be drilling everywhere we can. Where states agree and where it's environmentally acceptable and appropriate. We should also be developing our wind sources, our solar resources. We should be taking off the tariff on ethanol so that we can bring ethanol into the country from Brazil and other places. We should, if you will, pushing every button. Nuclear power, everything we can to develop our own sources of energy, near term and long term. That'll help bring the prices down.

CROWLEY: […] Are you advising John McCain, when you have talks with him, and I assume that you do talk to him about these things, we need to drill in Anwr. Is that something you have encouraged him to do?

ROMNEY: I haven't advised Senator McCain on policy issues. He keeps his own counsel in that regard, but I do favor personally drilling in Anwr. And the people in Alaska favor doing so. And Senator McCain said he would take a close look at that. You're going to see John McCain layout an energy policy which gets America energy secure. And that means using ever source of energy we possibly can find. Of course it's going to be a collaboration with states, but states want to see the drilling as well.

Romney Boosts McCain's Military Strategy, Attacks Obama's (MSNBC 07/16/08 1:50pm)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Let's just get it over with . . . are you being vetted?

BRZEZINSKI: The whole vetting process is something you have to talk to the McCain campaign about . . . I'll tell you this, I expect to be working for the McCain team. I don't expect to be part of it.

[. . .]

ROMNEY: . . . I think what you'll see as we're dealing with the economy that it's McCain versus Obama and Obama's saying raise taxes. McCain is saying lower them. McCain is right. Obama is saying let's cut back on trade with other nations. McCain is saying, no, no, no, trade is a great source of vitality and growth for America. McCain is right. Obama is saying, with regards to energy, we can't drill for additional oil, we can't have extra nuclear power plants. He's wrong on that. McCain is saying drill for oil, fast track nuclear power plants as well as solar and wind. McCain is right on the economic issues of the day and that's why he'll win on the economy.

BRZEZINSKI: Both candidates are focusing on Afghanistan. During today's Obama campaign conference call, Susan Rice slammed McCain's position. Take a listen to this:

SUSAN RICE: Yesterday he woke up and came to the sudden conclusion that indeed Afghanistan merited more strategic focus, something that the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has been saying for months. And that he would, therefore, be willing to put in additional combat brigades. But then he got confused again as to whether those needed to be American or NATO or some combination thereof and it leaves you all, and us, wondering what his strategic rationale is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: . . . how do you respond to attacks on McCain's rationale here and is he flip-flopping?

ROMNEY: You know, I sure hope the Obama campaign plans to focus on the military strategy . . . I'm afraid it's a losing battle for them. John McCain understands military strategy. He, after all, was the person who offered, some time ago the philosophy that said a surge would work in Iraq and that said that Rumsfeld needed to go and, you know what? He ended up being right and Barack Obama said the surge would not work. . . . John McCain has been talking about Afghanistan for a long, long time even during the debates . . . he talked about Afghanistan and his posture there is absolutely right. Look, he understands what it takes to be successful on foreign battlefields because he has been there, he's been trained there and Barack Obama hasn't. And if it's going to be an issue of foreign policy and keeping Americans safe there's no question who comes out ahead.

Highlight #5

McCain and Romney's Evolving Relationship Examined; From Foes to Friends, To More? (CNN, 07/16/08, 4:04pm)

WOLF BLITZER: By political standards it's among one of the most closely guarded secrets, John McCain's list of people he's considering for vice president. There's wild speculation about this out there about who might be on that list. But one name is getting a lot more buzz than some of the others. […] And we're specifically speaking about Mitt Romney.

TOM FOREMAN: Yeah, Mitt Romney, he's really rising up here. He and John McCain have gone from being political foes to friends, the question is will they go much further than that?

MITT ROMNEY: Senator McCain said that the economy is not his strong suit. It is my strong suit, I can tell you that.

FOREMAN: That was then, and this is now.

ROMNEY: If you take Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama's experience and multiply it by ten you still haven't caught up with Senator McCain when it comes to experience on the economy.

FOREMAN: Back in the heat of the primaries, former Massachusetts Governor, Mitt Romney, was one Senator John McCain's fiercest rivals, ROMNEY: You know, he was against the Bush tax cuts, and now he's for making them permanent. He was for McCain/Kennedy, now he's for a new program for immigration. He's changed his view on issue, after issue.

FOREMAN: But after Romney dropped his bid for the White House back in February, he backed McCain. He's held fundraisers for him and has become one of McCain's biggest surrogates.

ROMNEY: You're finding in our party, that people are rallying strongly around Senator McCain.

FOREMAN: In fact, this week McCain joked about all of Romney's help.

MCCAIN: I am appreciative every time I see Mitt on television on my behalf. He does a better job for me than he did for himself as a matter of fact.

FOREMAN: Romney's also considered to be a potential running mate. A job he seems to be interested in. But McCain remains coy.

MCCAIN: Millions of republicans voted for him. And so, obviously I think he would be a consideration for a lot of different roles in a republican administration.

FOREMAN: Well, there a lot of positives with Mitt Romney, including the fact that he's already been thoroughly vetted because of his own campaign run. He's got family ties to Michigan which is an important battleground state. And, never hurts in a campaign, he's a good looking guy. […]

Highlight #6

Surrogates Get Segment Devoted to all Their Gaffes (CNN, 07/16/08, 9:12pm)

JESSICA YELLIN: They're meant to vouch for the candidate.

LINDSAY GRAHAM: There has never been a better commander in chief candidate than John McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

YELLIN: Sell the campaign line in an ever expanding universe of political photo ops and t.v. smackdowns. They are campaign surrogates, and this year, we're learning that sometimes they do more harm than good. We see surrogates go off the reservation, like John McCain's economic advisor, Phil Gramm.

PHIL GRAMM: We've sort of become a nation of whiners.

YELLIN: A nation of whiners? Not helpful. It threw McCain off message and McCain threw Gramm under the bus.

JOHN MCCAIN: Phil Gramm does not speak for me. I speak for me.

[…]

YELLIN: Then there's the cringe factor. McCain surrogate, former CEO Carly Fiorina complained about health care plans that pay for men's Viagra but not women's birth control. That created quite the awkward moment for McCain when he was asked his views on that subject.

[Awkward McCain Viagra Clip Shown]

[…]

YELLIN: Sometimes, on the spot, surrogates can't find the right words. Like republican South Carolina Governor Mark Stanford. Asked to name a single policy between McCain and President Bush.

GOV. MARK STANFORD: Uh, take for instance, the, the issue of, uh, of um, I'm drawing a blank. And I hate it when I do that, particularly when I'm on television. […]

YELLIN: Not good. As election day approaches, expect to see more surrogates get the old heave ho.

ROGER SIMON: I think the campaigns are going to decide, you know, it's just easier to run another t.v. commercial then send a surrogate out on the stump.

YELLIN: Of course, certain surrogates are here to stay. They can't be thrown under the bus no matter how much controversy they kick up.

[…]

Highlight #7
New Planned Parenthood Ad Played and Discussed on Situation Room (CNN, 07/16/08, 4:47pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] First I want to get to the internet buzz that's out there about a new anti-McCain ad that's just out from Planned Parenthood. […]

ABBI TATTON: Wolf, it was an uncomfortable moment for Senator John McCain on the campaign trail last week. Asked about insurance plans that cover Viagra but not Birth Control. And now Planned Parenthood wants women voters to see it.

[Planned Parenthood McCain/Viagra Ad Shown]

TATTON: That ad is from the political arm of Planned Parenthood. They say it's going to be running in six battleground states and they are going right after women voters on this. It's going to be airing during Oprah in select markets and also in shows like Lifetime's "Army Wives".

[…]

BLITZER: What do you think, is this an issue he can put behind him?

DICK ARMEY: Well, I don't know. It's too bad he didn't realize, the correct answer was that it's not the government's business to issue mandates about private insurance companies. Unlike my opponent, I do not believe in government mandates on health insurance. I think he was taken by surprise, the question was such an inane and inappropriate question. It would have caught about anybody from surprise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: Why's it inappropriate? If some insurance companies will reimburse for Viagra but they won't reimburse for birth control?

ARMEY: In the private insurance market you get the coverage you pay for, and you should be free to stipulate the coverage you want. And my guess is that at John McCain's age, he's too old for birth control, and too young for Viagra. He's probably not given any thought to either one.

BLITZER: Well, I don't know about his personal predilections, but go ahead.

PAUL BEGALA: I don't want to know. I'm a democrat though, we make love, not war. And my republican friends can't do either, actually, if you look at the status of things in around the world. This is enormously problematic. This is a man, Senator McCain, who recently said he didn't know anything about the economy. Now he apparently doesn't know anything about procreation either. I mean, what does he know? It's a wonderful ad for Planned Parenthood. The left, and particularly the feminist movement, has often been criticized for lacking a sense of humor. Well, this is hilarious, if unintentionally so from Senator McCain. It's the fairest attack you can wage, is putting someone's own words and in this case 8 seconds of deadly silence, about an issue that every family deals with family planning for goodness sakes. The notion that he doesn't know anything about that is really problematic for McCain.

BLITZER: Is it going to hurt him?

ARMEY: I don't think it will hurt him because of the constituency that will be entertained by this ad is probably constituents he wouldn't vote at all. On the other hand, it might in fact help him. There's a big constituency that's had a little bit of doubt from the Christian right about whether or not he's their guy, and they might like him. But you know, it falls within the intellectual framework of asking a person what kind of underwear they wear. Quite frankly, the point still remains it's not the Federal Government's business to mandate health insurance coverage, and in a free market you can buy the coverage you want.

BEGALA: It's not a private matter, it's a public policy issue. You believe, that it's not the government's business, I believe it is. But that's why we have debates and elections. That's why politicians ought to know enough about the real lives of real people to have a position on something like this. I gotta tell you, this is something that effects people's lives and McCain is completely out of touch.

Pariser Explains Thrust of New MoveOn Ad (MSNBC 07/16/08 4:03pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: This was a big day in the world of campaign advertising, two independent democrat groups unveiled new ads attacking John McCain. Planned Parenthood is taking issue with McCain's refusal to answer a question last week about whether its fair for health insurance to cover Viagra but not birth control. And MoveOn.org is now running an ad focused on Iraq.

[MoveOn ad plays]

SHUSTER: . . . I do think the ad is effective but putting that aside for a second, Barack Obama has asked independent 527 groups not to run ads. MoveOn is not a 527 but did you have any second thoughts about this?

ELI PARISER: Well no. We're an issue group and our job is to educate the public about where the candidates stand on our issue . . . the difference couldn't be clearer between John McCain who basically wants to keep us in Iraq for a long time to come and Barack Obama who's got a plan to get us out.

SHUSTER: . . . is it fair to say John McCain will keep our troops in Iraq for years and years? I mean, he has said repeatedly that as the situation improves the troops will start to be brought home.

PARISER: . . . if you look at John McCain's policy, it's exactly the same thing that we've heard from President Bush for the last four years or more . . . John McCain has said when violence is up we need to stay, when violence is down he says we need to stay . . . it all adds up to a policy that really will keep us in Iraq for a long time because there's no plan to get us out.

[. . .]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #8

RNC Chair Dodges Questions about McCain's Policy on Birth Control by Touting McCain's Health Care Policy (MSNBC 07/16/08 4:14pm)

JOHN MCCAIN: He's inspired a great many Americans, some of whom have wrongly believed that a political campaign could hold no meaning or purpose for them. The success should make Americans, all Americans proud. Sen. Obama talks about making history, and he's made quite a bit of it already.

DAVID SHUSTER: That was John McCain today . . . at the NAACP . . . Mike Duncan is chairman of the Republican National Committee and he joins us now to talk about Sen. McCain and other issues . . . has it been a mistake over the past eight years for President Bush to speak to the NAACP so infrequently?

MICHAEL DUNCAN: The Republican party reaches out on a daily basis to all Americans and President Bush has done that. He's done that that through his appointment process, he's done that through his policies that empower more people. His education policies, his small business policies. He speaks with Americans of both leaders and members of groups all the time. And I was very pleased today that John McCain was at the NAACP convention in Cincinnatti. He talked about hope and opportunity, he talked about the importance of education and I think it was a good day for the McCain campaign.

SHUSTER: Well, I suppose it's a good day given that President Bush in 2004 said that his relationship with the NAACP was "basically nonexistent" and there was John McCain today praising the group . . . the Republican Party has also had some difficulties, and not just with African Americans voters but also women voters in recent elections. We mentioned at the top of the hour, there's some independent groups running ads against McCain. Planned Parenthood is now running this ad against John McCain. Watch and I'll get your reaction.

[Planned Parenthood ad plays]

SHUSTER: Well chairman, maybe that ad wasn't fair but John McCain didn't answer the question. But maybe you can. Do you think it's fair or unfair when health insurance covers Viagra but not birth control?

DUNCAN: Well let me just tell you, this is what the 527s are doing to this campaign. John McCain, when he became the nominee talked to me about running this campaign on issues and a respectful campaign. You saw that today with his comments about Barack Obama. You've seen it in our demeanor in this campaign. This is typical of 527s and what they're trying to do. We want to talk about the big ideas like energy and energy process. We want to talk about the economy. We wanted to talk about education. And those are the kinds of things this campaigns going to be run on, it's not going to be run by third party organizations.

SHUSTER: Well clearly education is a concern for women but women are also concerned about what they see as unfairness in the way government and insurance treats them. What's the Republican Party's response?

DUNCAN: My response is that this campaign's going to be about all people. It's not going to be about one segment of society and pitting one segment against another segment. We want to talk about what's relevant to people everyday. We want to talk about the gas prices. We want to talk about healthcare issues and how we talk about how we provide choice in healthcare and we the patients and the doctors more involved in healthcare. These are the kinds of things that we want to talk about in the campaign and not to have the agenda set by special interest groups and third parties which are spending millions and will spend millions of dollars for Sen. Barack Obama in this campaign.

SHUSTER: Well, there is one third party down in Florida that's created a stir. A businessman in St. Cloud Florida paid for a billboard ad. And here it is. You see the Twin Towers burning and the message, "Please Don't Vote for a Democrat." The businessman says he was trying to help his party, the GOP. What's your reaction to this?

DUNCAN: Well, look, I would disavow Republican third party organizations that go too far, that bring race or bring hatred into a campaign, we're about issues and that's what we want this campaign to be about. This is a historic election. We have a star contrast between the Republicans and the Democrats. John McCain is offering solutions to the country. Barack Obama is great with his rhetoric but we want to know where he stands. He keeps changing his positions, he's moving on from one position to another position. So, that's what we want to talk about in the campaign. I'd be happy to answer your questions on that.

SHUSTER: . . . a lot of people agree that independent groups perhaps have undue influence. But perhaps, is it a matter of bad taste when images of 9/11 are used in advertising by anybody?

DUNCAN: I can't be responsible for anyone other than the Republican National Committee and what they're doing .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

. . when John McCain became the presumptive nominee of the party, we talked about running a respectful campaign on ideas. We talked about doing things a Republican candidate hasn't done before . . . he's doing nontraditional things and we want to frame the campaign around that.

SHUSTER: How do you think it's going? I mean, a lot of people look at John McCain's speech and say just the fact that he spoke today is pretty remarkable. Are you getting a sense that this is helping John McCain now?

DUNCAN: I'm getting a sense that we're going all over the country and doing very well . . . we're going to have enough money, combined with the McCain campaign to get our message out. We'll be outspent but the American people will know that John McCain stands for a brighter future for this country.

SHUSTER: Well I would agree. I think that Americans certainly are going to see that John McCain has enough money to get his message out, regardless of what it is . . .

Highlight #9

McCain's Campaign Has a History of Fudging Policy Numbers (MSNBC 07/16/08 3:00pm)

DAVID SHUSTER: Michael, there has been so much talk, both here and in the world now about Afghanistan and the situation with the Taliban getting worse over there. The Obama campaign had a conference call this morning and foreign policy advisor Susan Rice was quoted as saying . . . "he says he wants to surge in Afghanistan without reducing our presence in Iraq, which the chairman of the joint cheifs of staff has repeatedly said is impossible and he wants to balance our budget by 2013 in part on the basis of troop withdrawals from Afghanistand and Iraq, which he opposes." What'd you make, both of what McCain sort of said yesterday about Afghanistan, some of the confusing statements he made, and the Obama efforts to try and exploit them?

MICHAEL CROWLEY: Look, I will say that the McCain campaign has had a repeated problem where their numbers have been murky, they don't add up. As I recall, his budget plan just sort of ignored maybe a trillion dollars or more in money that was going to be lost to tax cuts . . . I think you are starting to see a pattern where the McCain campaign is fudging things on their policy proposals and the Obama people are really trying to . . . get the press to bore in and pin him down on these questions. He has been vague, for instance, when it comes to Afghanistan, about where he's going to get more troops and also when he talks about budget offsets from foreign policy, he's assuming . . . a total withdrawal from Iraq, which is not what McCain wants to do. So I think we can expect to see those questions pursued in the weeks ahead.

Highlight #10

John McCain Can't Seem to Sell Himself as Change Candidate (MSNBC 07/16/08 6:48pm)

DAVID GREGORY: [Has] McCain persuaded voters that he is better prepared to bring change to Washington since the primary? . . .

MIKE MURPHY: No, not yet. And it's kind of a great irony because John McCain is the original blow-up-Washington-and-change-the-culture-here kind of guy but somehow Barack Obama's hijacked a lot of that from the 2000 McCain campaign and is now getting a lot of credit. I think McCain can win it back but a legitimate criticism of his campaign is they've stumbled around on messaging and they've let go of a lot of space McCain naturally owns. I think it's been a huge mistake and they haven't served McCain well on that. I'm hoping they get it together now.

GREGORY: Isn't it hard to use the analysis from the 200 race . . . compared to 2008 when he's coming off an incumbent Republican president who's so unpopular and now he becomes the standard bearer of the party?

MURPHY: Right but the issue is, it's not that the party's going to change McCain, it's that McCain's going to change the party. If McCain's who he really is, a different kind of Republican and he bets his whole campaign on that because campaigns are best when the amplify the truth, I think John McCain can win this election. If he is in the mold of the third Bush term, which I think is inaccurate . . . he's going to be in trouble. I think they've been murky about that. They had to win a primary. But they won it. Now they got to put the thing in the center and amplify the real John McCain . . . you're gonna find McCain is the real reformer because he's had the guts and the courage to cast the tough votes in Washington . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Laura Graham" <lgraham@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Walker Morris" <wmorris@clintonfoundation.org>
"Amitabh Desai" <adesai@clintonfoundation.org>
"Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
"Doug Band - PC" <doug@presidentclinton.com>
"Justin Cooper - PC" <justin@presidentclinton.com>
john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 3/19/2012 1:19:21 AM
Subject: Re: Howard Buffett

We should think abt or ask of interest in supporting haiti ag which is one of our main focus areas and has small investment, big impact. We've visted a few of our projects on recent trips and they are going very well but more is needed. Adding Greg for haiti related follow-up.

From: Walker Morris
To: Amitabh Desai; Bruce Lindsey; Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC; john.podesta@gmail.com <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Cc: Robert Harrison; Ed Hughes; Dennis Cheng
Sent: Fri Mar 16 12:34:13 2012
Subject: Re: Howard Buffett

Thanks, Ami. This is great news. I'm obviously ready to help from CDI side on Malawi, Rwanda, Tanzania. An August visit to Malawi would be after harvest and before planting, so early May or November would give him more farming to see. The impact on people is year round, so the powerful human story can be told first person any month he comes.

We will have a generic version of expansion business plan we've done for Salida ready next week and I can work with others to build it into a comprehensive presentation on WJCF work and collaboration opportunities if that would be a near term step.
Glad to talk further whenever it suits other than 6 hour time difference.
Walker

From: Amitabh Desai
To: Bruce Lindsey; Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC; john.podesta@gmail.com <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Cc: Robert Harrison; Ed Hughes; Walker Morris; Dennis Cheng
Sent: Fri Mar 16 11:34:34 2012
Subject: Howard Buffett

Had a good call today with Howard Buffett. Like WJC, he talked about strengthening agriculture (sustainably) in developing countries in Africa, Latin/Central America, and beyond; and also in reconfiguring US food aid to enable more local purchasing of food aid rather than shipping US farm produce overseas. [Besides running his farm, he runs farms in South Africa and Central America and is currently a UN WFP Ambassador and advocate for their Purchase for Progress initiative.] He was surprised to learn there are so many shared interests. We discussed a few areas of possible future collaboration, all of which effectively are either “talking” or “doing,” on which I’d welcome your feedback:

DOING

- COUNTRY VISIT. We discussed WJC’s agriculture work in Rwanda/Malawi/Peru/Colombia and he is intrigued. He said he’s visiting South Africa (where he runs a 9,000 acre farm) in August and would like to visit Malawi/Rwanda to see CF projects. We can help facilitate his visit. I didn’t mention WJC’s Africa trip but should we consider a joint-visit whenever WJC goes? [He liked the Neno wheat example of working ourselves out of a job.]

- CDI. Funding for scaling-up commercial farms in Malawi/Tanzania. I explained our interest in growing the program, he said he’d like to work together given a lot of shared interests, and that he’ll be able to make a decision after seeing our work first-hand. Whenever he visits Malawi, we should be prepared with a specific ask.

- CARLOS SLIM. He said he has been in discussions with Marco about doing joint agriculture work in Mexico and he asked if we’d be open to discussing it and to WJC being involved as the convener. I said we work with Slim as well and that we’d be happy to discuss it together.

TALKING

- He is writing a book and would like to profile WJC’s agriculture work (we discussed Malawi). I said we’d be happy to discuss it further and provide him with more information about the projects.

- CGI. He’s going to try to come to CGI in September. He said it’s right around corn harvest so he doesn’t like being away from his farm but he will try to come for one day.

- He asked if there any appetite to do joint advocacy on agriculture issues – most notably US food aid. I tried to bring it back to CGI as an opportunity for him to share his message there under the umbrella of CGI. It would be good to give him information on any agriculture-related programming or action networks being contemplated for September, for him to weigh-in on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hope this helps, and I'd welcome your feedback. Thanks, Ami

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 3/15/2015 2:36:41 PM
Subject: Re: Earned Media Update

...who is willing to say Members should turn over their emails!!
Lowey?
Israel?
SJL?

On Sun, Mar 15, 2015 at 9:34 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
Better off with an H R C warrior. Who is her most fearsome House ally?

JP
--Sent from my iPad--
john.podesta@gmail.com
For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com

On Mar 15, 2015, at 8:50 PM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:

Do we think Cummings would do that? Certainly worth an ask.

On Sun, Mar 15, 2015 at 8:48 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
Who is the right person to raise a simple question of the audacity of members of congress asking others to release their emails when they don't ?

Do we have some D who can squarely at Gowdy and demand he release all his emails for that last two years so people can see for themselves how politically motivated his investigations are?

From: Jesse Ferguson [mailto:jesse@jesseferguson.com]
Sent: Sunday, March 15, 2015 5:13 PM
To: Joel Benenson; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; john.podesta@gmail.com ; Mandy Grunwald
Cc: Robby Mook; Kristina Schake; Jennifer Palmieri
Subject: Earned Media Update

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: “This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn’t about emails, it’s about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they’d hold themselves.

Washington Post : “Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records.” [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : “ But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. “He did exactly what Hillary did,” said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff “went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn’t. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: “When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio’s spokeswoman said they had been deleted.” (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press , “Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival.” [AP, 3/7/15]

Roll Call , “But the legislative branch, which has effectively exempted itself from the Freedom of Information Act, can keep its emails and other correspondence hidden for 20 years or more — and some forever.” [Roll Call, 3/10/15]

Congressman Jason Chaffetz, who chairs the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, was caught by ABC News with a personal email address – a gmail account

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– on his Congressional business card. [ABC, 3/3/15]

In fact, people have called on Trey Gowdy to release his email if he wants to oversee this investigation. [MSNBC, 3/11/15]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 9/24/2015 7:53:14 AM
Subject: Re: Follow up 2

Yes, will do.

On Thu, Sep 24, 2015 at 2:52 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> From Barbara Boxer
> Can you circulate to 8:00 group.
> Second one for circulation coming also.
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: "BB" <bbnanna11@gmail.com >
> Date: Sep 18, 2015 7:16 PM
> Subject: Follow up 2
> To: <john.podesta@gmail.com >
> Cc:
>
> Hillary has so many accomplishments. here is my view of the top three.
>
> 1. Being a constant champion for children, women and families all her life.
>
> 2. Organizing the countries of the world to support heavy economic sanctions on Iran to get them to the table to end their nuclear weapons program.
>
> 3.Working and fighting for first responders after 9/11 and to bring financial and moral support to New York City and all of those affected by that tragic terrorist attack.
>
> Sent from my iPad

--

Kristina Schake | Communications
Hillary for America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	11/21/2014 7:55:02 AM
Subject:	11.21.14 CTR Weekend TPs
Attachments:	11.21.14 Weekend Package.docx

Hi all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both attached and below.

11.21.14 Weekend Package

1. VIDEO: The American Dream: Hillary Clinton Writing A new Chapter
2. Hillary Clinton on Immigration
3. Hillary Clinton: A Lifetime Champion of Income Opportunity
4. Eleven Things You Should Know About Hillary Clinton

"THE AMERICAN DREAM: HILLARY CLINTON WRITING A NEW CHAPTER"

Correct The Record has produced and released a video entitled "The American Dream: Hillary Clinton Writing A New Chapter." Ready For Hillary is partnering in promotion of the video, which will be featured at their conference in New York City.

The four minute video includes footage from Hillary Clinton's recent campaign stops in Iowa and Louisiana, and features a variety of enthusiastic supporters of Hillary Clinton from all over the country voicing why they believe she should be - and must be - our country's next President.

"Correct The Record is proud to present "The American Dream: Hillary Clinton Writing A New Chapter," a video featuring enthusiastic, excited Americans expressing their support of Hillary Clinton," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record. "As the video highlights, folks from across the country voiced their enthusiasm about Hillary Clinton's strength, resiliency and her vision for the future. The prevailing message heard was 'run, Hillary, run!'"

" The American Dream: Hillary Clinton Writing A New Chapter"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Inline image 2

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON IMMIGRATION

KEY POINTS:

Hillary Clinton has been a vocal supporter of comprehensive immigration reform and a path to citizenship.

In a statement released after President Obama's executive order on immigration, Hillary Clinton said:

- "I support the President's decision to begin fixing our broken immigration system and focus finite resources on deporting felons rather than families."
- "Only Congress can finish the job by passing permanent bipartisan reform that keeps families together, treats everyone with dignity and compassion, upholds the rule of law, protects our borders and national security, and brings millions of hard-working people out of the shadows and into the formal economy so they can pay taxes and contribute to our nation's prosperity."
- "Our disagreements on this important issue may grow heated at times, but I am confident that people of good will and good faith can yet find common ground."

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton consistently voted in favor of comprehensive immigration reform.

Clinton is a supporter of the DREAM Act and advocated for it on the Senate floor.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families separated by the immigration system. The amendment would have reclassified the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives.

Clinton introduced a bill to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children.

Clinton introduced a bill to provide more funding for job training for people with limited English language skills.

BACKGROUND: HILLARY ON Immigration

Hillary Clinton: "I support the President's decision to begin fixing our broken immigration system and focus finite resources on deporting felons rather than families." In a statement released after President Obama's executive order on immigration, Hillary Clinton said, "I support the President's decision to begin fixing our broken immigration system and focus finite resources on deporting felons rather than families. I was hopeful that the bipartisan bill passed by the Senate in 2013 would spur the House of Representatives to act, but they refused even to advance an alternative. Their abdication of responsibility paved the way for this executive action, which follows established precedent from Presidents of both parties going back many decades. But, only Congress can finish the job by passing permanent bipartisan reform that keeps families together, treats everyone with dignity and compassion, upholds the rule of law, protects our borders and national security, and brings millions of hard-working people out of the shadows and into the formal economy so they can pay taxes and contribute to our nation's prosperity. Our disagreements on this important issue may grow heated at times, but I am confident that people of good will and good faith can yet find common ground. We should never forget that we're not discussing abstract statistics—we're talking about real families with real experiences. We're talking about parents lying awake at night afraid of a knock on the door that could tear their families apart, people who love this country, work hard, and want nothing more than a chance to contribute to the community and build better lives for themselves and their children." [Washington Post, 11/20/14]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton: "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." As former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton recently told a tearful young undocumented immigrant, "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." Clinton's remarks came at the Clinton Foundation's "No Ceilings" forum in New York. Clinton went on to say, "I believe strongly we are missing a great opportunity by not welcoming people like you and 11 million others who have made contributions to our country into a legal status so you don't have to worry, you can go to school, you can work, you can pursue your dreams." Clinton also said she is "strongly in favor" of the bipartisan Senate bill and that the House's opposition is "a big missed opportunity for our country." [Washington Post, 4/17/14]

Hillary Clinton has been a strong supporter of the DREAM Act. As Senator Clinton stated during a debate over the DREAM Act on the Senate floor, "There is a solution to this crisis, but sadly, the Senate today failed to act. The DREAM Act – which I have proudly cosponsored for several years – would help expand opportunities for our nation's immigrant children. For those students who have grown up in the United States, have demonstrated good moral character, and are pursuing a college education or have enlisted in the military, the DREAM Act will provide an opportunity to earn legal status in this country." [Clinton floor remarks, 10/24/07]

Sen. Clinton consistently voted in support of comprehensive immigration reform. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton voted for the bipartisan Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act of 2006 and voted to invoke cloture on S.1639, the 2007 comprehensive immigration reform bill. [Vote #157, S.2611, 5/25/06 , Vote #235, S.1639, 6/28/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children. In 2007, Hillary introduced the Legal Immigrant Children's Health Improvement Act "which amends titles XIX (Medicaid) and XXI (Children's Health Insurance) (SCHIP) of the Social Security Act to grant states the option of covering certain categories of eligible pregnant women and child resident aliens, including targeted low-income children, under the Medicaid and SCHIP programs." [S.764, 3/5/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to provide more job training funds for individuals with limited English language skills. In 2003, Hillary Clinton introduced the Access to Employment and English Language Acquisition Act which "Amends the Workforce Investment Act of 1998 to provide for: (1) job training that integrates occupational skills training with language acquisition; and (2) specified services for individuals who are Limited English Proficient (LEP). Authorizes the Secretary to award incentive grants to States for exemplary performance in carrying out integrated training programs." [S.1543, introduced, 7/31/03]

Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families who had been separated by the immigration system. In 2007, during a debate over the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act, Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment "to reclassify the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives." As she said before the vote, "It is time to take all the rhetoric about family values and put it into action and show that we mean what we say when we talk about putting families first. That is what my amendment does. This amendment is a bipartisan amendment offered with Senator Hagel and Senator Menendez. It is our view we must make reuniting families a priority in our immigration system, that we should show compassion for those living apart from their spouses and minor children, that we should reform immigration in a way that honors families and brings them together." The bipartisan amendment, introduced with Sens. Hagel and Menendez failed, 44-53. [Vote # 195, 6/6/07]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF INCOME OPPORTUNITY

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

BACKGROUND: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that all hardworking Americans have the chance to succeed, no matter their circumstances. Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, expanding access to early childhood education and healthcare, working to raise the minimum wage, and advocating for out-of-work Americans, Hillary's record reflects the belief that every American should have the right to achieve economic security and income opportunity.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed the Bush tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families.

- Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

BOTTOM LINE: The lack of income opportunity is hurting working families across the country and poses a threat to the American ideal that if you work hard and play by the rules, you should have the opportunity to succeed. Hillary Clinton's record reflects the belief that your ability to get ahead should be determined by your hard work, ambition, and goals – not by your circumstances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in Foreign Policy , "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As the Washington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted in increased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia ,Panama and South Korea) and 15 Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

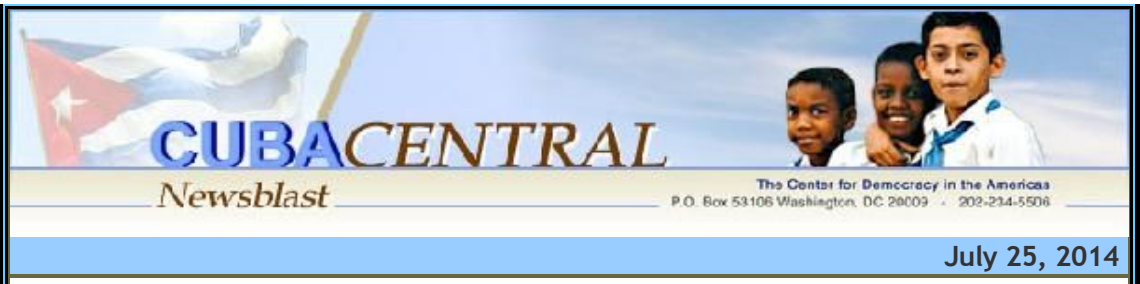
Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sarah Stephens" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/25/2014 11:46:44 AM
Subject: Rubio Discovers Void, Proposes More of What Created It

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here



July 25, 2014

Dear Friends:

In 1992, Brigadier General Simon P. Worden, then serving at the Department of Defense, coined the phrase "self-licking ice cream cones " to describe a curiosity of Washington bureaucratic life. This is defined as a process that offers few benefits and exists primarily to justify its own existence.

The U.S. embargo against Cuba is a classic example of the self-licking ice cream cone at work. When champions of the hardline policy identify problems created by the embargo, they argue for increasing the sanctions that triggered the problems in the first place.

Consider Senator Marco Rubio's essay, "Marco Rubio on the Russian Threat to the Western Hemisphere," published last week in Power Line . Russia, like other nations, Rubio explains, has leapt into a "leadership void" in Latin America -

The Obama Administration's failure to pursue a consistent, meaningful and proactive strategy in Latin America has left a leadership void that not only Russia but also China, Iran, North Korea and others have been able to exploit. In recent years, we've seen each of these nations move aggressively to enhance their alliances in the region, and expand their defense and intelligence relationships.

Rubio seems to be living in a world in which the U.S. can control events in our hemisphere, or at least act as gatekeeper, determining which nations can enter Latin America and for what purpose; the kind of Monroe Doctrine world that has been declared dead , over and over again .

As we report below, the President of China, Xi Jinping, wrapped up his tour of Latin America this week with three days of activities in Cuba, culminating with his visit to the Moncada Barracks where the Cuban Revolution dates its start, 61 years ago tomorrow. But Xi, as AFP reports , also "made a point during his tour of reaching out to countries often shunned by US and European investors, including Argentina, Cuba and Venezuela."

President Xi came to the region with other leaders of the BRICS group (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa) for a summit, during which they announced the creation of a $50 billion bank for infrastructure projects and a $100 billion crisis reserve fund described as a "mini-IMF."

German media described the purpose of creating banks to fund public works and credit in the region as offsetting "the clout of western financial institutions" as well as bolstering investment in infrastructure.

This is especially meaningful to Cuba. The Helms-Burton law, enacted in 1996, requires the United States government to oppose Cuba's admission to the International Monetary Fund and every other relevant international financial institution - such as the International

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Development Association and the Inter-American Development Bank - until the Cuban government is replaced.

In the meanwhile, the Obama Administration is aggressively enforcing sanctions on a global basis against financial institutions that do business with Cuba. Small wonder, then, that "Cuban official media are closely following the creation of a new $100 billion development bank that may offer lower-cost lending alternatives outside the realm of Washington and Wall Street," as reported by CubaStandard.com this week.

Helms-Burton also requires the U.S. to oppose and vote against Cuba's entry into the Organization of American States. Barring Cuba from the OAS also results in Cuba's exclusion from meetings of the Summit of the Americas. This, in turn, has led both to threats by nations in the Hemisphere to boycott the next summit scheduled to take place in Panama in 2015 and to the strengthening of Latin American institutions and initiatives that exclude the U.S. and Canada. The self-licking ice cream cone licks on.

Paradoxically, the BRICS bank breakthrough led former President Fidel Castro to write about the summit's concluding statement, the Fortaleza Declaration, in a reflection which praised the leaders because they recognized "the important role which state enterprises play in the economy, as well as small and medium sized companies, as creators of employment and wealth."

While Fidel Castro was praising the private sector, Rubio was turning red at Russia's reemergence as a player in Cuba, as we discussed recently here and here . Rather than conceding the role that U.S. sanctions played in creating the void that the BRICS were filling this month, the Senator from Florida suggested that we double-down instead. To punish Cuba for welcoming Putin back, Rubio writes:

"[The] U.S. must continue denying the Castro regime access to money it uses to oppress the Cuban people and invest in foreign policy initiatives that actively challenge and undermine U.S. interests. The Obama Administration should roll back the economic benefits it has extended to the Cuban regime, in the form of expanded U.S. travel and remittances..."

By this logic, if hardline policies haven't freed Alan Gross, haven't stopped oil development in the Gulf of Mexico, haven't blocked Cuba from hosting peace talks between Colombia and the FARC, haven't brought the Cuban economy to its knees, and haven't rallied Latin American nations to our side, sanctions supporters have just one answer: tighten them more.

This week in Cuba news...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Contents

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS
- Lt. Governor of Fla. attacks Charlie Crist for wanting to lift Cuba embargo
- Cuba's first CGI animated film to be shown in U.S.
- Twenty U.S. students graduate from ELAM

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
- China's President Xi Jinping visits Cuba, signs 29 cooperation agreements
- Bolivia will pay for training of doctors in Cuba
- Cuba's "Operación Milagro" (Operation Miracle) turns ten

IN CUBA
- Contrary to news reports, Mariela Castro says she is alive and not aboard downed plane
- Family of dissident Oswaldo Payá renews plebiscite effort
- Cuban LGBT rights group meets with government officials to discuss Labor Code

Recommended Reading
- Tampa delegation sees ways to help during Cuba visit , Paul Guzzo, Tampa Tribune
- Cuba Looks to Mangroves to Fend Off Rising Seas , Andrea Rodriguez, Associated Press
- Education in Cuba: A reform on the way? , José Jasán Nieves and Alejandro Ulloa, Progreso Weekly
- Dali exhibition to be shown in Cuba for 1st time , EFE
- In Conversation: Roberto Fabelo on Fabelo's Anatomy , Susan Delson, Cuban Art News

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Lt. Governor of Fla. attacks Charlie Crist for wanting to lift Cuba embargo

Carlos López-Cantera, Florida's Lieutenant Governor, accused gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist of having a "flippant and shallow attitude" toward U.S. relations with Cuba, reports Sunshine State News . Crist supports lifting the embargo on Cuba and announced plans to travel to the island this summer, though he subsequently postponed those plans until after the election.

López-Cantera, who was born in Spain and is of Cuban descent, said on Wednesday, "While Gov. Scott has been building upon the 600,000 jobs created under his term and sharing his vision to grow 'Jobs for the Next Generation' this week, the only jobs plan Charlie Crist has offered is for Florida to do business with Cuba, a state sponsor of terror."

Crist responded to the accusation in an interview with the Nuevo Herald , saying, "That is obviously political propaganda on his part to inflame passions among Cubans in Florida. ... The idea of not having the embargo is actually aimed to help the people on the island."

López-Cantera was appointed by Governor Rick Scott to his post in January 2014 following the resignation of Lt. Gov. Jennifer Carroll who left office over an ethics controversy. Scott and López-Cantera face former Governor Crist and his running mate, Annette Taddeo, in the November election.

Cuba's first CGI animated film to be shown in U.S.

The first Cuban film to use computer-generated imagery (CGI) animation premiered in Cuba last Sunday, and will be shown in twelve countries, including the United States, report Cubadebate and Havana Times .

The film, called "Meñique," or, in English, "Pinky," was directed and written by Ernesto Padrón and produced by the Animation Studios of the Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry (ICAIC), with the help of the Spanish company Fiction Productions. Meñique is based on Jose Martí's adaptation of the French story "Thumb," which Martí published in his children's magazine "La Edad de Oro," or "The Golden Age."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuban Vice President Miguel Díaz-Canel said that the film teaches important values, adding: "I feel very proud that we have made this movie. It is a special present to children on their day." Children's Day is observed in Cuba on the third Sunday of July. A trailer for the film is available here .

Twenty U.S. students graduate from ELAM

According to MEDICC , 20 U.S. students graduated from the Latin American Medical School (ELAM) in Havana, Cuba on July 23. Among the 1,382 graduates, 879 are from nations outside of Cuba, and 29% of those are Peruvian (the largest international constituency). Celebrating the end of their six-year scholarships, the 20 U.S. students participated in a ceremony attended by Cuban Vice President Ramón Machado Ventura and Minister of Health Roberto Morales.

Students say they plan to implement what they have learned by going into rural areas to replicate the work of other Cuban doctors, and serving underrepresented and marginalized groups, while others say they plan to enter family medicine and pediatrics. Since 2005, ELAM has graduated 23,000 students from all over the world.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

China's President Xi Jinping visits Cuba, signs 29 cooperation agreements

At the conclusion of his visit to Latin America, President Xi Jinping of China came to Cuba this week for meetings that focused on economic opportunities between the two countries, reports Reuters . On Tuesday, President Xi met with former President Fidel Castro (seen in this video) and with President Raúl Castro. In a statement, Xi praised the economic reforms that have taken place under Raúl Castro, saying, "Both China and Cuba are at a key stage in their respective development....Cuba is now updating, in an integrated manner, its economic model," reports the Associated Press .

During the trip, Cuba and China signed 29 bilateral accords addressing economic, cultural, and educational cooperation, and agreed to collaborate in the fields of biotechnology and renewable energy, reports CCTV . China also granted several interest-free loans to Cuba, one of which will go toward building a port terminal in Santiago de Cuba, reports Havana Times .

Terra reports China and Cuba are currently discussing additional investment opportunities, including in the pharmaceutical industry and in car assembly. The article notes that President Xi's Cuba visit coincided with a Chinese business delegation exploring investment opportunities. Cuba's new foreign investment law went into effect in June .

During the trip, President Xi attended the opening of a plant that produces blood glucose test strips, built with the help of technology transfers from China's Changsha SINOCARE Inc., reports Xinhua . Production is projected to start by the end of this year, and the plant is expected to help both the growing number of diabetes patients in Cuba as well as increase the country's export capacities.

This was President Xi's second visit to Cuba. During his first, in 2011 as Vice President of China, he signed ten bilateral agreements. China is Cuba's second largest trading partner, after Venezuela. As of August 2013, trade between China and Cuba amounted to some $1.4 billion, a 25% increase over the same period in 2012.

President Xi began his visit to Latin America last week , when he attended the BRICS Summit in Brazil and pledged $35 billion to fund projects in the region. He also made stops in Argentina and Venezuela, pledging billions more for the countries' transportation and extractive industries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fidel Castro penned an article published in Cuban state newspaper Granma that describes the agreements reached during the BRICS Summit and emphasizing the importance of Cuba's ties to China and Russia. "The contribution[s] that Russia and China can make to science, technology, and economic development in South America and the Caribbean [are] decisive."

Bolivia will pay for training of doctors in Cuba

Bolivia's President Evo Morales announced this week that his government will pay for specialized medical education for Bolivian students in Cuba, in order for those students to return to Bolivia and run new, specialized hospitals, reports EFE . Bolivia says it will begin building these hospitals immediately in the cities of La Paz, Cochabamba, and Santa Cruz. President Morales stated that the new hospitals will specialize in surgery of the brain, kidneys, and heart, and added that the hospital in Cochabamba will provide free cancer treatment.

Cuba's "Operación Milagro" (Operation Miracle) turns ten

Operación Milagro, a Cuban initiative founded in 2004 to offer free eye care to poor and geographically inaccessible communities around the world, celebrated its tenth year this month, reports Cubasí . People in 31 countries throughout Latin America, Asia and Africa have received ophthalmological care from Cuban doctors. By treating cataracts, as well as glaucoma, strabismus, and retina problems, Operación Milagro has "improved or restored" vision to over 3.4 million people since it began ten years ago.

IN CUBA

Contrary to news reports, Mariela Castro says she is alive and not aboard downed plane

After original reports that Mariela Castro, the daughter of President Raúl Castro, was on Air Algerie Flight AH5017, which crashed in bad weather en route to Algeria early Thursday morning, Ms. Castro reported to TeleSur that she is alive and well. The report, which spread through the mainstream press on Thursday, was based on a Facebook post by Burkina Faso's Ouagadougou Airport. The MD-83 passenger plane was carrying 110 passengers and an 8-member crew.

Family of dissident Oswaldo Payá renews plebiscite effort

The family of Oswaldo Payá, the Cuban dissident leader who died two years ago in a car accident, has announced a new campaign for a plebiscite on allowing free, multi-party elections on the island, reports the Miami Herald .

In 2002, Payá's Varela Project presented Cuba's National Assembly with over 10,000 signatures for a petition which called for a change in the country's constitution to allow multiple political parties, freedom of expression, and freedom of association, among other requests. The response to this was the passage of an amendment to the constitution, declaring socialism as the permanent system of Cuba's government.

According to Rosa María Payá, Payá's daughter, the initiative by the Christian Liberation Movement will include "one single question: Do you want to participate in free and multi-party elections?"

Cuban LGBT rights group meets with government officials to discuss Labor Code

Members of Proyecto Arcoíris , an LGBT activist group in Cuba, met with Cuban lawmakers last week, regarding the National Assembly's decision to omit language from Cuba's new Labor Code barring discrimination against transgender people or those with HIV/AIDS, reports IPS . The meeting followed up on a letter to the president of Cuba's National Assembly sent last month protesting the decision. The Assembly was represented by government officials led by José Luis Toledo Santander, president of the Parliamentary Commission of Constitutional and Legal Affairs, which was responsible for creating the final draft of the Labor Code .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Toledo Santander told journalist Francisco Rodríguez, who attended the meeting, that the "Style Commission" within the National Assembly had the last say on the language of the law, and chose not to include language about transgender people or those who are HIV/AIDS positive. During the meeting, Rodríguez says he took the opportunity to emphasize "the need for state leaders and the government to study these topics more [sexual orientation and gender identity] and to listen more to those who are specialists in these subjects and also to exert political leadership on scientific grounds."

As we reported in June , the Labor Code did outlaw discrimination based on sexual orientation, race, gender, disability, religious beliefs, or region of origin.

IPS reports that members of the government and the activists agreed during the meeting on the importance of passing a law that deals specifically with sexual orientation and focuses on protecting the rights of transgender people.

Recommended Reading

Tampa delegation sees ways to help during Cuba visit , Paul Guzzo, Tampa Tribune

Though Charlie Crist decided not to go to Cuba this summer, the rest of the delegation he had planned to travel with visited the island last week. Guzzo reports on their experience, saying that the travelers took away two goals: to help restore a monument of Martin Luther King, Jr. in Havana and to make the city more handicap accessible.

Cuba Looks to Mangroves to Fend Off Rising Seas , Andrea Rodríguez, Associated Press

Rodríguez reports on the impact of climate change and rising seawater levels on Cuba's coastal regions, and on efforts to preserve the island's extensive mangrove forests. The mangrove thickets play an important role in the coastal ecosystem, and will play a key role in mitigating the effects of rising sea levels.

Education in Cuba: A reform on the way? , José Jasán Nieves and Alejandro Ulloa, Progreso Weekly

Nieves and Ulloa offer details on education reforms in Cuba that the Ministry of Education announced two weeks ago . While it was already announced that teachers would be better trained, this article explains that teachers will now have eight rather than two hours per week of "pedagogical improvement studies." Seven thousand new teachers will be added to combat the teacher shortage, and the university entrance exams will also be modified to protect against fraud, a common problem in recent years.

Dali exhibition to be shown in Cuba for 1st time , EFE

EFE reports that a "Memories of Surrealism" exhibition at the National Museum of Fine Arts in Havana will open on July 24 and feature 95 of Salvador Dali's works. This will be the first time Dali's works have been shown in Cuba. Dali kept a home in the Catalan village of Cadaqués, from which an estimated 1,200 inhabitants migrated to Cuba.

In Conversation: Roberto Fabelo on Fabelo's Anatomy , Susan Delson, Cuban Art News

Susan Delson interviews Cuban artist Roberto Fabelo about his first solo exhibition in the U.S. Much of the exhibition displays ink drawings by Fabelo, laid over the pages of old anatomical textbooks. The article features a number of Fabelo's images.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website. You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2014 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org | Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy.

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE Try it FREE today.

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Malea Stenzel" <mkstenzel@gmail.com>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 3/23/2010 10:34:40 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Fwd: Christian Coalition of America Email on Climate/Jobs/Energy Debate

FYI-

The Christian Coalition of America went out today with this email to its membership and a surgery around the issues of:
- national security,
- addiction to oil,
- climate change,
- promotion of alternative energy,
- investing in clean energy technology,
- pollution,
- drilling,
- biblical mandate to care for the future,
- US as a world leader and
- bold leadership is needed by government and business leaders.

Dear friend,

We are conducting a survey of Christian Coalition supporters around the country on one of the most important issues that our country faces today, and we need your input.

Currently, America spends over seven-hundred billion dollars every year to buy foreign oil - in many cases from some countries that hate us or harbor terrorists. That over-reliance on foreign sources of energy puts our country's national security and our economy at the mercy of others.

Whether it's our economy, national security or our environment, so many of our country's interests converge on our energy policies - and we need a better plan.

(Click here to take our survey)

We need a "made in America" approach for developing energy resources that will lead to energy independence, a cleaner environment and more jobs for our families.

We need solutions that include proven American resources as well as the development of new "renewable" energy technologies.

Having a national energy independence strategy will not only help our country address environmental concerns, but free our country from its dependence on foreign oil, create new American jobs and protect our national security.

By building on current technologies, such as domestic oil, nuclear and natural gas - and developing new technologies - America can provide for our future energy independence and build our economy.

As conservatives, we stand up for our country's national security and the health of our economy. And, as Christians, we recognize the Biblical mandate to care for God's creation and protect our children's future.

That's why we're conducting this survey. We want to know what you think about these issues.

While your responses will be kept confidential, the results will be used to send a clear signal to those in positions of influence as to how politically active Christians feel about these important issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So please click here and complete our survey today.

By participating, you will be adding your voice to that of thousands of other American Christians who care about our nation's future.

Thank you so much for all that you do for our shared values.

Sincerely,

Roberta Combs

President

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

To unsubscribe from this group, send email to bigcampaign+unsubscribegooglegroups.com or reply to this email with the words "REMOVE ME" as the subject.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joshua Dorner" <jdorner@americanprogress.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/5/2010 3:29:19 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Exclusive: Foreign-Funded 'U.S.' Chamber Of Commerce Running Partisan Attack Ads http://thinkprogress.org/2010/10/05/foreign-chamber-commerce/

Exclusive: Foreign-Funded 'U.S.' Chamber Of Commerce Running Partisan Attack Ads

U. S. Chamber President Tom Donohue with George Bush

The largest attack campaign against Democrats this fall is being waged by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a trade association organized as a 501(c)(6) that can raise and spend unlimited funds without ever disclosing any of its donors. The Chamber has promised to spend an unprecedented$75 million to defeat candidates like Jack Conway , Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-CA), Jerry Brown , Rep. Joe Sestak (D-PA), and Rep. Tom Perriello (D-VA). As of Sept. 15th, the Chamber had aired more than 8,000 ads on behalf of GOP Senate candidates alone, according to a study from the Wesleyan Media Project. The Chamber's spending has dwarfed every other issue group and most political party candidate committee spending. A ThinkProgress investigation has found that the Chamber funds its political attack campaign out of its general account, which solicits foreign funding. And while the chamber will likely assert it has internal controls, foreign money is fungible, permitting the Chamber to run its unprecedented attack campign. According to legal experts consulted by ThinkProgress, the Chamber is likely skirting longstanding campaign finance law that bans the involvement of foreign corporations in American elections.

In recent years, the Chamber has become very aggressive with its fundraising,opening offices abroad and helping to found foreign chapters (known as Business Councils or "AmChams"). While many of these foreign operations include American businesses with interests overseas, the Chamber has also spearheaded an effort to raise money from foreign corporations, including ones controlled by foreign governments. These foreign members of the Chamber send money either directly to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, or the foreign members fund their local Chamber, which in turn, transfers dues payments back to the Chamber's H Street office in Washington DC. These funds are commingled to the Chamber's 501(c)(6) account which is the vehicle for the attack ads:

– The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has created a large presence in the small, oil-rich country of Bahrain. In 2006, the Chamber created a local affiliate called the "U.S.-Bahrain Business Council" (USBBC), an organization to help businesses in Bahrain take advantage of the Chamber's "network of government and business relationships in the US and worldwide." As the USBBC's bylaws state, it is not an actual separate entity, rather it is simply an office of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's 501(c)(6) trade association. Many of the USBBC's board members are Bahrainian, including Aluminum Bahrain, Gulf Air, Midal Cables, the Nass Group, Bahrain Maritime & Mercantile International, the Bahrain Petroleum Company (state-owned), Gulf Petrochemical Industries Company, and First Leasing Bank. With each of these foreign board members to the USBBC contributing at least $10,000 annually, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce raises well over $100,000 a year in money from foreign businesses through its operation in Bahrain. Notably, the membership form provided by the USBBC directs applicants to send or wire their money directly to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The membership form also explicitly states the foreign-owned firms are welcomed.

– Like the Chamber's involvement in Bahrain, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce operates in India through a group called "U.S.-India Business Council" (USIBC), which has offices around the world but is headquartered in the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Dozens of Indian businesses, including some of India's largest corporations like the State Bank of India (state-run) and ICICI Bank, are members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce through the USIBC. Annual membership dues range from $7,500 to $15,000 or more, and the money is given directly into the Chamber's 501(c)(6) bank account. Like the USBBC, the USIBC generates well over $200,000 a year in dues for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce from foreign businesses. On the USIBC website, many of the groups lobbying goals advocate changing American policy to help businesses in India. Under the manufacturing policy goal, USIBC boasts that it "can play a helpful role in guiding U.S. companies to India, while supporting various policy initiatives that will enhance India's reputation as a major manufacturing and investment hub."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– Many foreign "AmChams" or Business Councils operate outside the direct sphere of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce but nonetheless send dues money back to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. For instance, the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt is a separate entity based in Cairo that raises hundreds of thousands of dollars from both Egyptian firms and American businesses. However, the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt calls itself "the most active affiliates of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in the" Middle East. Some foreign chambers, like the Abu Dhabi AmCham, which includes American firms and Esnaad, a subsidiary of the state-run Abu Dhabi National Oil Company, claims that it is a a "dues paying member of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and part of the global network of American Chambers of Commerce."In Russia, the relationship between the American Chamber of Commerce there and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce here is opaque. This might be because many of the dues-paying members of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia are Russian state-run companies, like VTB Bank , and controlled by the Russian government. Asked by ThinkProgress if the Russian Chambers pay dues back to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Ksenia Forsheneva, the membership development manager at the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, replied, "Unfortunately the information that you require is closed for the public."

Previously, it has been reported that foreign firms like BP , Shell Oil, and Siemens are active members of the Chamber. But on a larger scale, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce appears to rely heavily on fundraising from firms all over the world , including China, India, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Brazil, Russia, and many other places. Of course, because the Chamber successfully lobbied to kill campaign finance reforms aimed at establishing transparency , the Chamber does not have to reveal any of its foreign funding. Dues-paying members of the Chamber could potentially be sending additional funds this year to help air more attack ads against Democrats.

Here's how it works. Regular dues from American firms to the Chamber can range from $500 to $300,000 or more, depending on their size and industry, and can be used for any purpose deemed necessary by Donohue and the Chamber leadership. For example, the health insurance giant Aetna has reported that it paid $100,000 in annual dues to the Chamber in the past. But for specific advocacy or advertising campaigns, corporations can hide behind the label of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and give additional money. Last year, alongside their regular dues, health insurance companies like Aetna secretly funneled up to $20 million to the Chamber for attack ads aimed at killing health reform (publicly, health insurance executives claimed they supported reform). Last week, Politico reported that News Corporation, the parent company of Fox News, gave an extra $1 million to the Chamber for its election season attack campaign.

There are many reasons foreign corporations are seeking to defeat Democratic candidates this November. The Chamber has repeatedly sent out issue alerts attacking Democratic efforts to encourage businesses to hire locally rather thanoutsource to foreign counties. The Chamber has also bitterly fought Democrats for opposing unfettered free trade deals. To galvanize foreign businesses, the Chamber has commissioned former Ambassador Frank Lavin — who served as the McCain-Palin Asia campaign director and has appeared on television multiple times recently saying a Democratic Congress is bad for business — to speak before various foreign Chamber affiliates to talk about the stakes for the 2010 midterm elections.

Because campaign finance laws prohibit foreign entities from contributing to political races here in America, we asked the Chamber to defend the legality of its fundraising operation. We have yet to receive a response. But as word of our investigation began to leak out yesterday, the Chamber informed Politico's Mike Allen that it is now "preparing a response ."

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John DeCock - Clean Water Action" <activist@cleanwater.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 5/3/2010 10:53:25 AM
Subject: Make Water a Priority

Clean Water Action logo with wave backgroun

Make Water Protection an Energy Priority, Not an Afterthought

Dear Mary,

The Gulf Coast oil spill disaster has grabbed headlines recently, and with good reason. We already know that the human, economic and environmental toll makes this one of the worst environmental disasters ever.

We know that oil spills will happen sooner or later as a consequence of oil drilling and development in coastal and offshore environments. The only real questions are: when will it happen and how bad will it be?

Clean Water Action's campaign to make water protection a national energy policy priority, not an afterthought, needs your financial support today.

Donate Now

Support Clean Water Action's campaign for energy policies that make water protection a priority.

GRAPHIC: Donate button

Mary, how much are we willing to sacrifice for a false energy "solution" that is all about fattening Big Oil's bottom line, that has few if any "security" or "price at the pump" benefits?

The time has come to transform our energy economy by investing in clean energy technologies, while rejecting bad investments in dirty, expensive, and unsafe technologies, like coal and nuclear power or more off-shore oil drilling.

Clean Water Action got its start in the 1970s at a time when devastating oil spills were relatively common and relatively unregulated. It is no accident that for decades - until the Bush-Cheney Administration's reckless industry-friendly policy reversals - most offshore oil development was not allowed. Clean Water Action has consistently opposed offshore and coastal drilling proposals, from Alaska to Florida, around the Chesapeake Bay and up the Atlantic seaboard.

Just a few weeks from now, the U.S. Senate is expected to begin work again on comprehensive energy and climate legislation. With your support, Mary , Clean Water Action can continue to press for strong clean energy and climate change solutions that don't rely on high risk, low reward schemes like coal and nuclear power or more off-shore oil drilling.

Make sure Clean Water Action has the resources we need to carry this message to Congress:

- We need an energy policy and climate solutions that make water protection a litmus test for sustainability.
- Energy technologies that degrade and deplete the nation's water resources need to be replaced with those which preserve and protect them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

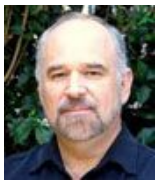
Sincerely,



John DeCock
President & CEO
Clean Water Action

P.S. - Your donation now will help Clean Water Action keep the heat on Congress to support strong climate and energy legislation and hold Senators and Representatives accountable for their votes in the fall.

Contact Us

National Office
1010 Vermont Ave NW,
Suite 1100
Washington, DC 20005-4918
202-895-0420

GRAPHIC: Contact us button

You are receiving this message because you or someone using your e-mail address, john.podesta@gmail.com, gave us permission to send it. Not interested anymore? unsubscribe now .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/3/2015 2:48:03 PM
Subject: Fwd: EPA's nuclear shift eases climate goals for South Carolina, Georgia

Are you pronuke?
Happy with how this turned out?
I am in Tasmania
Snowing here
Let me know how it's going
Tony

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: POLITICO Pro Energy Whiteboard <politicoemail@politicopro.com >
Date: August 4, 2015 at 7:44:08 AM GMT+10
To: <podesta@podesta.com >
Subject: EPA's nuclear shift eases climate goals for South Carolina, Georgia Reply-To: <proservices@politicopro.com >

8/3/15 5:43 PM EDT

EPA's decision to not include nuclear reactors that are under construction in its state emissions goals under its new climate rule has significantly eased the burden on South Carolina and Georgia .

There are currently five reactors under construction in South Carolina, Georgia and Tennessee, and last year's draft version of EPA's emissions rule included them in the target for the states, which would have forced those states to make even deeper pollution cuts. The final rule says that those reactors may now be used to meet state emissions goals in part because unlike the growing investment and ever-shrinking costs of building out renewable energy, such trends "are not as clearly evidenced in nuclear generation."

Nuclear plants that increase their power output may also be used to meet a state's goals.

The final rule trimmed South Carolina's emissions rate goal from 51 percent to 36 percent, while Georgia's was reduced from 44 percent to 34 percent. Both states have two reactors under construction. Part of their lower targets was from an increase in their 2012 baseline emissions calculated by EPA.

The goal set out for Tennessee , where one reactor is under construction, rose by about a percentage point from the draft.

Today's final rule also axes a proposal aimed at factoring in the preservation of existing nuclear generation. "Existing nuclear generation helps make existing CO2 emissions lower than they would otherwise be, but will not further lower CO2 emissions below current levels," the rule states.

— Darius Dixon

To view online:
https://www.politicopro.com/go/?wbid=58583

You've received this POLITICO Pro content because your customized settings include: Energy Whiteboards. To change your alert settings, please go to http://www.politicopro.com/member/?webaction=viewAlerts.

This email alert has been sent for the exclusive use of POLITICO Pro subscriber Tony Podesta. Forwarding or reproducing the alert without the express, written permission of POLITICO Pro is a violation of federal law and the POLITICO Pro subscription agreement. Copyright © 2015 by POLITICO LLC. To subscribe to Pro, please go to www.politicopro.com .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eric Schmeltzer" <eric@schmeltzerpr.com>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 9/18/2012 11:56:03 PM
Subject: [big campaign] New shocker on Romney video

Good morning. Jon Soltz posted this last night, and I'm actually a bit shocked this hasn't gotten pickup. Romney tells a donor on the tape that if a hostage crisis/Desert One type situation arises, he'd "work to find a way to take advantage of that." That, of course, is what he did, exactly, after the attacks in Libya and Egypt. Please feel free to pass this along.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/jon-soltz/did-romney-actually-say-h_b_1895437.html

Did Romney Actually Say He'd Take Advantage of Hostages or Dead Americans?

Watch the now infamous Romney tapes, starting at the 4 minute mark . A questioner asks him about foreign policy and they start to talk about the hostage crisis in 1980. Then Romney drops this nugget:

> "And yet, in that election, in the Jimmy Carter election, the fact that we had hostages in Iran, I mean, that was all we talked about. And we had the two helicopters crash in the desert, I mean, that was the focus, and so him [Reagan] solv ing that made all the difference in the world. I'm afraid today that if you simply got Iran to agree to stand down on nuclear weapons, they 'd go, "Now hold on. It's really a-" I mean, if something of that nature presents itself I will work to find a way to take adv antage of the opportunity."

I'm sorry , what? If there's an international crisis where Americans die and/or hostages are taken, you'll "work to find a way to take advantage of the opportunity?"

I might not believe that's what Mitt Romney meant by this statement, if it wasn't exactly what he did down the road, when he immediately tried to politically capitalize on the attacks on our diplomatic outposts, before we even knew who had died.

I know many people hav e been dismay ed over Governor Romney 's comments about the mythical 47 percent who don't pay taxes and mooch off the government, but, to me, this is so much worse.

It shows that the political aspirations and ego of Mitt Romney have no limits - not even national security or American lives are spared. As Commander in Chief, with the military under his control and his finger on the button, what other "opportunities" would he "find a way to take advantage of?"

I shudder to think.

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to dubois.sara@gmail.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/14/2014 6:48:49 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Thursday August 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday August 14, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@allidablack wrote in @TheAdvocateMag how @HillaryClinton has demonstrated her commitment to gay rights http://www.advocate.com/commentary/2014/08/14/op-ed-hillary-ready-us … [8/14/14, 12:35 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: The @HillaryClinton that @AllidaBlack met in 1993 has always stood by #LGBT people. http://www.advocate.com/commentary/2014/08/14/op-ed-hillary-ready-us … [8/14/14, 12:08 p.m. EDT]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton worked to advance policies helping parents balance work and family #HRC365 http://clinton5.nara.gov/WH/EOP/First_Lady/html/issues.html … [8/13/14, 6:00 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

New York Times: "Is This Island Big Enough for Clinton and Obama?"

"Hillary Rodham Clinton blew into this tiny island town like a fast-moving hurricane on Wednesday, creating a commotion at the Bunch of Grapes bookstore, where hundreds of admirers waited for hours in the rain for a glimpse of the woman who they hope will be the next president."

The Daily Beast: "Obama Stifled Hillary's Syria Plans and Ignored Her Iraq Warnings for Years"

"But for Clinton personally, the engagement of the armed groups was crucial and the White House's forced policy of pretending that the best way to support the revolution was through the civilian opposition based in Turkey was foolish."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal opinion: Karl Rove: "Hillary's Risky Hawkish Makeover"

"Moving away from Mr. Obama may look good on paper, but it may not work so well. For one thing, Mrs. Clinton cannot point to any notable successes during her State Department tenure."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Even with Hillary Clinton in the race, 2016 is basically a toss-up"

"A new poll from McClatchy and Marist College documents that decline pretty well. In hypothetical matchups with potential 2016 Republican candidates, Clinton has seen her lead decline from 20-plus points in February to the mid-single digits today."

CNN: "Gap shrinks between Hillary Clinton and Republicans"

"While Hillary Clinton still maintains an advantage over potential GOPrivals in 2016, a new poll shows that her lead is narrowing. And as her book tour has received extensive coverage, her support has dropped below 50%, according to the McClatchy-Marist poll released Thursday."

Politico: "Poll: Hillary Clinton's 2016 lead drops"

"A McClatchy-Marist poll released Thursday shows that support for potential Democratic candidate Clinton has dropped to under 50 percent in head-to-head matchups as support for Republican potential candidates such as New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is gaining."

Time opinion: Sen. Rand Paul: "We Must Demilitarize the Police"

"The outrage in Ferguson is understandable—though there is never an excuse for rioting or looting. There is a legitimate role for the police to keep the peace, but there should be a difference between a police response and a military response."

Articles:

New York Times: "Is This Island Big Enough for Clinton and Obama?"

By Michael D. Shear, Jonathan Martin and Amy Chozick

August 13, 2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VINEYARD HAVEN, Mass. — Hillary Rodham Clinton blew into this tiny island town like a fast-moving hurricane on Wednesday, creating a commotion at the Bunch of Grapes bookstore, where hundreds of admirers waited for hours in the rain for a glimpse of the woman who they hope will be the next president.

“When I heard Hillary was going to be here, I literally started crying,” said Lily Richards, a 17-year-old high school senior from Greenfield, Mass., whose high school thesis paper argued for Mrs. Clinton’s election as president. “Oh my God, I have to go.”

Up island from the hubbub, President Obama is vacationing at a sprawling shingled home, still setting off friendly waves from locals when his motorcade glides by. But after six years, energy here and elsewhere appears to be shifting from Mr. Obama toward Mrs. Clinton, as the former secretary of state moves away from the president’s orbit toward her own political future, generating tensions that are spilling out in unusual ways.

Mr. Obama is fast becoming the past, not the future, for donors, activists and Democratic strategists. Party leaders are increasingly turning toward Mrs. Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, as Democrats face difficult races this fall in states where the president is especially unpopular, and her aides are making plain that she has no intention of running for “Obama’s third term.”

The moment is an awkward one, and some moves by Mrs. Clinton are reopening wounds from the 2008 primary contest. Her blunt public criticism of the president’s foreign policy in The Atlantic this week touched off frustration among Mr. Obama’s advisers and supporters, especially her suggestion that under Mr. Obama, the United States lacked an “organizing principle” in its approach to international relations. “ ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle,” Mrs. Clinton said.

Christine Pelosi, a longtime Democratic activist and daughter of the House minority leader, Nancy Pelosi, said her phone and email “just exploded” after Mrs. Clinton’s remarks.

“Now is not the time to second guess the commander in chief, particularly when you’re a former member of his cabinet and national security team,” Ms. Pelosi said.

The sharpest response to the interview came from David Axelrod, who helped Mr. Obama crush Mrs. Clinton in the primary six years ago in part by calling attention to her support for the Iraq war. “Just to clarify: ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision,” Mr. Axelrod wrote on Twitter on Tuesday.

Mrs. Clinton then issued an unusual public statement, saying that she had called the president to reassure him that she had not intended to attack him, and that she looked forward to “hugging it out” with him at a party hosted by Vernon E. Jordan Jr. on Martha’s Vineyard on Wednesday night.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama sat at the same table during the party, a birthday celebration for Mr. Jordan’s wife, Ann, at the Farm Neck Golf Club. The president and his former top diplomat ate surf ’n’ turf and pasta, but White House officials declined to say whether they hugged.

When Mrs. Clinton arrived Wednesday to begin signing copies of her latest book, “Hard Choices,” on Wednesday, she paused to respond to reporters who called out questions about her relationship with Mr. Obama. She answered without missing a beat, saying: “We have disagreements, as any partners and friends — as we are — might very well have. But I’m proud that I served with him and for him.”

Then she turned her focus to her waiting fans, greeting them with a big smile, a “thanks for being here” or “hello, sir, how are you?” and a quick flick of the pen as she signed their books. Owners of the bookstore said they had sold more than 1,000 books in advance of the event.

“Awesome. I just talked to the 45th president!” said Cynthia Woolbright, 63, who pumped her fist in the air after the former first lady signed her copy.

Some Obama administration officials complain privately that Mrs. Clinton is already making the president’s job more difficult. As Mr. Obama navigates multiple foreign crises abroad, they say, he finds few vocal supporters in the Democratic foreign policy establishment because would-be diplomats and advisers have their eye on jobs in a future Clinton administration and do not want to be seen as taking sides in a dispute between Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even before Mrs. Clinton's critique of Mr. Obama, some of the president's original loyalists were questioning the wisdom of her high-profile book tour, which has been likened to a trial run for a national campaign.

"I don't even understand why they're doing this," Mr. Axelrod said in an interview earlier this summer. "If I were her, I would be so sparing. With this, she makes herself a candidate and a target. Why she'd want to be out there so early is beyond me."

Robert Gibbs, another former adviser to Mr. Obama, said Mrs. Clinton risked being drawn into an extended news media examination that would not benefit a potential candidacy. Plus, Mr. Gibbs noted, Mrs. Clinton is inevitably going to draw attention from Mr. Obama's agenda in the small window that exists between now and when the 2016 campaign is fully engaged.

"There's no doubt that there's a certain amount of news that you're going to cede each day," he said of Mr. Obama.

Officially, Mr. Obama's aides dismiss the notion that there is strain between the president and Mrs. Clinton and insist that their staffs have worked hard to develop trust. And they say it is natural for Mrs. Clinton to stake out her own positions.

"It would be weird if she had no differences with us," Benjamin J. Rhodes, the deputy national security adviser, said shortly after "Hard Choices" was published. "She has every right to say where there are some differences, even as she's made clear they agree on most issues."

Still, the role reversal is a striking reminder that nothing in politics is fixed. Mr. Obama eclipsed the Clintons in 2008 as the fresh, new face of the Democratic Party, portraying them as baby boomer relics. Now, Mr. Obama is in danger of becoming a lame duck, and his party has once again started thinking about tomorrow — with the Clintons in mind.

Democratic strategists say the difference in standing will be especially striking this fall. The party is being overrun with candidates' requests for the Clintons to campaign for them, while almost no candidate wishes to appear with Mr. Obama.

Others suggested that Mrs. Clinton's criticism of the president's foreign policy could actually help some Democratic candidates in places where Mr. Obama is very unpopular. And her aides clearly believe it will help her.

Many of those who lined up for the book-signing in the steady rain, patiently submitting to Secret Service screening and following lines marked with yellow police tape, were women.

"I love Obama," said Patti McGrath, 72, of Harwich, Mass., "but I want to see women leading countries."

The Daily Beast: "Obama Stifled Hillary's Syria Plans and Ignored Her Iraq Warnings for Years"

By Josh Rogin

August 14, 2014

[Subtitle:] The rift between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama over Syria that spilled view this week was three years in the making and was about much more than just arming the rebels.

Throughout 2011 and well into 2012, President Obama's White House barred Hillary Clinton's State Department from even talking directly to the moderate Syria rebels. This was only one of several ways the Obama team kept the Clinton team from doing more in Syria, back before the revolution was hijacked by ISIS and spread into Iraq.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The policy feud has flared up again in recent weeks, with Clinton decrying Obama's Syria policy, Obama's inner circle hitting back, and the president himself calling criticism of his Syria moves "horseshit." Obama and his former secretary of state promised to patch things up at a social gathering on Wednesday. But the rift is deep, and years in the making.

Clinton and her senior staff warned the White House multiple times before she left office that the Syrian civil war was getting worse, that working with the civilian opposition was not enough, and that the extremists were gaining ground. The United States needed to engage directly with the Free Syrian Army, they argued; the loose conglomeration of armed rebel groups was more moderate than the Islamic forces—and begging for help from the United States. According to several administration officials who were there, her State Department also warned the White House that Iraq could fall victim to the growing instability in Syria. It was all part of a State Department plea to the president to pursue a different policy.

"The State Department warned as early as 2012 that extremists in eastern Syria would link up with extremists in Iraq. We warned in 2012 that Iraq and Syria would become one conflict," said former U.S. ambassador to Syria Robert Ford. "We highlighted the competition between rebel groups on the ground, and we warned if we didn't help the moderates, the extremists would gain."

But the warnings, which also came from other senior officials—including then-CIA chief David Petraeus and Defense Secretary Leon Panetta—fell on deaf ears. Obama's small circle of White House foreign policy advisers resisted efforts to make connections with rebel fighters on the ground until 2013, when the administration began to train and equip a few select vetted brigades. For many who worked on Syria policy inside the administration, it was too little, too late.

In the spring of 2012, the State Department prepared several classified reports for the White House that provided evidence that the Assad regime was much more durable than thought and was not on the verge of collapse, as both the White House and State Department had assessed up to that point. Back then, the al Qaeda offshoot Jabhat al-Nusra was the main extremist threat, but Clinton's State Department was prevented from having any relationship with the rebels who were fighting both the terrorists and the regime, often having to work through intermediaries.

But for Clinton personally, the engagement of the armed groups was crucial and the White House's forced policy of pretending that the best way to support the revolution was through the civilian opposition based in Turkey was foolish.

"Clinton understood that the guys with the guns mattered, not the people in Istanbul, that it would have regional implications, and that it could become one large operating area for al Qaeda," said Ford. "In 2012 and the start of 2013 the most we could do was to provide help to the civilian opposition. We had no permission from the White House to help the FSA, so we did not do so."

Toward the end of 2012, the White House allowed Ford and other State Department officials to have direct contact with the FSA but still barred even the provision of non-lethal aid. John Kerry, who also pushed to arm the rebels, finally got the White House to agree to non-lethal assistance in February 2013. The CIA ticked up its support for some armed rebel groups later that summer.

Throughout Clinton's tenure, the White House ban on doing more to help the Syrian rebels wasn't explicit, but over time everybody got the message. Even U.S. allies in the region, who wanted the United States to take control of the arming of the rebels, were complaining loudly to U.S. officials that the extremists were taking advantage of U.S. inaction.

"There was never a stated policy, but there was a well understood view that we were not going to do any more in Syria than we absolutely had to," said James Smith, who served as U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia from 2009 to 2013. "The Saudis wanted us to be more involved. They were very concerned about the U.S. being perceived as weak and ineffectual."

White House and National Security Council press staff did not respond to requests for comment.

Another State Department official who worked on Syria during Clinton's tenure said the fights between White House and State Department staff over whether to help the rebels got heated at times. The State Department tried to alleviate Obama's concerns about helping the rebels—it's too risky, the arms could get lost, it won't help—by working hard to figure out who the rebels were and how the United States could help them safely.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"[The State Department] tried to get the opposition to a place where if the president did decide to arm the rebels, it would be easier to do," the official said. "But the institution of the State Department and the institution of the White House were not on the same page. The president didn't budge, and Hillary had no control over that."

Several former officials expressed exasperation this week after President Obama told The New York Times that the idea that arming the rebels would have made a difference had "always been a fantasy" and that "former doctors, farmers, pharmacists and so forth" could win the war "was never in the cards."

They say Obama's recent comments reveal that he was pursuing a policy that he didn't believe in, by eventually agreeing to let the CIA arm some rebels, but only a little. This year, the president is asking Congress for $500 million to train and equip the very rebels Obama thinks are hopeless.

"It wasn't a fantasy when the U.S. government started training and arming these doctors, farmers, and pharmacists, and led them to believe the U.S. was coming to help them," said another former administration official who worked on the Middle East. "To them, the president's remark is a kick in the gut."

Clinton had to call Obama and apologize after the publication of her Atlantic interview, in which she said Obama's "failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Bashar al-Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled."

Obama's and Clinton's press staffs have both tried to deescalate the feud this week and emphasize their areas of agreement. Obama is particularly sensitive about the criticism that his refusal to arm the rebels contributed to the current crisis in Syria and Iraq. In a meeting with lawmakers even before Clinton's interview, he called that criticism "horseshit."

But even as the White House and Clinton team tried to paper over dispute this week, White House and State Department spokespeople were still sending different messages about the Syrian moderate opposition and whether the U.S. will help them. The State Department emphasized American assistance for the rebels; the White House downplayed the efficacy of that assistance.

"The U.S. has increased the scope and scale of our assistance to the moderate Syrian opposition, including announcements made last year and a request the president made of Congress this year to fund and authorize a train-and-equip program for the moderate Syrian opposition. That's something we think is important, and we've continued to increase our efforts in that area," said State Department deputy spokeswoman Marie Harf on Tuesday, emphasizing that Assad helped start ISIS in the first place and facilitated its activities in Iraq for years. "The Syrian opposition is alive and well in Syria."

Deputy National Security Adviser for Communications Ben Rhodes, on the other hand, emphasized Obama's resistance to Clinton's strategy to help the rebels, because Obama never thought it could work.

"The reason that the president was very deliberate in his decision-making there is 1) we wanted to make sure that we were providing assistance to people who we knew, so that it wouldn't fall into the wrong hands given how many extremists were operating in that area," he said. "And 2) we didn't see a plan that was going to decisively tip the balance against Assad."

Wall Street Journal opinion: Karl Rove: "Hillary's Risky Hawkish Makeover"

By Karl Rove

August 13, 2014, 7:04 p.m. EDT

Barack Obama believed his legacy as president would be that he ended the Iraq war. It looks increasingly that his legacy could be that he lost it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By their admission, President Obama and Vice President Joe Biden inherited a war that had been won. In 2011 Mr. Obama said America was "leaving behind a sovereign, stable and self-reliant Iraq," and Mr. Biden proclaimed Iraq "one of the great achievements of this administration."

Mr. Obama then committed a massive error in judgment by withdrawing all U.S. troops. That allowed the rise of the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham, or ISIS, the world's most formidable, merciless and dangerous terrorist army. ISIS is now establishing an Islamist caliphate that stretches from Aleppo in Syria to Fallujah and Mosul in Iraq and beyond.

The president was warned about the ISIS threat for months, yet did essentially nothing. As in so many other important moments when decisive action was required, his actions were haphazard and reactive, his leadership detached, his will almost nonexistent.

Even this past week, with ISIS threatening Kurdistan's capital and engaging in genocide against Yazidis and Christians, the best the president could do was order "targeted" airstrikes and send 130 additional troops to serve as "military advisers." While better than nothing, these actions do not demonstrate a commitment to defeating ISIS. Instead, Mr. Obama seems content to cede much of Iraq and Syria to the terrorists. That will have catastrophic consequences.

The Iraq calamity is the most recent in a staggering run of foreign-policy failures, from Syria to Libya to Afghanistan to Russia to Gaza. The president is paying a political price for his bumbling. The July 14 Pew Research poll found only 35% approve of Mr. Obama's handling of Iraq, while 54% disapprove, down from 46% approve and 41% disapprove in January 2011. Mr. Obama's numbers are likely worse today, one month further into the crisis.

Things are so bad that Mr. Obama is even drawing fire from his former secretary of state, Hillary Clinton. She is distancing herself from his foreign policy, telling the Atlantic's Jeffery Goldberg that she favored aiding Syrian opposition groups when Mr. Obama did not. His refusal to provide aid, she said, left a vacuum that was filled by ISIS.

Mrs. Clinton also made it clear that she would be tougher on the Iranian nuclear program and a stronger supporter of Israel than Mr. Obama. Then she added a wicked jab. Playing off the president's earlier quip that his approach to foreign policy is "Don't do stupid s—", she said, "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Mrs. Clinton is calculating that she must separate herself from the president she served because voters increasingly see him as inept and weak. She argues that she is a foreign-policy Goldilocks, balanced between the frontier rambunctiousness of Mr. Obama's predecessor and the erudite timidity of Mr. Obama.

Moving away from Mr. Obama may look good on paper, but it may not work so well. For one thing, Mrs. Clinton cannot point to any notable successes during her State Department tenure. If she developed a strategy that was more than the laughable "reset" button she used to mend U.S. relations with Russia, it escaped public view. Distancing herself from the president's foreign policy also underscores her failure to persuade Mr. Obama to act otherwise.

Mrs. Clinton's shots at the president have angered administration loyalists. Former Obama senior adviser David Axelrod reacted by tweeting that her vote as a senator to authorize the use of force in Iraq was "a tragically bad decision." Liberal commentators are warning that Mrs. Clinton's comments show she is not the inevitable nominee. After being whipsawed, her people now say she called Mr. Obama to "clarify her criticism" and looked forward to "hugging it out" with him at a Martha's Vineyard party Wednesday.

There is a historical precedent worth considering. Vice President Hubert Humphrey found it difficult to distance himself in 1968 from an unpopular President Lyndon Baines Johnson, and he suffered because of it. It was not until a Sept. 30 nationally televised address, when he broke completely with LBJ over the Vietnam War, that he felt he got his campaign back on track. But it was too little, too late, and Humphrey lost to Richard Nixon.

While she is starting her distancing earlier, in some respects Mrs. Clinton faces a greater challenge than Humphrey did in 1968. A gifted politician might be able to pull off what she is attempting, but she is hardly that talented. It's more likely that she will fail to win over many of Mr. Obama's critics as she alienates many of his supporters, making her road to the nomination and White House more difficult.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Even with Hillary Clinton in the race, 2016 is basically a toss-up"

By Aaron Blake

August 14, 2014, 1:19 p.m. EDT

It's no big surprise that Hillary Clinton has come back down to earth polling-wise in the last few months. Her stumbles aside, it was basically bound to happen eventually -- for a whole host of reasons.

A new poll from McClatchy and Marist College documents that decline pretty well. In hypothetical matchups with potential 2016 Republican candidates, Clinton has seen her lead decline from 20-plus points in February to the mid-single digits today. She leads Chris Christie by six points after leading him by 21 points six months ago. She leads Jeb Bush 48-41 after leading him by 20 in February. She leads Rand Paul 48-42 after leading him by the same margin early this year.

Here's how that looks:

[GRAPHS]

Democrats will point out that Clinton is still ahead against all comers. And that's true. It's also true, though, that these polls pretty much show the 2016 presidential race is a toss-up.

Clinton's continued lead, at this point, is pretty clearly a function of her superior name ID. While Clinton wins the votes of 97 percent of "strong Democrats" in all three matchups, Christie and Paul take only 91 percent of "strong Republicans." While Clinton takes 79 percent of "soft Democrats," Paul only takes 65 percent of "soft Republicans." That's largely because these Republicans aren't as well-known to their base.

In all three matchups, Clinton continues to take at least 20 percent of so-called "soft Republicans." That's to her credit, and good on her if she can somehow keep it up. We would wager, though, that as those "soft Republicans" actually get to know Republicans and the GOPs campaign against Clinton begins in earnest, there's no way Clinton will continue to pick off one in five of even the most casual GOP voters. It's just not possible in today's polarized political environment.

As for pure independents-- those who don't really lean toward either party -- they continue to favor Clinton in two of the three matchups. But in all three matchups, around one-third of these voters are undecided. These are the voters that will decide the 2016 election, and there are a lot of them up for grabs. We doubt many of them know much about Rand Paul, Jeb Bush and Chris Christie, even as all of them know who Clinton is.

At this point in the game, Clinton is so well-known that she's effectively the incumbent, trying to ward off her lesser-known challengers. And, as with an incumbent, to the extent that she's below 50 percent in the polls, it's hard to call her a favorite.

CNN: "Gap shrinks between Hillary Clinton and Republicans"

By Ashley Killough

August 14, 2014, 8:36 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Hillary Clinton still maintains an advantage over potential GOP rivals in 2016, a new poll shows that her lead is narrowing.

And as her book tour has received extensive coverage, her support has dropped below 50%, according to the McClatchy-Marist poll released Thursday.

The survey also looks at the 2016 Republican primary and who fares best among the potential candidates.

Clinton vs. Republican

In a hypothetical matchup against Sen. Rand Paul, Clinton bests the Kentucky Republican, 48%-42%, with 10% undecided. The 6-point margin is equal to the poll's sampling error, and the gap is narrower than in April, when Clinton had a 55%-39%

Matched against Gov. Chris Christie, Clinton leads the New Jersey Republican, 47%-41%, with 12% of voters undecided. That's down from her 53%-42% advantage over Christie in April.

Clinton has also lost her wide margin over former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who she leads 48%-41%, down from her 55%-39% advantage in April.

Republican primary

The poll also asked Republicans and Republican-leaning independents who they would support in the GOP presidential primary. Like nearly every other 2016 poll, the McClatchy-Marist poll indicates there is no frontrunner in the race, and nearly a quarter of Republicans are undecided.

Bush and Christie tie for the top spot at 13% each, with Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas following behind at 10%. Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, who served as the 2012 vice presidential nominee, ties with Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida at 9%.

Paul and Texas Gov. Rick Perry tie at 7% each. Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal all receive less than 5% of support.

The poll also indicates that Paul, while trying to expand the Republican Party has lost support among tea party supporters. In April, he came in at 20% among tea party backers, with Cruz at 6%. Paul now has only has 7% support from the group, compared to Cruz at 15% - the top spot.

The survey was conducted on August 4 with 1,035 adults, including 806 registered voters, questioned over the phone. The registered voters' subset has a sampling error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points. For questions about the 2016 GOP primary, 342 Republicans and Republican-leaning independents were interviewed, with a sampling error of plus minus 5.3 percentage points.

Politico: "Poll: Hillary Clinton's 2016 lead drops"

By Kendall Breitman

August 14, 2014, 10:12 a.m. EDT

The Republican front-runners for the 2016 GOPpresidential nomination are shrinking the gap between themselves and Hillary Clinton, according to a new poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A McClatchy-Marist poll released Thursday shows that support for potential Democratic candidate Clinton has dropped to under 50 percent in head-to-head matchups as support for Republican potential candidates such as New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is gaining.

When asked to chose between Clinton and Christie, 48 percent of those polled said they would vote for Clinton in a general election if one were held today, compared to 41 percent who supported Christie. Four months ago, in April, 53 percent of people said that they would vote for Clinton, while 42 percent sided with Christie. In February, Clinton had an even larger advantage, with 58 percent supporting Clinton and 37 percent saying they would vote for Christie.

Paul, another front runner for the 2016 GOP presidential nomination, is also gaining on the former secretary of state. In April, Clinton led Paul 54 percent to 40 percent. In August, Paul is catching up with 42 percent of Americans saying they would vote for the Kentucky senator while 48 percent sided with Clinton.

A similar shrinking gap can be seen between Clinton and Bush. In April, 55 percent of Americans said that they would vote for Clinton in a general election and 39 percent said that they would vote for Bush. On Thursday, results show that only 48 percent supported Clinton while 41 percent said that they would side with Bush in a general election.

This poll was conducted via live-interview telephone survey Aug. 4-7 among 803 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

Time opinion: Sen. Rand Paul: "We Must Demilitarize the Police"

By Sen. Rand Paul

August 14, 2014, 12:26 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Anyone who thinks that race does not skew the application of criminal justice in this country is just not paying close enough attention. And the root of the problem is big government.

The shooting of 18-year-old Michael Brown is an awful tragedy that continues to send shockwaves through the community of Ferguson, Missouri and across the nation.

If I had been told to get out of the street as a teenager, there would have been a distinct possibility that I might have smarted off. But, I wouldn't have expected to be shot.

The outrage in Ferguson is understandable—though there is never an excuse for rioting or looting. There is a legitimate role for the police to keep the peace, but there should be a difference between a police response and a military response.

The images and scenes we continue to see in Ferguson resemble war more than traditional police action.

Glenn Reynolds, in Popular Mechanics, recognized the increasing militarization of the police five years ago. In 2009 he wrote:

"Soldiers and police are supposed to be different. … Police look inward. They're supposed to protect their fellow citizens from criminals, and to maintain order with a minimum of force.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s the difference between Audie Murphy and Andy Griffith. But nowadays, police are looking, and acting, more like soldiers than cops, with bad consequences. And those who suffer the consequences are usually innocent civilians.”

The Cato Institute’s Walter Olson observed this week how the rising militarization of law enforcement is currently playing out in Ferguson:

“Why armored vehicles in a Midwestern inner suburb? Why would cops wear camouflage gear against a terrain patterned by convenience stores and beauty parlors? Why are the authorities in Ferguson, Mo. so given to quasi-martial crowd control methods (such as bans on walking on the street) and, per the reporting of Riverfront Times, the firing of tear gas at people in their own yards? (‘This my property!’ he shouted, prompting police to fire a tear gas canister directly at his face.’) Why would someone identifying himself as an 82nd Airborne Army veteran, observing the Ferguson police scene, comment that ‘We rolled lighter than that in an actual warzone’?”

Olson added, “the dominant visual aspect of the story, however, has been the sight of overpowering police forces confronting unarmed protesters who are seen waving signs or just their hands.”

How did this happen?

Most police officers are good cops and good people. It is an unquestionably difficult job, especially in the current circumstances.

There is a systemic problem with today’s law enforcement.

Not surprisingly, big government has been at the heart of the problem. Washington has incentivized the militarization of local police precincts by using federal dollars to help municipal governments build what are essentially small armies—where police departments compete to acquire military gear that goes far beyond what most of Americans think of as law enforcement.

This is usually done in the name of fighting the war on drugs or terrorism. The Heritage Foundation’s Evan Bernick wrote in 2013 that, “the Department of Homeland Security has handed out anti-terrorism grants to cities and towns across the country, enabling them to buy armored vehicles, guns, armor, aircraft, and other equipment.”

Bernick continued, “federal agencies of all stripes, as well as local police departments in towns with populations less than 14,000, come equipped with SWAT teams and heavy artillery.”

Bernick noted the cartoonish imbalance between the equipment some police departments possess and the constituents they serve, “today, Bossier Parish, Louisiana, has a .50 caliber gun mounted on an armored vehicle. The Pentagon gives away millions of pieces of military equipment to police departments across the country—tanks included.”

When you couple this militarization of law enforcement with an erosion of civil liberties and due process that allows the police to become judge and jury—national security letters, no-knock searches, broad general warrants, pre-conviction forfeiture—we begin to have a very serious problem on our hands.

Given these developments, it is almost impossible for many Americans not to feel like their government is targeting them. Given the racial disparities in our criminal justice system, it is impossible for African-Americans not to feel like their government is particularly targeting them.

This is part of the anguish we are seeing in the tragic events outside of St. Louis, Missouri. It is what the citizens of Ferguson feel when there is an unfortunate and heartbreaking shooting like the incident with Michael Brown.

Anyone who thinks that race does not still, even if inadvertently, skew the application of criminal justice in this country is just not paying close enough attention. Our prisons are full of black and brown men and women who are serving inappropriately long and harsh sentences for non-violent mistakes in their youth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The militarization of our law enforcement is due to an unprecedented expansion of government power in this realm. It is one thing for federal officials to work in conjunction with local authorities to reduce or solve crime. It is quite another for them to subsidize it.

Americans must never sacrifice their liberty for an illusive and dangerous, or false, security. This has been a cause I have championed for years, and one that is at a near-crisis point in our country.

Let us continue to pray for Michael Brown's family, the people of Ferguson, police, and citizens alike.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com> Jim <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com> "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com> "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com> "David Binder" <David@db-research.com> "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com> "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com> "Dennis Cheng" <dcheng@hillaryclinton.com> "Huma Abedin" <ha16@hillaryclinton.com> "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com> "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com> "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com> "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	4/27/2015 12:13:06 PM
Subject:	Fundraiser TPs and Q&A additions
Attachments:	2015-04-27 Fundraising TPs - 630pm.docx 2015-04-27 Q&A Additions.docx

Flagging for everyone some talking points for tomorrow's fundraisers and also some suggested Q&A on Clinton Cash and Baltimore.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Lauren Peterson" <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/31/2015 11:01:21 AM
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Here it is: https://twitter.com/HillaryClinton/status/627237070268964864

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 3:45 PM, Lauren Peterson <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
Will nudge the approvals chain right now

On Jul 31, 2015, at 3:42 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I hope so! Can we get it going?

From: Christina Reynolds [mailto:creynolds@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 3:40 PM
To: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >; Lauren Peterson <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; Katie Dowd <kdowd@hillaryclinton.com >; Jenna Lowenstein <jlowenstein@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com >; Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Is this happening?

From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 1:04 PM
To: Lauren Peterson <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; Katie Dowd <kdowd@hillaryclinton.com >; Jenna Lowenstein <jlowenstein@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hillaryclinton.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >; Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

ok by me

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 1:02 PM, Lauren Peterson <lpeterson@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

I vote for just replying directly with no period before the @ - people will see this and it will get pickup. We do need to shorten though - here's my attempt:

@ marcorubio That's backwards—engagement's a threat to the Castros, not a gift. Embargo hasn't worked for 50 yrs. Cuban ppl deserve better -H

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:41 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

+ Nick and Lauren.

From: Brian Fallon [mailto:bfallon@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:39 PM
To: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>; Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Like this (w the handle). Lets do it

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:35 PM, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

I like including his handle.

.@marcorubio you've got it backwards: Engagement isn't a gift to the Castros -- it's a threat to the Castros. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Cuban people deserve better.

On Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 12:26 PM, Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

Dan/Brian, would love your input on this.

From: Christina Reynolds [mailto:creynolds@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:18 PM
To: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
Subject: Re: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Love hitting him back. Will defer to the policy experts on which one, but I like mixing it up when we have the high ground.

On Jul 31, 2015, at 12:16 PM, Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

I like that. Another option:

@marcorubio I'm for the Cuban people. Time to stop helping the Castros through failed policies. Going back to those would be the mistake.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:14 PM
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Adding Reynolds.

Perhaps an HRC tweet along the lines of:

Those who seek to lead our country should focus on the future, not try to pull us back to the past. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Let's try something new.

From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 12:05 PM
To: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

I'm good with either. Whatever is faster.

On Jul 31, 2015 8:00 AM, "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Adding Laura and Fallon. John, did you have in mind having HRC hit back, or campaign?
>
> From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 10:57 AM
> To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: Fwd: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
>
> Here we go...
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: Jeremy Massey <jmassey@hillaryclinton.com >
> Date: Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 10:31 AM
> Subject: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
> To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >
>
> User Actions
>
> Following

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco RubioVerified account @marcorubio

After Clinton's failed 'reset' with Putin, now she wants to do a 'reset' with Castro. She is making another mistake.

https://twitter.com/marcorubio/status/627124174495055872

--

Jeremy Massey

Research Department

847 736 9211

JMassey@HillaryClinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ian Sams" <isams@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid@googlegroups.com
Date: 4/12/2015 2:15:07 PM
Subject: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks

Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.

Thanks.
Ian

OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS

Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.

- Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.

- Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.

- Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.

If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:

Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.

- Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
- Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
- Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
- Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
- Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Paul Begala" <info@seanmaloney.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 2/6/2014 1:29:53 PM
Subject: boomerang!

sean patrick maloney
Democrat for Congress

John-

It's a bit like a boomerang: You don't have to worry about getting hit 'til it comes back at you.

Well, Nan Hayworth is coming back at Sean with $100,000 of her own money, plus all the millions her biggest fan, Karl Rove, can get his mitts on.

I know Sean unseated her last time, but with the kind of cash Hayworth's extreme ideology avails her, she could win it again.

And we know exactly what we're getting with Hayworth – another vote to defund Planned Parenthood, to play Russian Roulette with the American economy and the Full Faith and Credit of the United States of America, cut taxes on billionaires – excuse me while I catch my breath… OK – essentially end Medicare as we know it, cut taxes for Big Oil, hold disaster aid hostage to other cuts in vital services and cut more taxes on billionaires.

Hayworth's using her personal wealth to jumpstart her attacks on Sean. Sean needs a grassroots response to match her $100,000 in the next 48 hours – will you help him respond?

Donate $250 or more now! Make sure Sean has what he needs to respond to Hayworth and Rove's dishonest attacks.

The last off-year election was 2010 – you remember, the rise of the Tea Party? Well, they were defeated in 2012 and see 2014 as their opportunity for a comeback. That's what Hayworth's thinking. Add in that Hayworth – a Planned Parenthood-attacking, anti-choice, anti-worker extremist – is fronting her own cash, and it's clear she means business this time.

We have to gear up, too. Sean needs to raise $100,000 in the next 48 hours to keep pace and fight back. Will you help now?

Click here to give $250 or more in a New York minute. Hayworth's in. This can't wait.

Thank you,

Paul

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Contribute

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com.
To unsubscribe from the Sean Patrick Maloney for Congress email list, please click here.

Paid for by Sean Patrick Maloney for Congress

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 12/20/2014 7:33:25 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Saturday December 20, 2014 Roundup

Correct The Record Saturday December 20, 2014 Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: On her first trip to Iraq as Sec. of State, @HillaryClinton held a roundtable with Iraqi women #HRC365 http://1.usa.gov/1dR4Hzg [11:00 a.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Politico: "Democratic techies' divided loyalties"

"While Clinton has a deep bench to draw from, she'll also be staffing up in the first open Democratic presidential primary to feature so many different tech companies competing for campaign business."

Huffington Post: "Elizabeth Warren Is Good and Bad News for the Democrats"

"The saving grace for now is that Democrats, by a lop-sided margin, are solidly behind Clinton. That's the good news for Clinton. The bad news is those numbers mask the weak enthusiasm or outright opposition that many Democrats have to a Clinton presidential bid. Warren almost certainly will continue to remain their alternative."

The Washington Post: "In Paul-Rubio feud over Cuba, a preview of 2016"

"The spat was also the latest example of Paul's combative tendencies. He has been the most aggressive GOP presidential contender in taking on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, a former secretary of state and likely Democratic candidate, and showed Friday that he will not hesitate to throw punches at fellow Republicans as well."

CNN Politics: "2016 Republicans slam Cuba announcement"

"The GOP positions set up a clear contrast with a possible 2016 Democratic election rival Hillary Clinton, who expressed support for Obama's moves in a statement released Wednesday night."

Politico: "Leaked: Democrats' attack plan for Bush"

"The Democratic National Committee wants surrogates to attack Jeb Bush as the Mitt Romney of 2016, an out-of-touch representative of the 1 percent who is more conservative than he lets on."

CNN Politics: "Inside the push to draft Ben Carson for president"

"Sousa, 67, launched a super PAC last year that has raised millions in an effort to urge Dr. Ben Carson to explore a White House bid. Since the launch, Sousa and his team have proven to be a fundraising powerhouse, raising a whopping $12.2 million from more than 100,000 donors. That even edged out the effort by Hillary Clinton's supporters, who have raised $12.1 million for the "Ready for Hillary" super PAC."

Washington Examiner: "Future uncertain, Romney sits atop GOP polls"

"Many polls don't include Romney in their surveys. But the many that do suggest that, at least for now, Romney is a front-runner, if not the front-runner in the 2016 Republican race."

Articles:

Politico: "Democratic techies' divided loyalties"

By DARREN SAMUELSOHN 12/20/14 9:03 AM EST

[Subtitle]: Ex-Obama hands split between Clinton, rivals.

Scores of the Democratic techies who helped Barack Obama defeat Hillary Clinton for the 2008 presidential nomination are now seeking alternatives to Clinton in 2016. Some are even promising the same kind of digital throw-down to sink her presumptive front-runner campaign as they did in 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is still expected to be able to field a formidable tech team. But her troubles in grabbing many of the party's young campaign innovators have a good deal to do with Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat who insists she's not running for president but who has quickly become an appealing pick for Obama alumni who built his two campaigns' data and digital infrastructure. Earlier this month, more than 300 of Obama's former campaign staffers, including his chief information officer and senior aides who handled email, online fundraising and field efforts, released a letter begging Warren to jump into the race.

"What we were trying to do is send a signal to the larger country but also to Sen. Warren herself to say a lot of this institutional knowledge and power that's been built up over the last couple of years actually is with you," Christopher Hass, an Obama 2008 and 2012 digital campaign aide, said in an interview.

"We're not robots," added Catherine Bracy, who led Obama's San Francisco field office in 2012. "I think people are going to choose the candidate who inspires them the most. And for many of us that's Elizabeth Warren."

While Clinton's other potential 2016 rivals will be widely outmatched on the financial front, they are hardly tech neophytes and each brings his own digital skill sets to compete on the social media battlefield and for critical early votes in Iowa and New Hampshire. After all, Bernie Sanders is arguably Congress' biggest social media powerhouse; Martin O'Malley has governed both Baltimore and Maryland with an obsessive eye on statistics; and Jim Webb has a proven track record as a candidate willing to use progressive bloggers and viral videos to exploit his opponents' weaknesses for advantage.

"I'd not be surprised if [Sanders] or one of the others get several bumps over the next six months," said a senior Democratic source, noting the Vermont senator's ability to make waves on Facebook and Twitter while Clinton at the same time would be working to define her own new narrative. "I think she's got an enormous challenge reintroducing a brand that's been around this long and getting people excited about it. It's going to be tricky."

Clinton, of course, won't be lacking in the tech department either. She'll have plenty of money for the latest and greatest in campaign gadgets and her front-runner status makes her the most alluring landing pad for many senior Obama campaign officials who have gone on to lucrative careers running the party's leading digital and data consulting firms.

A high-stakes bidding war is also already underway among leading partisan technology shops to get Clinton's business, including Blue State Digital, Bully Pulpit Interactive, Catalist, NGP VAN, Precision Strategies, Rising Tide Interactive, Trilogy Interactive and 270 Strategies, according to interviews with more than two dozen Democratic sources angling for 2016 work.

While Clinton has a deep bench to draw from, she'll also be staffing up in the first open Democratic presidential primary to feature so many different tech companies competing for campaign business. Among prospective tech consultants, multiple questions loom over how she would structure her tech team (Bring the whole team entirely in house? Or create a patchwork of people who report to campaign headquarters and others who remain at their current employer?) and whether she would draw from multiple agencies that have their own unique skill sets.

A Democrat working at one of the major tech firms predicted the battle for Clinton business will get ugly. "Those guys are going to be knives out fighting each other," the source said.

Democrats say there's also a strong sentiment that Clinton — whose spokesman did not respond to a request for comment — won't repeat her own 2008 presidential campaign's tech flubs. There have been too many lessons drawn from Obama's successes — Republicans have gone to school too on his playbook— that demonstrate just how important it is to build up a strong data infrastructure and apply it routinely in the search for the right voters, donors and volunteers.

More than anything, Democrats techies say they are waiting for the most important signal of all out of Clinton's camp: whether she'll hire a campaign manager with a solid digital and data pedigree. Two names most frequently mentioned as candidates for the job, Robby Mook and Guy Cecil, are both seen by their fellow Democrats as people who fit that bill given their resumes leading the House and Senate party campaign arms respectively.

But Clinton's front-runner allure isn't stopping others from getting started with their own 2016 plans — even if they don't have an official campaign to work for.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Revolution Messaging, a digital strategy firm founded by Obama 2008 external online director Scott Goodstein, has cut its ties with O'Malley's PAC after making more than $200,000 over two years helping the Maryland governor with general online organizing, video production, and management of its Facebook efforts and website.

At RootsCamp, an annual fair for progressive digital types held earlier this month in Washington, Revolution was working for another long-time client, MoveOn.org. The liberal group recently announced plans to spend $1 million urging Warren to run for president, and Arun Chaudhary, a Revolution staffer and former Obama White House videographer, was busy filming one of the group's leaders during a well-attended "Draft Warren" panel discussion that included activists from the Howard Dean-backed Democracy for America and the Ready for Warren campaign.

Goodstein and several other Obama alumni declined comment on their plans for the 2016 campaign. "I will work for the Cleveland Indians if they ask me," said Toby Fallsgraff, digital director for the Obama-affiliated nonprofit Organizing for Action. But several others who helped build Obama's two tech operations say they are ready to go to work — for Warren.

"I think there is absolutely an implication in that, that if [Warren] were to run, a lot of these people would be willing to use their talents and their networks and she'd be able to build a really quality team with a lot of veterans of the Obama campaigns," said Hass, who helped organize the pro-Warren letter among his former colleagues and who most recently worked as digital director for Illinois Gov. Pat Quinn's unsuccessful reelection bid. "It wouldn't be a question of that entire apparatus transferring over to Hillary Clinton or to another candidate and Warren having to start from scratch."

Erica Sagrans, the campaign manager for Ready for Warren and an Obama 2012 digital team staffer, said in an interview she's hoping she'll get the chance to square off against many of her former presidential campaign colleagues who are now angling for jobs with Clinton.

"It'd be amazing to see a Warren-Clinton primary from the digital end," she said. "Because it'd be me and other people who worked on Obama with people who are going to work on Clinton pushing each other in a much more serious way than [John] McCain and [Mitt] Romney."

While Clinton is sure to launch a digital fundraising and social media juggernaut — the Ready for Hillary super PAC team is expected to offer up an email list with about 3 million names — Sagrans said the Massachusetts Democrat could quickly mount a rival organization. "It doesn't matter what you've been building for two years if there's someone else who's running who people just flock to because they want to work for them and are excited about them," said Sagrans, who on Wednesday attended a Des Moines, Iowa, rally with MoveOn.org as it begins staffing up its Iowa field operation on Warren's behalf.

Finding quality digital talent also shouldn't be a problem for O'Malley, Webb and Sanders. For starters, the chance to work on a smaller and more nimble organization presents plenty of learning opportunities — "You can take risks," said Democratic microtargeting expert Ken Strasma— and each of the candidates has shown they understand the importance of technology in mounting a successful campaign.

Democrats say it's only a matter of time before the three aspiring 2016 candidates add additional staffers with national and state campaign experience, as well as experts from the private sector in Washington, Silicon Valley and other innovation hubs around the country.

"If I was advising a 20-something if they wanted to take a very low level position with the front runner or a higher position with the long shot, I'd say take the higher position with the long shot," said Strasma, who directed the microtargeting programs for Obama's 2008 campaign and John Kerry 2004 efforts. "Get some experience. Join the nominee after the primaries."

Strasma added that technology can be something of a great equalizer among the Democrats in 2016 thanks to lower costs for some of the essential equipment needed to run a tech-savvy presidential campaign.

"It's no longer that only the front runner can afford the talent, the hardware and the software," he said. "It doesn't completely level the playing field, or even come close. But to some degree it does. Just total dollars for broadcast television becomes less important as campaigns are more targeted."

For Sanders, a potential presidential bid is likely to draw off a built-in constituency of tech-savvy progressives —nearly 17,000 people have signed a petition organized by the Progressive Democrats of America on CREDO urging him to run as a Democrat instead of an independent. His following comes in large part from social media success: More than 1.3 million people follow Sanders' Google+ page and another 253,000 followers on Twitter are treated to a steady stream of pull quotes, graphics and video clips of the senator speaking on the Senate floor and in his frequent MSNBC appearances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders staffers also gloat that their boss has more people talking about him on Facebook than any other member of Congress, and more than twice as many as Obama.

Looking to 2016, Sanders is poised to be a small-dollar fundraising machine — he counts more than 1 million people combined who have signed up for his official Senate and campaign email lists. Staff-wise, he's surrounded by a small pack of young tech talent: Senate press secretary Jeff Frank co-founded his own Burlington-based social media analytics firm that was later bought by Dealer.com; deputy spokesman Kenneth Pennington launched a mobile technology blog and served for three years as its executive editor.

For Sanders' staffers, a big challenge will be just getting their boss to stop spending so much of his own time writing his own social media messages. "You think we ought to tell him that?" Sanders communications director Michael Briggs said.

O'Malley's challenge will be using his tech skills to increase his name recognition beyond the mid-Atlantic states. Over the last two years, the Maryland governor has relied on Obama tech alumni from Blue State Digital and Revolution to do just that — raising money on email with Democratic heavyweights like Cory Booker and Gabrielle Giffords and pumping out a series of social media messages and videos hyping his data-driven policy focus on everything from lowering crime rates to Chesapeake Bay cleanup. One biographical video — "Believe," which O'Malley regularly shows at party dinners — also came from Jimmy Siegel, a New York-based consultant who has worked for Hillary Clinton, Andrew Cuomo and Eliot Spitzer.

As he exits Annapolis, O'Malley will be leaning on Bill Hyers, who ran Obama's 2012 Pennsylvania operation and most recently managed New York Mayor Bill de Blasio's campaign; Colm O'Comartun, a longtime adviser and outgoing executive director of the Democratic Governors Association; and political spokeswoman Lis Smith, who handled rapid response for Obama's 2012 campaign.

If there's a dark horse in the Democratic field, it's Webb. The former Virginia senator raised eyebrows last month when he released a 14-minute video of himself speaking directly into a camera, with a plain blue backdrop, as part of the launch of his presidential exploratory committee. "In politics, nobody owns me, and I don't owe anybody anything except for the promise that I will work for the well-being of all Americans, and especially those who otherwise would have no voice in the corridors of power," Webb says in the video.

Democrats may be snickering at the low budget quality of the spot, but they also acknowledged that for relatively little money Webb has people talking about his presidential aspirations and the maverick voice he will bring to the primary.

"It's not about the shiniest penny," said David 'Mudcat' Saunders, a Virginia-based Democratic strategist who worked on Webb's 2006 Senate campaign. That race, interestingly enough, got perhaps its biggest boost thanks to another video: when Republican then-Sen. George Allen described a dark-skinned Webb campaign aide with the derogatory slang term 'macaca.'

Joe Stanley, another Virginia-based Democratic digital operative back working for Webb's Born Fighting PAC, was the first to recognize the significance of the 'macaca' video and uploaded it onto YouTube. Also on board for Webb is longtime aide Jessica Vanden Berg, a Democratic operative with deep roots in Iowa and more than a decade of experience in data-driven campaigning.

"This is really volunteer driven at this point," Vanden Berg said in an email. "We are however using tools to gauge support and communication [of] Jim's message."

Huffington Post: "Elizabeth Warren Is Good and Bad News for the Democrats"

Earl Ofari Hutchinson

Posted: 12/19/2014 2:59 pm EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For the record, Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren has repeatedly said she's not running for president. She has not encouraged any of the burgeoning draft movements for her to run. But she's coy enough to let the legions that implore her to run to keep imploring her to do just that. But it really doesn't make a difference whether she tosses her hat in the presidential rink in 2016 or not. She will loom large in the 2016 presidential hunt anyway. That's good and bad news for Democrats, more specifically for presumptive Democratic presidential contender, Hillary Clinton.

It's true that Warren can energize frustrated liberals and progressives whose numbers are still big and it's much-needed for Democrats to rebound from its November mid-term shellacking. Warren's relentless pound of Wall Street for greed and manipulation, as well as its cozy ties with Clinton, are flashpoints of rage and disgust for many Democratic voters. Polls consistently show that a majority of Americans agree that the financial system is rigged for the rich, and that Wall Street and major corporations play and massage the system with impunity. Warren has firmly staked out her position as the one politician who is willing to confront Wall Street.

Without Warren in the race, there's the real possibility that many Democrats could do exactly what many in the GOP's ultra-conservative base did in 2008, and to an extent in 2012, and that's stay home on Election Day in silent protest against GOP presidential candidates John McCain and Mitt Romney. As it was with them, this would be a disaster for Democrats. Warren, though, is no Obama. She can't match him in charisma, political skill and a mountainous financial campaign kitty that he brought to the political table. Yet, she would still send thousands of doubting Democrats in a crusade to the polls in a Democratic primary joust with Clinton. But what then when she doesn't win the nomination?

Clinton is mindful of the loathing that legions of Democrats have for her Wall Street connection. In the general election, big bankers, financial executives and top corporate donors are expected to be generous bankrollers of her campaign. This was the reason that Clinton at a Democratic gubernatorial campaign rally in Massachusetts in November was effusive in her praise of Warren and in the process took a big shot at Wall Street and the corporations minimizing their role in job creation. Later she walked it back claiming she had "short-handed" her comments. In the run up to the 2016 presidential campaign, she will be continually challenged to tell which Clinton Democrats are to believe; the Wall Street or the populist Clinton. It will take deft political footwork on her part to try to be both and neither at the same time. This will reinforce the notion among Clinton detractors that she will say whatever it takes to try and please two polar opposite political constituencies.

All the while, non-candidate Warren will be repeatedly hailed as the one Democrat not afraid to speak her mind and take action to reign in Wall Street and not continue the corporate and Wall Street giveaways that, at times, have been co-signed under GOP duress by President Obama. The only real winner in an irreconcilable split among the Democrats is the GOP. GOP strategists will not mention Warren in their attacks on Clinton. Instead they will use her as their foil to paint Clinton as anti-business, and another tax-and-spend Democrat. And worse, a Democratic president who would be politically beholden, even hostage to Warren backers, and would impose more crippling restraints on corporations and the financial industry.

If Warren did choose to enter Democratic primary contests, her backers would cheer wildly. And this would force Clinton to spell out her position on the issues and tell how a Clinton administration would differ from Obama's and husband Bill's. She would also have to spend time making assurances that she is not the unreconstructed hawk on foreign policy issues that progressive Democratic critics lambaste her as.

This would pose fresh problems for Clinton. She'd have to talk even more boldly about tough financial regulations and reforms, and that would make her appear as even further to the left. That would feed Fox News and the Republican National Committee with a bonanza of round-the-clock hit points against Clinton. They would tar her as a Ralph Nader style Democrat who as president would war perennially with a GOP controlled Congress. The result, they'd loudly claim, would be even deeper gridlock that many Americans dread.

The saving grace for now is that Democrats, by a lop-sided margin, are solidly behind Clinton. That's the good news for Clinton. The bad news is those numbers mask the weak enthusiasm or outright opposition that many Democrats have to a Clinton presidential bid. Warren almost certainly will continue to remain their alternative.

The Washington Post: "In Paul-Rubio feud over Cuba, a preview of 2016"

By Philip Rucker December 19 at 10:25 PM

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two of the Republican Party's top White House hopefuls clashed sharply Friday over President Obama's new Cuba policy, evidence of a growing GOP rift over foreign affairs that could shape the party's 2016 presidential primaries.

Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), who backs Obama's move to normalize relations with communist Cuba, accused Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) of being an "isolationist" with his hard-line opposition to opening up trade and diplomatic engagement with the island nation. Paul suggested that Rubio "wants to retreat to our borders and perhaps build a moat."

Paul's comments came after Rubio - the son of Cuban exiles who has stepped forward as a leading voice of resistance to Obama's policy - told Fox News that Paul had "no idea what he's talking about" when it comes to Cuba.

The feud is the loudest public dispute so far between potential GOP2016 candidates and lays bare the divergent world views of traditional hawks - including Rubio and past Republican presidents and nominees - and the emerging, younger libertarian wing represented by Paul.

For decades, Rubio's position has been the GOP's natural default. But Paul is testing that convention.

"Are we still cold warriors or are we entering a brave new world in diplomacy?" Republican strategist John Feehery said. "Rubio's perspective is we have Cuba, we have North Korea, we need a bold, internationalist, America-led world that fights the bad guys. Rand Paul is taking his father's position to a new level, which is constructive engagement, but America isn't really the policeman of the world."

Hawkish Republicans have long called Paul's foreign policy "isolationist," a label he rejects. In this week's Cuba debate, Paul applied the label to Rubio.

Paul's comments were unusually personal, beginning with a series of tweets aimed at Rubio followed by a two-paragraph message on his Facebook page. "Senator Rubio is acting like an isolationist" and "does not speak for the majority of Cuban-Americans," he wrote.

Paul followed up with an op-ed on Time's Web site Friday afternoon in which he wrote that he grew up learning to despise communism but over time concluded that "a policy of isolationism against Cuba is misplaced and hasn't worked." He noted that public opinion has shifted in favor of rapprochement - especially among young people, including young Cuban Americans - and that U.S. businesses would benefit by being able to sell their goods in Cuba.

"Communism can't survive the captivating allure of capitalism," Paul wrote. "Let's overwhelm the Castro regime with iPhones, iPads, American cars, and American ingenuity."

Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who traveled to Cuba this week with the U.S. entourage to secure contractor Alan Gross's release, shared Paul's sentiments. Flake said that he supported Obama's decision to normalize relations and that after a five-decade embargo, it was time "to try something different."

Rubio responded to Paul's comments Friday evening, telling conservative radio host Mark Levin, "I think it's unfortunate that Rand has decided to adopt Barack Obama's foreign policy on this matter."

For both Paul and Rubio, there are short-term political benefits to the tussle. With potential donors and other influential Republicans deciding between roughly a dozen presidential hopefuls, the pair are generating media attention and staking out ground on a high-profile policy issue.

The spat was also the latest example of Paul's combative tendencies. He has been the most aggressive GOP presidential contender in taking on Hillary Rodham Clinton, a former secretary of state and likely Democratic candidate, and showed Friday that he will not hesitate to throw punches at fellow Republicans as well.

Ana Navarro, a Miami-based Republican strategist close to Rubio and former Florida governor Jeb Bush, said it was an example of the "silly season."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There are some issues, like eye surgery and Kentucky bourbon, Paul knows something about," she said of the ophthalmologist turned lawmaker. "But to try to outdo Rubio on Cuba policy - and to do it by trolling him on Twitter in 140-character spurts - is frankly not productive, mature or senatorial."

Paul is trying to chart a new course for Republicans on foreign policy and areas such as race relations, working with Democrats on legislation to address drug sentencing guidelines.

"Paul is going to stretch the limits and try to grow the party in directions Republicans aren't used to," said Ari Fleischer, a former White House press secretary to George W. Bush. "I think the only upside he'll have is with young people. Outside of that, I think it's going to be tough going for him. . . . The history of the party is much more interventionist, muscular, strong, Ronald Reagan foreign policy."

Paul's aides said the senator considers Cuba policy an economic and diplomatic issue and not a partisan one.

But GOP primary voters may see it differently. "There's a certain willingness among conservatives to reconsider our Cuba policy, but the fact that it's been negotiated by Obama - whom we have no confidence or trust in - makes it suspect," said Richard Viguerie, a longtime conservative leader. "If this had been done by a trustworthy, conservative Republican, it would have been different."

Rubio, as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has worked to distinguish himself as a leading voice on international affairs. Almost immediately after Wednesday's Cuba announcement, Rubio spoke out aggressively and in personal terms. Raised in Miami by parents who fled Cuba in the 1950s, Rubio grew up surrounded by other Cuban American families and now represents them in Washington.

"It is just another concession to a tyranny by the Obama administration rather than a defense of every universal and inalienable right that our country was founded on and stands for," Rubio told reporters on Capitol Hill.

Most 2016 GOP hopefuls - including Bush, Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.) and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker - issued statements similar to Rubio's. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie has not spoken specifically on Cuba but generally shares Rubio's more hawkish worldview.

William Kristol, a prominent neoconservative and editor of the Weekly Standard, noted that most of the potential candidates, as well as the party's congressional leaders, are "all in the same neighborhood" on foreign policy.

"Rand Paul is a lonely gadfly," he said. "Rand Paul speaks for a genuine sentiment that's always been in the Republican Party, but maybe it's 10 percent? 15 percent? 20 percent? I don't think he's going to be a serious competitor for guiding Republican foreign policy."

CNN Politics: "2016 Republicans slam Cuba announcement"

By Stephen Collinson, CNN

updated 10:29 AM EST, Fri December 19, 2014

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- President Barack Obama's historic move to loosen the U.S. embargo on Cuba set off an immediate clash with Republicans keen to use the dramatic foreign policy shift to further their own White House aspirations.

The announcement immediately threw two Florida politicians -- Sen. Marco Rubio and former Governor Jeb Bush -- into the spotlight and served as another reminder of the state's enduring importance in presidential politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants, quickly took a hardline position, vowing to block any nominee the administration might put forward to be an ambassador to Cuba. He called Obama's announcement "truly outrageous and counterproductive" because there has been no "democratic opening" in Cuba.

"It is a lifeline for the Castro regime that will allow them to become more profitable ... and allow them to become a more permanent fixture," he said on CNN. "The embargo is leverage, these sanctions are leverage."

Rubio continued: "We have just lost a significant part of our leverage ... not a single democratic concession."

In a subsequent press conference, Rubio expanded his critique into a direct attack on Obama's foreign policy, previewing the assault Republican hawks could adopt in the presidential race.

"This president has proven today that his foreign policy is more than just naive," Rubio said. "It is willfully ignorant of the way the world truly works."

Rubio called Obama "the single worst negotiator we have had in the White House in my lifetime."

Bush, who shocked the political world on Tuesday by announcing he would explore a White House bid, welcomed the release of US contractor Alan Gross but said it was too early to transform Cuba policy.

"He shouldn't have been in prison to start with. He didn't do anything to deserve it. But the fact that he's coming home is spectacular news for himself and his family --- on the first day of Hanukkah," Bush said when asked about the Cuba news at a holiday event with Florida Governor Rick Scott.

In his first major foreign policy comments of the nascent 2016 campaign, Bush then warned in a statement that only Fidel and Raul Castro, who between them have ruled Cuba for over half a century, would benefit from Obama's "ill-advised move."

"Cuba is a dictatorship with a disastrous human rights record, and now President Obama has rewarded those dictators. We should instead be fostering efforts that will truly lead to the fair, legitimate democracy that will ultimately prevail in Cuba," Bush said in a statement posted on his Facebook page.

Bush's consistent hard line towards Havana could be appealing to thousands of Cuban Americans in Florida. But there's also the question of whether the issue will be as potent in 2016 as it has been in previous election cycles, as the younger generation of Cuban-Americans, many of them born in the U.S., are not as steeped in the Cold War-era struggle as their parents.

Bush has been a strong supporter of the trade embargo and believes it should only be lifted once political prisoners are freed, Cuba fully embraces democracy and a market economy is established.

"Instead of lifting the embargo, we should consider strengthening it again to put pressure on the Cuba regime," Bush said at a meeting of the US-Cuba Democracy PAC earlier this month.

Meanwhile, Texas GOP Sen. Ted Cruz, whose father fled Cuba, expressed "rejoice" that Gross is back in the U.S. But he slammed Obama for easing restrictions on Cuba.

"Make no mistake, although we are glad Alan is now free, the agreement the Obama Administration has entered into with the Castro regime has done nothing to resolve the underlying problem," he said in a statement. "Indeed, it has made it worse."

Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is also considering a presidential run, tweeted "this is an incredibly bad idea."

The GOP positions set up a clear contrast with a possible 2016 Democratic election rival Hillary Clinton, who expressed support for Obama's moves in a statement released Wednesday night.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I support President Obama's decision to change course on Cuba policy, while keeping the focus on our principal objective -- supporting the aspirations of the Cuban people for freedom," she said. "It is great news that Alan is finally home with his family, where he belongs."

The former secretary of state ran for the White House in 2008 opposing calls to lift the embargo, but she has since shifted her stance.

In an interview with Fusion television network earlier this year, Clinton argued that the embargo had "propped up" the Castro regime.

"I would like to see us move toward normalizing relations eventually and therefore more Americans (allowed to move) back and forth," she said. "That's something President Obama did and I supported in the first term."

Clinton wrote in her book "Hard Choices" that towards the end of her time in the Obama administration, she "recommended to President Obama that he take another look at our embargo."

"It wasn't achieving its goals and it was holding back our broader agenda across Latin America," she wrote

Meanwhile, Obama's announcement surprised many on Capitol Hill. Outgoing Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Robert Menendez, who has often crossed swords with Obama on Iran and Cuba policy, issued a statement that hinted at the tough fight to come over the embargo in Congress.

While hailing a "moment of profound relief" for Gross, Menendez blasted Obama, who he said had "vindicated the brutal behavior of the Cuban government."

"Trading Mr Gross for three convicted criminals sets and extremely dangerous precedent," said Menendez.

"It invites dictatorial and rogue regimes to use Americans serving overseas as bargaining chips," he said and argued that the"asymmetrical trade" will invite further belligerence from the government towards the Cuban opposition.

House Speaker John Boehner also hammered Obama's foreign policy, rebuking the President for "another in a long line of mindless concessions to a dictatorship that brutalizes its people and schemes with our enemies."

Tennessee GOP Sen. Bob Corker, who will take control of the foreign relations panel next year, said lawmakers "will be closely examining the implications of these major policy changes in the next Congress."

Politico: “Leaked: Democrats' attack plan for Bush”

By JAMES HOHMANN 12/19/14 3:42 PM EST Updated 12/20/14 4:28 AM EST

The Democratic National Committee wants surrogates to attack Jeb Bush as the Mitt Romney of 2016, an out-of-touch representative of the 1 percent who is more conservative than he lets on.

DNC strategists hosted a private conference call Friday to prepare Democrats going on the Sunday news shows to address the former Florida governor’s announcement this week that he will actively explore a run for president. A participant on the call shared the talking points with POLITICO, and a DNC official confirmed their veracity.

Story Continued Below

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The talking points offer a window into the Democratic plan of attack against the GOP establishment figure. It is also a strong indication that Democrats view Bush as a formidable general-election candidate, if he can make it through a GOP primary.

"Jeb Bush has spent his career doing what would benefit himself and people like him – certainly not looking out for working Americans," the talking points say. "Bush spent recent years cashing in on Wall Street as Americans were hit by the financial crisis. Since leaving public office, Bush has been involved in several problematic business deals, creating a multi-million dollar fund in a tax haven, and leveraging his family name to reap profits for himself."

Democrats also signaled they will try to lash Jeb Bush to unpopular aspects of George W. Bush's White House tenure.

"But we also know what to expect from a Bush presidency because we've seen it before: policies that wreck the economy, that give massive breaks to the wealthy and corporations, and that are out of step with American people including women, LGBT Americans, Latinos and people of color," the talking points say.

On Friday evening, Bush responded with a message on his Facebook page.

"Everywhere I go, people tell me how tired they are of the dysfunctional, squabbling silliness of politics today. These silly talking points, misleading and misinformed as they are, show you just how void of ideas the Democrats have become after six years of poor results in every area of our nation's business, from our struggling economy to our weakening position on the world stage," he wrote.

"If I do decide to run for President," Bush continued, "I can promise you this: no more Kindergarten attack politics. Instead, I would offer a substantive campaign that will present the fresh conservative ideas and meaningful reforms that will help all Americans to rise up, seize opportunity and pursue a better life for themselves and their loved ones."

Bush then reprinted the talking points in full on his page.

The 600-word DNC document pushes back on the narrative that Jeb Bush is relatively moderate compared to the rest of the field. The impetus for the push is that some leaders on the right have been criticizing Bush as insufficiently conservative on issues like Common Core and immigration. The concern for Democrats is that Bush will be more appealing to independent voters if the perception of him being willing to challenge GOP orthodoxy solidifies.

There are targeted appeals at various constituencies. Democrats note controversial Bush quotes about opposing the Equal Rights Amendment, the Paycheck Fairness Act and equal pay. There are also attacks on Bush over his opposition to gay rights and for saying that gay couples should not be able to adopt. And he has defended his support for voter ID laws, which many African-Americans see as discriminatory.

But the brunt of the attacks focus on Bush helping the wealthy at the expense of the needy, which worked to President Barack Obama's advantage in the 2012 campaign against Romney. Bush has reportedly told allies that he will push back earlier and more aggressively than Romney did when his record at Bain Capital was criticized.

"Jeb Bush is looking out for himself and people like him over the priorities of everyday Americans," the suggested DNC talking points say. "On that point he is no different than the rest of the Republican field."

There are also past quotes from Bush about issues affecting women and African-Americans. Democrats are also encouraged to point out that Bush endorsed the conservative budget blueprint of Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.).

CNN Politics: "Inside the push to draft Ben Carson for president"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Chris Moody, CNN

Updated 10:16 AM EST, Sat December 20, 2014

Washington (CNN) -- John Philip Sousa IV has a mission: Convince a retired neurosurgeon with no political experience to run for President -- and then help him win.

Sousa, 67, launched a super PAC last year that has raised millions in an effort to urge Dr. Ben Carson to explore a White House bid. Since the launch, Sousa and his team have proven to be a fundraising powerhouse, raising a whopping $12.2 million from more than 100,000 donors. That even edged out the effort by Hillary Clinton's supporters, who have raised $12.1 million for the "Ready for Hillary" super PAC.

Sousa's group, dubbed the "National Draft Ben Carson for President Campaign Committee," is laying the groundwork for a presidential campaign in early voting states with plans to open a second office in Iowa later this month.

If Sousa's last name sounds familiar, that's because it should. He's the great grandson of John Philip Sousa, the composer known for his patriotic music. Sousa's effort is adding to the buzz surrounding Carson, who catapulted onto the national political scene at last year's National Prayer Breakfast by delivering a stinging rebuke to Obamacare -- with President Barack Obama sitting just a few feet away. He has captivated some Republicans with stories of his difficult childhood and placed second behind Mitt Romney in a CNN/ORC poll last month that asked the GOP about their preferred presidential nominee.

Carson himself has said he has been considering a run after seeing the outpouring of support.

"It definitely seems to be having an impression," said Adam Waldeck, a spokesman for the American Legacy PAC, which Carson chairs.

Federal election rules bar Sousa from coordinating with Carson, who hasn't yet said whether he'll run in 2016. But Sousa talks about a potential run in the same unvarnished style that Carson embraces.

Sousa recently visited CNN's Washington bureau. Read the interview below, which has been edited and condensed for clarity:

Why did you decide to start a super PAC?

In August 2013, a few of us got together and wondered what we wanted to do in terms of politics, PACs and so forth. We thought, gee, well, let's start a PAC and support senators, and candidates in '14 and '16. That sounded boring since everyone else in the world was doing it. One of us said, "Did you see Ben Carson at the National Prayer Breakfast?" And we all nodded, yes. And someone almost jokingly said, "Why don't we draft him to run for president?"

What drew you to him?

Because of his background, Dr. Carson can relate. He's a multi-millionaire now, but when he was a kid, he was far from it. He was a nasty thug in school. Thanks to a mother who probably deserves something close to sainthood, he started reading books instead of watching television. He read himself right into Yale and the head of neurosurgery at Johns Hopkins.

His mother worked three jobs. She married when she was 13, and had two boys. Of course, the father took off. So she was on her own. She worked very, very hard in Detroit in the ghettos to provide for her boys. She was cleaning the house of a rather wealthy individual one day and noticed that the television was covered with books. She said to the gentleman, "How do you watch TV with all these books on your TV?" ...She went home and she said, "Boys, new rule in the house. No more than one hour of television in the house, and we're going to read." ...It was thanks to that that really pulled Dr. Carson out of the gutter and to the very top.

That's a story that lots of people can relate to. More importantly, Dr. Carson knows how to get people out of the rut, out of the ghetto. Because he's lived it. He's done it. Not that every kid in the ghetto will become head of neurosurgery at Johns Hopkins, but Carson has a plan to do that and it's not simply throwing more money into these neighborhoods.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Have you met him?

I've met him once. ...We have decided to take the road of being very, very cautious. We don't want the [Federal Election Commission] knocking on our door.

What happened during your encounter with him?

It was about a year ago. ...We talked briefly. I asked him, "Do you like what we're doing?" He said, "I'm not stopping you."

What have you done to vet him?

Did we thoroughly vet the guy? No. But we went back through his record as much is public and checked into his family life as much as we could, and we didn't see anything we didn't like. But to tell you we thoroughly vetted the guy, that wouldn't be accurate.

What was the key part of him that made you decide to devote so much effort into him?

A few things: His belief in the United States Constitution, his common sense approach to resolving things, the fact that this man developed the process of separating conjoined twins at the head so both halves lived. ...Once he developed the process, he realized that he didn't know it all. That he needed experts to help him with some of this stuff. So he brought in experts from around the world to help him with that surgery. So that tells us that he's not an egomaniac, that he's willing to reach out to professionals to help him in areas where he needs help. I think that's critically important if you're going to run a business, do a complicated surgery or run the United States of America.

We like the fact that he is a Christian man—he has a strong belief in God. And quite frankly, we liked the fact that he stood up at the National Prayer Breakfast, two feet from the president, and said, sir, you're wrong.

How do you plan to convince him to get into the race?

We think we've gone just about as far as we can go in convincing Dr. Carson to run. We've raised close to $12 million. We've spent close to that.

I send Dr. Carson a letter once a week and with that letter is anywhere between four and six thousand petitions encouraging him to run.

He never responds?

We know he gets them. We know he reads them.

How have you spent the money you've raised?

Direct mail is very expensive, so a lot of money went to direct mail. Fundraising is expensive, period. We ran ads in black communities in North Carolina and Louisiana in the Senate races. Spent about half a million on that total.

You've spent almost as much as you've raised. What do you say to critics who say this is just a lucrative project for contractors and consultants?

I mean, the Post Office is doing really well, the printer is doing really well...these things all cost money. Our fundraising firm, Everly, cut their prices pretty substantially for this cause. They've been good friends of mine for a lot of years. I've used them on a lot of campaigns. They earn every single dollar that they've charged us and I begrudge them not a penny.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anyone who wants to say this is simply an effort to raise money to support a fundraising firm is just dead wrong. We are very committed, and I think our success over the last 16-18 months has been proven. Carson never talked about running before we started this.

I don't want to say we get credit for Carson running, but we have been instrumental in showing how many people like him and want him to run. That's been our role, and I think we've done it damn well.

Do you ever have second thoughts about him when he says Obamacare is the worst US policy since slavery or uses compares policies to Nazis?

Listen, if I were a little bug on his shoulder I might pull on his ear and say, "Stop that!" But I'm not. Show me a presidential candidate who hasn't tripped on their tongue.

But do you think that could hurt his chances to be president?

I want Dr. Carson to be Dr. Carson. That's the guy who I really like and who I want to run this country, and if he trips on his tongue occasionally, OK, people are going to have to come along and clean it up. But geez, that's what candidates do, right? Rick Perry, two years ago, and [New Jersey Gov. Chris] Christie almost every time he opens his mouth. We can pick on Dr. Carson, but they all do it. They all say things they probably shouldn't have. Or they don't explain what they meant is articulately as well as they should have.

On policy, he acknowledges that he doesn't have all of his positions set yet.

He doesn't.

If you want to support somebody, you don't know where he necessarily stands on many of the issues. Doesn't that give you pause?

No, and I'll tell you why. He's a very firm believer in the Constitution of the United States. His policy will be driven by the Constitution. His policy will be driven by being a Christian. His policy will be driven by being a good human being. His policy will be driven by being good to the American people, and not because a bunch of lobbyists have given him bucket loads of money. The great thing about Dr. Carson running is that he is beholden to no one.

Until he is beholden to somebody.

Until he is. But today he's not.

What if he doesn't run? What will come of the super PAC?

We haven't really thought. But we have such an infrastructure in place that we will probably sit down around the same table and say, OK, is there anyone we believe in that we can use this infrastructure to help win in 2016?

Are there any candidates you would you rule out?

I don't think we would support [Texas Sen. Ted] Cruz because I don't think he can win.

I don't think we would support Jeb Bush or Mitt Romney, because they're just too close to the center and it's more of the same.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Ben Carson can win and Ted Cruz can't, what are the differences?

Big differences. I like what Ted Cruz says about the issues, but I think he's a bull in a china shop. He's too polarizing. The media will absolutely fry him every time he opens his mouth—not that they won't go after Carson—but Carson is not loud. He's not forceful. Ted Cruz will go on for hours about a given subject jumping up and down—again, I like his positions—I just don't think his methods can get him elected.

The other difference is that we believe Carson will get at least 17 percent of the black vote.

What do you base that on?

He's black.

I mean, what data have you seen that shows that?

Herman Cain's campaign polled it and showed that 17 percent at a minimum would support him.

If Carson gets 17 percent of the black vote, he wins. He can't take 17 percent of the black vote away from the Democrat and have the Democrat win on a national basis. It just won't happen.

Are you planning to try to replicate those polls for the new cycle?

We're going to be out shortly doing our research.

What are the next phase for your super PAC?

We will go from "Run Ben Run" to "Ben Carson for President." We will begin increasing our paid staff in the Carolinas and Florida. We will open another office in Iowa.

We're spending a lot of time working on Iowa. We have committee chairman in all 99 counties. We're paying a lot of attention to Iowa an dhow we knock everybody else out of the box.

Who will his biggest competitor be?

I don't know.

But if I die before the debates, I'm going to be really angry. Because I can hardly wait to see Dr. Carson take on any of them in the debates. His style is so different and so smooth. Nothing seems to get under his skin. I think he will absolutely tear them apart.

Washington Examiner: "Future uncertain, Romney sits atop GOP polls"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By: Byron Yo

December 18, 2014 | 10:44 PM

It can be hard to take the idea of a Mitt Romney 2016 presidential run seriously. After all, this is the man who said of losing general election candidates, "They become a loser for life." At least in presidential terms, he had that mostly right.

But what to make of polls continuing to show Romney at the head of the Republican presidential pack a little more than a year before the Iowa caucuses? A Fox News survey released this week found Romney the GOPleader, with 19 percent, ahead of Jeb Bush, who was pretty far back at 10 percent. Everybody else was bunched together behind Bush.

A McClatchy-Marist poll a few days earlier showed a similar result, with Romney leading at 19 percent and Bush at 14 percent. A Quinnipiac poll before that found Romney at 19 percent and Bush at 11 percent.

Many polls don't include Romney in their surveys. But the many that do suggest that, at least for now, Romney is a front-runner, if not the front-runner in the 2016 Republican race.

People in Romney's circle realize that some of his standing in the polls reflects nothing more than name recognition; everybody knows the guy who ran for president in 2012. But they believe there's more to it than that. In discussions this week, they pointed to what they think is a widespread belief among voters, certainly among Republicans, that Romney was right about some key issues in the 2012 campaign.

"I don't really think you can objectively chalk it up to name ID," says one resident of Romneyworld. "People are saying, 'He was right.' I think that has happened in so many different ways that people are looking at it with a fresh perspective." Another Romneyworld insider points to Russia, terrorism, and the economy as areas where Romney was prescient in 2012.

Some of the people who talk with Romney say they specifically avoid the subject of his running in 2016. They still believe he would be a good president, but they don't want to push. "I don't press him on it," says yet another in Romney's circle. "It's a personal decision."

"I don't bring it up," says another. "When we talk, we talk about what's going on in the world."

Some of the donors who supported Romney in 2012 aren't so shy; they're happy to tell Romney they believe he should run again. "He's being encouraged by people every day," says one confidant.

The big mystery, of course, is what Romney himself is thinking. As long as Romney keeps quiet, the outside world will be guessing. But it's probably smart to divide the question into two parts.

The first is what Romney thinks about the actual decision to run or not to run. That, nobody knows. The second is what Romney thinks about who would be the best president. That's not so mysterious. Romney ran in 2012 because he believed he was the best man for the job. There's no indication he has changed his mind.

Those close to Romney don't believe the recent moves by Jeb Bush, who now says he is "actively exploring" a presidential run, will have any effect on Romney. A bigger question will be whether a leader emerges in the GOP field to bring Republican voters together.

"One of the luxuries he has is he doesn't have to necessarily make up his mind and make a decision right now," says one. "He can take stock of the field and how it develops."

So here is a scenario. The Republican race that develops in 2015 is splintered and unhappy, with no candidate gaining the stature and respect needed to make a good nominee. The campaign becomes a protracted fight that diminishes each of its participants. Party leaders look for a savior. Romney is there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It probably won't happen. And Romney knows — we know he knows because he has said as much — that a political figure who has a halo around his head when he is out of the fray will be just another punching bag if he gets in.

Still, there are the polls. And, for some of those around Romney, the hope. Right now, all they know is that there is a chance — maybe a tiny one, but a chance — of another run.

"I can't really put any kind of prediction on it," says one of the Romneyworld insiders of the possibility that Romney will run again. "I wouldn't say there is zero chance of it. I would definitely not say it is zero."

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce's "Global Perspectives" series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 11/19/2014 1:43:32 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday November 19, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday November 19, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

Washington Post: "The candidate who matters most to GOP presidential hopefuls: Hillary Clinton"

"Clinton leaves it to surrogates to mount any defense, as the pro-Clinton message outfit Correct the Record has done in the case of Clinton's age and other issues. 'Yes, there have been attacks on her after the midterms, but they have been hitting her hard for over a year,' said Correct the Record communications director Adrienne Elrod. 'They are trying as hard as possible to make sure she's not the nominee, and the reason they are doing that is that they don't want to run against her.'"

The Hill: "Clinton enjoys unofficial candidacy"

"Clinton knows that, if she runs for the White House, she'll be asked about every move the president makes. She and her team will have to be ready to embrace Obama where it suits them, and to cast him aside when that would better serve her candidacy."

Huffington Post opinion: Melanne Verveer: "Driving Growth through Women's Economic Participation"

"As Secretary of State, Hillary Rodham Clinton put women's economic participation on the foreign policy agenda."

Politico: "Ready for Hillary ready to end"

"Exactly when it will come to an end is unclear – it will likely exist for a period of time if Clinton declares, going through a formal process of closing accounts and wrapping up loose ends."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Fundraisers Rev Up for Possible Hillary Clinton Run"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"A group of New Jersey-based Democratic fundraisers and political operatives has scheduled a dinner in Newark on Monday to gather commitments for a donation to Mrs. Clinton's campaign as soon as she announces she's running, according to a person familiar with the event."

The Atlantic: "Hillary's Silence on Iran and Immigration Reform"

[Subtitle:] "The cautious Clinton of 2008 is back—and that shows why it's so essential she face a Democratic challenger in 2016."

Politico: "Democrats to Obama: You broke the party, now fix it"

"As much Hillary Clinton anticipation as there is, two weeks later, Democrats are still reeling and anxious."

Politico: "Beyond Senate defeat, ill omens for Keystone"

"In addition, Democrats would gain some political advantage from Obama settling the issue [Keystone] sooner rather than later, if only to keep it from burdening a 2016 White House run by Hillary Clinton."

Los Angeles Times column: Doyle McManus: "A Bernie Sanders candidacy could help Hillary Clinton"

"When pressed, however, he [Sen. Sanders] acknowledges that he thinks even a losing campaign would be a good thing because of its potential to bring more attention to his ideas, widen the national debate and put pressure on Hillary Rodham Clinton or any other eventual Democratic nominee."

Associated Press: "2016 contest overshadows GOP governors meeting"

"While Hillary Rodham Clinton remains the overwhelming Democratic front-runner should she seek the presidency, the prospective Republican field is crowded and without a clear leader."

Articles:

Washington Post: "The candidate who matters most to GOP presidential hopefuls: Hillary Clinton"

By Anne Gearan and Philip Rucker

November 19, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker says she's old. Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul says she's a loser. Operatives for New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie whisper that he's not afraid of her.

For Republicans eyeing a run for president in a crowded 2016 field, one measure matters above all others: How they stack up against Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"It would almost be political malpractice not to" go after Clinton, said former Mississippi governor Ronnie Musgrove (D), who is close to Clinton and her husband.

As the prohibitive front-runner for the Democratic nomination, Clinton is the Goliath to all the would-be Davids. Attacking her is an easy way to impress donors, get noticed by potential supporters and the news media, and stand out among a growing throng of Republicans who have middling fame compared with hers.

The Republican National Committee and America Rising, a GOP super PAC, have each launched opposition-research efforts aimed at identifying lines of attack on Clinton. The RNC has already deployed a team of 10 operatives to Arkansas — where former president Bill Clinton was governor — and elsewhere to dig up fresh dirt on Hillary Clinton.

"She's the 800-pound gorilla in the room," said Brian Jones, a communications adviser to John McCain's 2008 campaign and Mitt Romney's 2012 campaign.

But there are risks for Republicans. The attacks, already in full swing two years ahead of the election, could become repetitive or tiresome. Or sexist: Swipes at Clinton's age or health could backfire on a GOP field that is, at this point, all male.

Party leaders, however, say they relish a fight with the former secretary of state, who remains a polarizing national figure and has seen her approval ratings fall since leaving the State Department. RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said the party is treating Clinton as the presumptive Democratic nominee, no different from if she were an incumbent.

"There's no person in America I'd rather be running against than Hillary Clinton," Priebus said. "When it comes to raising money, unifying our party and recruiting a lot of volunteers, Hillary Clinton is my best asset."

For now, Clinton is remaining above the fray, and her aides did not respond to requests for comment on the GOP attacks. Advisers close to her say that if she runs, there will be plenty of time to engage Republicans on her terms. Clinton leaves it to surrogates to mount any defense, as the pro-Clinton message outfit Correct the Record has done in the case of Clinton's age and other issues.

"Yes, there have been attacks on her after the midterms, but they have been hitting her hard for over a year," said Correct the Record communications director Adrienne Elrod. "They are trying as hard as possible to make sure she's not the nominee, and the reason they are doing that is that they don't want to run against her."

But from the point of view of many Republicans, the attacks serve a simple purpose: to damage the presumptive Democratic nominee.

In 2008, Republicans benefitted from the bitter primary fight between Clinton and Barack Obama, which aired a lot of dirty laundry. Republicans now need to keep up the pressure on Clinton during the Democratic primary season if Clinton faces no serious opposition, Jones said.

"The party needs to keep applying pressure to her and keeping her and her team off balance, particularly if she's running against Larry, Curly and Moe" on the Democratic side, Jones said.

Clinton has said she is still considering whether to run and will probably decide after Jan. 1. She is quietly meeting with potential donors and possible campaign strategists, and is widely expected to make an official announcement by mid-February. She has given no sign that Republican attacks figure into that calculus.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The other side has no choice but to be constantly negative, because they know that Hillary has widespread grass-roots support and is the strongest, most qualified candidate if she decides to run,” said Seth Bringman, spokesman for the pro-Clinton Ready For Hillary super PAC. “The best way for her supporters to respond is by doubling down on the positive effort to build a grass-roots army of supporters to help her win.”

Some of the attacks are personal: Walker, 47, said this week that he could run for president in 20 years and be the same age as Clinton is now. Some are about Clinton’s policies and politics, as articulated over her long career and on the stump for fellow Democrats in the midterms.

Even before the full extent of the Democratic rout was known on election night, Paul tweeted a picture of Clinton side-hugging losing Kentucky Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes. He labeled it with the hashtag “#Hillaryslosers.”

Republicans are hoping that Clinton is tainted by her party’s midterm defeat. They are also attacking her on issues such as Asia policy, the Keystone XL pipeline and the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Paul began focusing on Clinton before she stepped down as secretary of state. At a Senate hearing in January 2013, Paul told Clinton he would have fired her over the deaths of four Americans in Benghazi. Paul later suggested that the episode should disqualify Clinton from higher office.

Paul, 51, and some other Republicans have also suggested Clinton may not be up to the physical rigors of a second run for president. She suffered a head injury in a fall two years ago that sidelined her for weeks but has said she has no lingering effects.

Republican strategist Karl Rove came under fire this year for seeming to suggest that she had suffered a “traumatic brain injury” in the fall; he later disavowed intending to say that.

In 2015, as Republican presidential hopefuls compete against each other, the RNC’s role will be to “reintroduce Clinton” in a negative light, said RNC communications director Sean Spicer. “It’s not a silver bullet, but it’s chink after chink after chink in her armor,” he said.

The RNC’s war room has been trained on Clinton for months and made much of Clinton’s stumbles during interviews to promote her June memoir, “Hard Choices.”

America Rising, the GOP research and communications shop founded by former presidential campaign operatives, has been leading the attack against Clinton for more than a year. Tim Miller, the group’s executive director, said Clinton’s “limbo state” — before the expected announcement of her candidacy — makes her especially susceptible to hits from Republicans.

“It’s an opportunity for our side to continue to define her and to continue to highlight her weaknesses before she has a campaign infrastructure that’s fully up and operational,” Miller said.

America Rising took another swing at Clinton on Tuesday over the Keystone oil pipeline, which was rejected by the Senate on Tuesday night.

The project has divided Democrats, and President Obama has signaled that he is leaning against approving the huge project to pump oil from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. Clinton has declined to offer a public opinion on Keystone, arguing that her connection to the State Department — which is leading the Obama administration’s review of the project — prevents her from taking sides.

“She wrote a book called ‘Hard Choices,’ but she wouldn’t take an opinion on the Keystone pipeline,” Miller said. “She may be the only person in America without a position on the Keystone pipeline at this point.”

A Clinton spokesman did not respond to a request for comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Clinton, however, there is little apparent upside to taking a stance now. If she comes out in favor of the pipeline, she will anger environmental and climate activists, including megadonor Tom Steyer and many other major Democratic contributors. If she opposes it, she will be at odds with many business leaders.

Republicans intend to make life similarly uncomfortable for Clinton by combing through her State Department tenure and dipping into the scandals and controversies of her husband's administration. Of course, they will also seek ways to tie Clinton to Obama, whose popularity is stuck underwater.

"Like anything in life, preparation is the key to success," Priebus said. "I'm a big believer that the most prepared team wins."

The Hill: "Clinton enjoys unofficial candidacy"

By Amie Parnes

November 19, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

Sometimes Hillary Clinton is happy to embrace President Obama's positions.

Sometimes Clinton is happy to distance herself from Obama.

And sometimes she just wants to stay out of it, such as with the battle over approving the Keystone XL oil pipeline.

Clinton, who is weighing whether to make a second White House bid, hasn't taken sides over the pipeline since the midterm elections spelled disaster for Democrats, nor did she weigh in in her memoir or during her book tour this summer.

A Clinton spokesman didn't respond to an email asking about the former secretary of State's position, and more than 10 Clinton allies declined to comment, underscoring the precarious politics involved with a project that is vehemently opposed by green groups crucial in a Democratic presidential primary, but that is supported by many white working-class voters important in a general election.

The Keystone caution differs from Clinton's moves to distance herself from Obama's handling of Syria and her willingness to tie herself to Obama on other issues, such as immigration.

It shows a willingness by the front-runner for the Democratic nomination to handle the issues of Obama's presidency on a case-by-case basis, in whatever way is most convenient for her own political future.

"This is why it's convenient not to be an official candidate," said Julian Zelizer, a professor of public affairs and history at Princeton University. "It's easier to pick and choose what to speak about, while letting the president handle his own controversial issues."

On immigration, another high-profile issue confronting the White House, allies say Clinton will tie herself to Obama's executive actions. They mostly see the expected immigration executive action as a win-win for Clinton, because Obama moving to give legal status to millions of immigrants could excite Hispanic and Asian-American voters who have become crucial parts of Democratic presidential coalitions.

"It's an early win for her," said one former Clinton aide who worked on her 2008 presidential campaign. "The Republicans are still trying to figure out their position on this, and this helps her secure a huge bloc of voters. It's probably the best thing Obama could have done for her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton knows that, if she runs for the White House, she'll be asked about every move the president makes. She and her team will have to be ready to embrace Obama where it suits them, and to cast him aside when that would better serve her candidacy.

And there will be some issues where it's best to stay quiet — especially now, during an "interim period," as one ally put it, when she's not a candidate for the White House.

They say that, for now, it makes the most sense to speak broadly about the challenges the country faces and not get weighed down by the trench warfare of day-to-day tactical battles.

One of the only Clintonites willing to talk about Keystone said it's a no-brainer for her to dodge the issue.

"There are a million reasons for why she wouldn't want to weigh in, but I can't think of one good reason for her to speak her mind on the issue, at least right now," the source said, adding that Clinton is "not at the State Department anymore, is not in elected office and is not a candidate."

Zelizer said Clinton likely hopes the issue will move on before she has to make a public comment about it.

"If she has the option of keeping quiet, which as a not-yet candidate she does, this is a smart move," he said. "She is hoping that the president can resolve this, or the issue fades before she needs to deal with it."

But it will be increasingly difficult to dodge these questions if her White House bid becomes official. And make no mistakes about it, Democratic rivals and Republicans alike will press her on the issue.

"What is Secretary Clinton afraid of when it comes to Keystone?" said Tim Miller, the executive director of the super-PAC America Rising, which has been targeting Clinton. "Environmentalist mega-donors who did nothing to stop the Democrats' widespread election losses?

"It's this type of overtly political posturing that turned voters off to her in 2008 and will cost her again next year," Miller added. "Voters want to know where you stand." But those in Hillaryland say she has lots of time to make her positions known.

"This is her time to kick back, make a decision and not worry about the nitty-gritty," said one former aide who worked on her 2008 campaign. "She can stay above the fray."

Huffington Post opinion: Melanne Verveer: "Driving Growth through Women's Economic Participation"

By Melanne Verveer

November 18, 2014, 4:13 p.m. EST

Women's economic participation is a game-changer with the potential to transform entire economies and societies. The recently released World Economic Forum Gender Gap Report shows that while progress has been made in closing the gender gap, there is still much work to be done. In 2006, 56% of the economic participation gender gap had been closed, and that number is now 60%. It is critical that we focus our efforts on closing the divide in women's participation in the formal economy in order to grow economies, create jobs and enhance inclusive prosperity for all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Secretary of State, Hillary Rodham Clinton put women's economic participation on the foreign policy agenda. Recently, at Georgetown University, she reiterated why: "If we pay extra attention to getting women into the formal economy, it will be good for everybody...We have to unlock the potential of every person, and grow the economies of every nation. It's the only way we're going to be able to grow together." As Secretary Clinton mentioned, if we were to close the gender gap on women's economic participation, global GDP would grow by over 12%.

Some countries are tackling these issues head on. Japan's Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has made women's economic participation, or womenomics, an integral part of his economic stimulus agenda. With an aging workforce and a low birth rate, Japan's labor force can no longer support the size of the country's economy, which has been stagnant for years. By closing the gender gap, Japan could boost its GDP by almost 13%. Prime Minister Abe has been working to reform the tax code, improve access to childcare and eldercare, reform immigration laws, and increase female participation in government in order to improve women's economic participation. Abe sees women's economic participation as critical to Japan's revitalization and long-term growth.

This issue, however, is not just the responsibility of governments. The private sector plays a crucial role in catalyzing change, and corporations have the opportunity to be on the cutting edge. Access to finance, access to technology, sourcing from women-owned businesses, and changes to corporate culture all have the potential to increase women's participation and transform business as we know it. It has been demonstrated that diversity and inclusion are not only the right things for businesses to do, they also make the most business sense. Companies that are more diverse financially outperform their less diverse counterparts by about 18%. It has also been shown that companies with more women on their boards of directors experience higher financial performance.

Accessing capital is a worldwide problem that female entrepreneurs face when trying to start or grow their small businesses. Women have a much more difficult time securing loans than men. This is as true for the CEO of a tech startup in the U.S. as for the seamstress in India who runs her own shop. Globally, women entrepreneurs, who earn billions in income each year, are a largely untapped market for financial institutions. By removing barriers and helping women secure loans, not only do women-owned businesses grow, but financial institutions can increase their profits as well.

Access to technology is also becoming increasingly essential for women's economic participation. For example, a simple cell phone can revolutionize the way women do business. For a rural woman farmer trying to sell produce in Kenya, it can mean finding out where the closest market is on a given day. Cellular phones can also help women manage their finances and protect their savings. Mobile banking can enable the majority of the world's poor who are unbanked to access financial services for the first time. Likewise, mobile education applications provide training on important skills and resources to which women may not otherwise have access, such as financial literacy, management and leadership strategies, and networks of supporters and peers.

Many companies have started to source their products from women-owned businesses, and women often prefer to buy products from other women. Adding more women to the supply chain is an essential step large corporations can take to to leverage the power of the female economy.

Corporate culture can greatly women's participation in the workforce. For example, policies on parental leave, telecommuting, and flexible work hours influence women's ability to enter and remain in the workplace. Mentorship and sponsorship programs, elevating women into senior management positions, and adding women to corporate boards also further women's ability to succeed and make a greater contribution to the economy and society.

This is an evidence-based case built on a growing body of research and data. Women are game-changers in the economic sphere; their full economic participation drives prosperity for all. Data and analysis have shown that women's economic participation is good for families, communities, societies, and countries, and it is good for business too. We can and must capitalize on the power of women's economic participation to transform the lives of individuals, businesses, and the entire global economy.

Politico: "Ready for Hillary ready to end"

By Maggie Haberman

November 18, 2014, 11:53 p.m. EST

When staffers and supporters of Ready for Hillary gather Friday at a conference in Manhattan, the all-day event will mark the beginning of the end for the grassroots super PAC that was an impressive branding exercise that, for better or worse, helped freeze the field of competition against Hillary Clinton for 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The lower-dollar super PAC is set to begin its wind-down once Hillary Clinton declares her candidacy for president – something her allies insist she still may not do but which most expect her to.

For the nearly two years it's been in existence, Ready for Hillary has been described as a shadow campaign for Clinton, an imprecise shorthand that both oversold and undersold the work the group was doing.

It was never intended to be a substitute for an actual campaign or signify a field operation that could be turned into the real thing with the flip of a switch, its organizers say – it was meant to harness energy, build a list and be the focal point where her supporters could look. There was never intense modeling beyond its direct-mail list, according to people familiar with its work. (Early discussions about doing more advanced modeling using voter data was abandoned, according to sources familiar with the work.)

"The goal of this organization has always been clear — Ready for Hillary has an explicit mission and a stated path to accomplish it," said Tracy Sefl, a senior adviser to the group. "Now, there are several million people who can take pride in — and rightly claim credit for — the progress made. Ready for Hillary isn't done, but we're still very grateful for the opportunity to reflect on where we are and what all of these supporters have helped build."

It also survived efforts to either curtail or outright stamp out its efforts in the first half of 2013, when some Clinton advisers grew alarmed by its presence. It ultimately became one of the most memorable political brands over the last two years.

Exactly when it will come to an end is unclear – it will likely exist for a period of time if Clinton declares, going through a formal process of closing accounts and wrapping up loose ends.

When it winds down, it will have a Facebook page with more than 3 million supporters and, people familiar with the group's work say, an enhanced voter list that improved on Clinton's own 2008 campaign data while attracting new names. The goal is to ultimately provide the new data to her campaign in the form of a swap, a move that the group's critics have argued will prove harder than it thinks. They aggressively used social media and hawked "Ready for Hillary" merchandise, which raised money and helped build on the list.

But the group's officials say they have figured out how it will work from their end. And when she declares, there are tentative plans to find a way to move the supporters from the Facebook page over to her social media accounts, possibly through an email.

Founded by former Hillary Clinton staffer Adam Parkhomenko, a 29-year-old who hatched the idea shortly after President Obama's re-election, the group initially struggled for traction. But it soon became ubiquitous – the "Ready for…" phrasing worked its way into the political vernacular in the form of headlines and borrowed use by other elected officials. A pro-Elizabeth Warren group copied its name, appearing as "Ready for Warren."

"I've always looked at Hillary as a brand," Parkhomenko, the group's executive director, told Slate last year, at a time when few reporters were giving it much attention. "That's been especially true in the last couple of years. It's a brand I believe in. It's a brand I want to protect. It's a brand I want to build."

It may have been inadvertent, but "branding" was very much what Ready for Hillary accomplished – elevating her name and celebrity to great heights. The New Hampshire Jefferson-Jackson Democratic Dinner in October, where Bill Clinton spoke, was draped with signs made by the super PAC, which had "Ready" references to the state's two top-level candidates, Gov. Maggie Hassan and Sen. Jeanne Shaheen.

In nearly two years, officials with the group said, it's attracted almost 35,000 volunteers, hired 29 staffers raised more than $10 million and spent almost as much as it's raised, primarily on fundraising and list-building. Ready for Hillary had trouble getting any press attention at first, but got key validation when it hired President Barack Obama's former field organizer's firm, 270 Strategies.

Some Obama advisers have publicly questioned the utility for Clinton, who is still formulating a message for a likely candidacy, in having an apparatus bearing her name so early in the cycle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some Obama advisers have publicly questioned the utility for Clinton, who is still formulating a message for a likely candidacy, in having an apparatus bearing her name so early in the cycle.

Eventually, Ready for Hillary and another pro-Clinton entity, the high-dollar Priorities USA, brokered peace, in part with the help of current White House aide John Podesta, who was out of government at the time. It also got early support from top Bill and Hillary Clinton adviser Minyon Moore, a Dewey Square Group strategist who saw value in the organizing work the group was doing, even as other Clinton advisers said it would add to the aura of inevitability she was hoping to shed.

Moore and another Dewey Square official, Jill Alper, have worked with the group since in a volunteer capacity, people familiar with the work say.

When Craig Smith, a Clinton White House political director and old Arkansas friend of the former first couple, came on board as a senior adviser, it also added gravitas. And an early goal was to have a media-friendly approach.

In the meantime, the group began establishing some form of a presence in every state, either through fundraisers or rallies. It became the official vehicle by which surrogates offered support for Clinton — with Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill, an Obama supporter, coming on as one of the early big names.

“We said from the beginning that empowering and engaging grass-roots supporters early on are the most critical components of building a winning, 21st century campaign — and frankly everything we’ve witnessed over the past year and a half of working with Ready for Hillary has only reinforced this perspective,” said 270 Strategies’ Lynda Tran. “We continue to believe that a successful, presidential-level effort needs to integrate a data-driven, people-focused approach with smart digital and communications strategies.”

Yet, field organizing is difficult to do without a candidate, even when there is an idea of one. Outside groups rarely conduct field operations, since unlike TV ad spending by independent entities, it’s very hard to track and therefore not duplicate.

It was “inspired by a campaign field structure, but the scale and focus are very different,” said one official working with the group. “The structure is essentially two streams that work in concert with each other — a general field stream and a constituency organizing stream.”

That included a lot of chaser events during Clinton’s book tour, replete with a “Ready for Hillary” bus at which people who showed up to see her could leave their names. Clinton herself was said to appreciate the concept of the bus, which has visited college campuses.

Among its most visible activities has been maintaining a presence in Iowa, where Clinton struggled in the 2008 caucuses. Veteran organizer Teresa Vilmain, who worked on Clinton’s 2008 campaign, has advised Ready for Hillary. Among the group’s major efforts was surrounding the annual and final Sen. Tom Harkin Steak Fry in September with a ring of signs that bore its trademark font, but simply said “Ready.” or “Thank you Tom.”

“From the get-go, they were clear about their organizational goals and communicated them well. As in — find people that are RFH and collect their contact information,” she wrote in an email.

Where some Clinton advisers have expressed concern is that her status as a political celebrity didn’t need enhancing, and a super PAC asking if people were “ready” for her implied that. And the group’s detractors have argued that almost everything it did would happen as soon as she declares. In a New York Times piece last year, some of the group’s detractors described it as a “make-work” program for people hovering around “Hillaryland.”

Whether Clinton, who was a global figure as secretary of state, can effectively connect with voters after living in the State Department bubble and in a life of extreme wealth is a question her supporters have.

Some RFH critics believe people involved with the group are seeking jobs with her eventual campaign. Clinton’s own aides haven’t addressed that, but the group’s supporters say they would be surprised if Clinton didn’t bring on some of those involved given their work so far.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But ultimately, the perception of the group as a juggernaut helped freeze operatives who might have worked for a rival candidate, and gave pause to the group's admirers had little downside.

"They got a two-year head start," said one supporter.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Fundraisers Rev Up for Possible Hillary Clinton Run"

By Peter Nicholas

November 19, 2014, 6:48 a.m. EST

The fundraising machinery in support of Hillary Clinton's anticipated presidential bid is churning along, with multiple events in the coming weeks aimed at smoothing her entrance into the 2016 contest.

A group of New Jersey-based Democratic fundraisers and political operatives has scheduled a dinner in Newark on Monday to gather commitments for a donation to Mrs. Clinton's campaign as soon as she announces she's running, according to a person familiar with the event. About three dozen people are expected to attend. The organizers are Michael Kempner, a public relations executive, and Josh Gottheimer, who worked in Bill Clinton's White House. The pair organized a similar event last month.

"People understand that it will be very important for Hillary to make a significant financial statement right out of the box," said the person familiar with the effort. "People want to be there to step up quickly and aggressively."

Separately, the super PAC Ready for Hillary is holding a fundraising event in Philadelphia on Dec. 2 with tickets ranging from $1,000 to $5,000, a copy of the invitation shows. Ready for Hillary is also holding a meeting of its national finance council in New York City on Friday.

Mrs. Clinton isn't a candidate yet, though she has said she'll announce a decision in the new year.

Ready for Hillary has been collecting names and email addresses of Clinton supporters, compiling lists that it will eventually make available to her campaign should she jump in the race.

The event on Dec. 2 will be hosted by Leonard Barrack, a longtime Democratic fundraiser. Harold Ickes, a former Clinton White House official and a top adviser to Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign, is listed as the special guest. Those who donate $5,000 are invited to a special "VIP reception," the invitation shows.

The Atlantic: "Hillary's Silence on Iran and Immigration Reform"

By Peter Beinart

November 19, 2014, 7:00 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] The cautious Clinton of 2008 is back—and that shows why it's so essential she face a Democratic challenger in 2016.

Two weeks after the midterms, we now know that President Obama is headed toward collisions with the Republican Congress over immigration reform, climate change, and perhaps a nuclear deal with Iran. What we don't know is whether Hillary Clinton will have his back.

On climate change, the presumptive 2016 Democratic nominee seems most in sync with her former boss. In September, she called warming "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and a world." The New York Times recently speculated that since John Podesta, the man behind Obama's climate-change efforts, will likely play a key role in her campaign, Clinton will publicly embrace Obama's EPA regulations and his recent climate deal with Beijing, despite Republican fury.

But on immigration and Iran, it's harder to tell. On immigration, Clinton has a history of trying to play it safe. At a presidential debate in October 2007, she famously refused to state clearly whether she supported then-New York Governor Eliot Spitzer's initiative to grant drivers' licenses to illegal immigrants. ("Do I think this is the best thing for any governor to do? No. But do I understand the sense of real desperation, trying to get a handle on this?")

Today, Clinton clearly supports legislation to allow many of the undocumented to remain in the U.S. But when it comes to Obama's effort to achieve that goal through executive action—an initiative he delayed this summer but seems set to implement now—she has studiously avoided taking a position. In September in Iowa, when an immigration activist named Cesar Vargas asked an autograph-signing Clinton "if you stand by the president's delay on immigration," she replied, "I think we have to elect more Democrats." The following month in North Carolina, when 25-year-old Oliver Merino told Hillary that his mother risked being deported, she replied, "I understand immigration is an important issue, and we appreciate that. We thank you for your advocacy."

When it comes to Obama's Iran policy, Clinton has been slightly less cagey and slightly more negative. In late 2007, she ran to Obama's right on Iran, calling him "irresponsible and frankly naïve" for agreeing to meet without preconditions with Tehran's leaders. This May, she declared, "I am also personally skeptical that the Iranians would follow through and deliver" on a nuclear deal. She's also laid out tougher terms for such a deal than her former Obama administration colleagues. In July, she told Fareed Zakaria, "I believe strongly that it's really important for there to be so little [uranium] enrichment or no enrichment, at least for a long period of time," even though John Kerry, her successor as secretary of state, had already acknowledged, "I can't tell you they might not have some enrichment" as part of a final nuclear deal. Just last week, Haim Saban, one of Clinton's biggest donors, criticized Obama for having "shown too many carrots and a very small stick" in its dealings with Iran. Saban also endorsed legislation that would require Obama to gain congressional approval for any nuclear deal, something the White House will almost certainly resist.

Perhaps the biggest reason Clinton hasn't yet backed Obama's efforts on immigration and Iran is that she hasn't had to. Obama has not yet taken executive action on deportations, nor have his negotiators inked an agreement with Tehran. But that hasn't stopped plenty of other politicians from tipping their hand. And it hasn't stopped Clinton from taking positions on other issues—for instance, raising the minimum wage—where no presidential action is imminent.

The other likely motive for Clinton's coyness is her desire to avoid inheriting Obama's baggage in 2016. Even if immigration reform is popular, Obama's efforts to implement it unilaterally may not be. And as Saban's comments suggest, an Iran deal will provoke fierce opposition not only among Republicans but among some of the hawkish "pro-Israel" Democrats to whom Clinton is close.

But whether or not keeping her distance is good politics for Clinton, it's bad politics for Obama. By distancing herself from Obama's efforts, she encourages Democrats in Congress to do the same, especially those in more conservative states or dependent on more hawkish donors. And given the furious opposition Obama's efforts will spark among Republicans, a public split among Washington Democrats will make it harder for him to prevail.

All of which shows why it's important that Clinton face a primary challenger. It's the only way that progressives, who overwhelmingly support Obama on immigration and Iran, can influence her behavior. As I've written at some length, Clinton could prove an unusually savvy, capable, and effective president. But there's a reason Democrats chose Obama instead of her in 2008: Because from granting drivers' licenses for the undocumented to invading Iraq, she refused to break decisively from the Beltway conventional wisdom that many liberals believed was hurting the country. As Obama said at an Iowa dinner in October 2007, in his most devastating attack of the primary, "Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do."

Clinton's relative silence this year on both immigration and Iran suggests that some of that caution remains. If Democrats don't want it to undermine Obama's final year in the White House, they need to show that it could undermine her chances of getting their herself.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "Democrats to Obama: You broke the party, now fix it"

By Edward-Isaac Dovere

November 18, 2014, 10:35 p.m. EST

Enough, Donna Brazile told White House political director David Simas the day after the midterms.

Democrats are in worse shape than when President Barack Obama came into office — the number of seats they have in Congress, the number of governors, a party approval rating that's fallen behind Republicans for the first time in recent history, enthusiasm, energy. The White House, Brazile said when she came to meet with Simas, has got to focus for the next two years on getting the party into better shape, and Obama's the best and most effective person to get out the message.

As much Hillary Clinton anticipation as there is, two weeks later, Democrats are still reeling and anxious. Obama may have built his political career without the party — and created anti-establishment alternatives — but he's a lame duck with a new Congress that's been elected to oppose him. He needs Democrats. And they need him.

"The base craves his leadership," Brazile said in an interview later that week, following a meeting of the DNC committee that's beginning to set the rules for the next presidential nomination. "They want him in the mix, talking about what Democrats accomplished, what Democrats are fighting for, and what the president has done to make lives better."

Nancy Pelosi was reelected minority leader. So was Harry Reid. Debbie Wasserman Schultz's term at the DNC isn't up until 2017. Obama said repeatedly before and after the votes were counted that he wasn't going to fire anyone because of election results. But if no one's going to take the blame for 2014, Democrats are hoping he'll take responsibility for getting things better for 2016.

"He may or may not be the best messenger," said Vic Fazio, the former California congressman who was the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chair for the 1994 rout. "But at this point, he is still our messenger. And the first year is very important."

At least until the next presidential campaign begins in earnest, Democrats say, it'll be up to Obama to centralize the Democratic message around something other than simply trying to paint the Republicans as extreme.

Interviews with leading party strategists turn to three main suggestions: Obama should be a much more frequent and strong voice on Democratic priorities, he should transform his West Wing political office from a midterm clearinghouse to an instrument for true party outreach, and he should reinvest his energy in the Democratic National Committee — including seeking a full-time chair who can begin the major clean-up and overhaul they need ahead of 2016.

And if doing it for the party isn't enough for Obama, Democrats say, do it out of self-interest.

"A strong party is the key to a lasting legacy," said a senior Democratic strategist. "Whether it's for our ideals as Democrats or it's for his personal legacy — if we lose the White House and continue to get gutted down ballot, they will repeal the ACA and everything else we've fought so hard for, and all of this will be for naught."

That should be a short-term worry for Obama too, Brazile said.

"The Republicans have not retreated from the battlefield, so why should President Obama surrender?" she said. "He can't give up, he can't waver. All of that looks to Democrats like he doesn't stand for much, and it's not the truth."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the West Wing, they've been projecting optimism since the midterms. The trip to Asia was a success, they say: Obama showed with the China carbon emissions deal how big and how bold he could go without Congress. He ignited a national debate from the other side of the planet by making a few short comments and releasing a fact sheet about net neutrality. There was progress, even, on the trade deals that might make up a big chunk of the limited agenda on which the White House is hoping to find workable compromises with Republicans.

Look for more of that kind of leveraging of the president's existing power and bully pulpit to tackle base priorities, aides say. White House chief of staff Denis McDonough initiated a process about a month before Election Day of internal conversations and outside advice, and they're already in the initial stages of formulating a State of the Union they promise will be heavy on new proposals — which aides insist has so far not been reshaped by the Republican wins or loss of the Senate.

Behind closed doors, they're a little more shaken.

"People are licking their wounds… trying to figure out where they go from here: 'Can we be the phoenix rising from the ashes?' Where are these issues where he's going to dig in his heels and fight? Where does he compromise with Republicans, and how does he manage the politics of that? " said a Democratic strategist familiar with the White House.

Through the election cycle, people in the White House would often say they felt frustrated and Obama to get out more and talk more about his message. Now, aides see two years of opportunities for a president who won't be constrained anymore, who'll be able to say what he wants without worrying about how it could scramble anyone else's political considerations.

Great, Democrats say. Now make something of it. Talk about the economic progress that's happened. Talk about how to achieve job growth to build on it.

"The best thing he can do is focus on income inequality, and talk about and propose things, and just be a fierce advocate for addressing the economic divide," said another Democratic strategist with ties to the White House. "That will leave people after two years saying the Democratic Party really stands for something."

"What Bush failed to do, and to some extent Bill Clinton failed to do, is to make the final two years of their presidency something big, and advocate for it and make it a defining characteristic of the party," the strategist said. "You have to come something that defines who your party is — even if you don't make law and you're not successful in the effort."

The White House declined comment on its own political plans, but over at the DNC, they say they're already feeling good about the level of Obama involvement that many people in and around the party headquarters have complained about for years.

"This president has been incredibly engaged and helpful to everything we've done," said DNC communications director Mo Elleithee, citing Obama's help on measures including retiring the DNC debt and beefing up the party data infrastructure. "He's helped grow the party infrastructure nationally ever since his 2008 campaign, and he's all in with us moving forward."

In Congress, where most Democrats feel bruised and battered from what most say has been a consistently standoffish and inattentive president, even among those who speak most warmly about him, there's a warning that he can't count on the caucus's unwavering support over the next two years.

"When it comes to climate, and when it comes to immigration, we're in sort of alignment. In trade and other areas, it's not so clear," said Sen. Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii). "It's going to depend on the issue, the kind of coalition."

But fixing the political problems is going to be even tougher given the history over the last six years, said Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.).

"We have lost our way. It's a stormy ocean and we're trying to find out way back to land to see where the hell we are," Pascrell said. "But you can't get back to land until you have a deep discussion, not just a philosophical, but a tangible, discussion about where we are as a party. It's kind of difficult in the last two years of the presidency to do that because we have not had that kind of relationship."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, said a White House aide speaking the day before the election, is very interested in the question of his political legacy himself.

"He brought a bunch of people in the process in '08. They sat out in '10. Then it was a real question. Then they came out again in really good numbers in '12. Are these people going to become Democratic voters? Are we going to be able to turn the Obama voter into a Democratic voter the way Reagan was able to turn the Reagan Democrat into a Republican?" the aide said. "If you can do that, we will not just be a presidential party, we will also have success in congressional elections, but also the priorities that we care about will be the ones that shape the discussion going forward."

Asked how that process was going so far, the aide deferred.

"We don't know. We'll see."

Politico: "Beyond Senate defeat, ill omens for Keystone"

By Andrew Restuccia

November 18, 2014, 10:01 p.m. EST

Never mind the cliffhanger defeat for the Keystone XL oil pipeline. Even if the Senate had passed the bill Tuesday, hints are mounting that President Barack Obama has hardened his stance against the $8 billion project and would veto any legislation green-lighting it, whether it comes from the current Democratic Senate or next year's Republican Senate.

The last two weeks offer the strongest evidence to date that Obama may reject the Canada-to-Texas oil pipeline in the end: He made a groundbreaking global warming deal with China — the latest sign that he is building a serious climate change legacy. He has been more dismissive than ever of GOP arguments that Keystone would be a major job creator. And he has lost much of the political urgency for considering the pipeline — the most vulnerable red-state Democrats lost on Election Day, so there's less reason to cater to endangered centrists begging for a "yes" vote on Keystone.

Obama's former aides, and others closely following the six-years-and-running Keystone drama, insist he still has plenty of wiggle room to rule either way when he finally renders a verdict, which could come in early 2015. The administration's official stance is that it's still awaiting the outcome of the State Department's review of the project's merits.

But the latest remarks from the White House, and the president himself, have been increasingly bullish against the pipeline — and especially against attempts by Congress to force his hand. Some of his recent comments also mirror the arguments of green activists who allege that the pipeline would mainly be a boon for Canada's oil export market.

"I have to constantly push back against this idea that somehow the Keystone pipeline is either this massive jobs bill for the United States or is somehow lowering gas prices," Obama said during a news conference last week in Myanmar. "Understand what the project is: It is providing the ability of Canada to pump their oil, send it through our land down to the Gulf, where it will be sold everywhere else."

Republicans made it clear Tuesday that they'll try again when they take over the Senate in January, with a pro-Keystone majority large enough to overcome any filibuster. They and the pipeline's Democratic supporters say they're increasingly confident they can force the president's hand by attaching a pro-pipeline measure to must-pass legislation or, less likely, by securing the 67 Senate votes needed to override a veto.

"There's always room for a deal," said Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), a vocal Keystone supporter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But giving in on the pipeline would contradict Obama's message on climate change, environmental groups and the president's climate allies on the Hill say, especially given his devotion to reaching an international deal in Paris at the end of 2015. Despite the State Department's repeated conclusions that the project would pose little risk of environmental damage, the pipeline has drawn greens' ire because of the large amounts of greenhouse gases produced by western Canada's oil sands region.

"Given all the major strides the president has taken to cut carbon pollution, we are more confident than ever that he will reject this dirty and dangerous pipeline," League of Conservation Voters President Gene Karpinski said.

Approving Keystone would be "out of step with saving the planet from devastating climate change … just as we're starting to make progress," said Senate Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who led the debate against the Keystone bill.

Another Senate climate hawk, Rhode Island Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, was more cautious about reading too much into the Beijing deal as a crystal ball on Keystone. "The problem with these conversations is that we often presume they are logical … when we have a big and powerful industry that's trying to have its way," he said.

The European Union's top climate change official, Connie Hedegaard, has called on Obama to reject Keystone, saying it would send a "strong signal" about his seriousness on global warming.

Green activists this week offered a preview of what they have in store for Obama if he approves the project and, in their view, tarnishes his environmental legacy. They staged sit-ins at the Senate offices of Democrats who supported the pipeline bill and flooded fence-straddling senators' offices with phone calls, even accusing one blue-state senator — Cory Booker (D-N.J.) — of "throwing our families in the Heartland under the bus" if he were to vote yes. (Booker voted no on the bill.)

While Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) desperately tried to whip votes for the Keystone bill, greens worked the phones to shore up opposition from liberal Senate Democrats. Top officials at the League of Conservation Voters, the Sierra Club and 350.org all waited outside the Senate chamber as Tuesday's drama played out, and people from the groups were seen congratulating several senators when the bill failed.

The White House had stopped short of threatening to veto the bill, although press secretary Josh Earnest said Tuesday that Obama "doesn't support" the legislation and opposes efforts to circumvent the State Department process.

Even if Congress never passes another Keystone bill, the completion of the State Department's analysis would eventually bring the saga to a close. But when that happens is anybody's guess.

The department halted its review last spring to await the outcome of a Nebraska Supreme Court case involving a challenge to the pipeline's route inside the state. The court could rule any day now, after which it could take weeks or months for the State Department to wrap up its analysis.

The final outcome will pose political difficulties no matter how Obama rules, displeasing either his green base or pro-oil Democrats and jobs-eager labor unions. Opinion polls consistently find the project popular with large majorities of Americans. In addition, Democrats would gain some political advantage from Obama settling the issue sooner rather than later, if only to keep it from burdening a 2016 White House run by Hillary Clinton.

Obama has never said where he stands on the pipeline's merits, and his words and actions have been mixed — though increasingly critical.

"The administration is looking to keep its options open here," one former administration official who has been close to the issue told POLITICO earlier this year, following the release of the latest State Department environmental study.

Obama rejected Keystone developer TransCanada's initial permit application in early 2012, after Republicans pushed through a bill giving him just 60 days to decide. But after the company reapplied, he told the Army Corps of Engineers to speed up its review of Keystone's southern half, which runs from Oklahoma to the Gulf Coast. (That portion is now operating.) He even went to a TransCanada pipe storage yard in Oklahoma and boasted that his administration "has approved dozens of new oil and gas pipelines over the last three years — including one from Canada."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in his second term, with climate change becoming a growing priority, his tone has turned increasingly negative.

He told Republican senators early last year that the administration is not “ideologically averse” to the pipeline, and that “some of the environmental concerns have been over-exaggerated,” Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.) said afterward. But he has also accused Keystone supporters of overstating its job-creation potential, while telling The New York Times that Canada “could potentially be doing more” to counteract the greenhouse gas emissions being unleashed from its oil fields.

Obama’s most noteworthy public statement on the pipeline was his June 2013 declaration that “our national interest will be served only if this project does not significantly exacerbate the problem of carbon pollution” — but Keystone supporters and opponents differed dramatically on what they thought he meant. Greens argued that the pipeline couldn’t possibly clear that bar, while supporters of the project pointed to the past State Department studies as evidence that it already has.

Sen. Angus King (I-Maine), who voted against the Senate bill Tuesday, said Obama needs to end the suspense.

“Well, I do think the president ought to move ahead and make a decision,” King said. The power to make that decision was entrusted to him, and I think he should exercise it.”

Los Angeles Times column: Doyle McManus: “A Bernie Sanders candidacy could help Hillary Clinton”

By Doyle McManus

November 18, 2014, 4:54 p.m. PST

I'm going out on a limb here, but Bernie Sanders is not going to be our next president. Still, the independent socialist senator from Vermont is sounding more and more like a man who intends to defy the doubters and run. And he could play an important role in the campaign.

Sanders hasn't formally announced his candidacy; he hasn't even changed his party registration. (If he runs, it will be in the Democratic primaries.) But he's doing everything an aspiring candidate needs to do. He's traveled to Iowa and New Hampshire. He's signed up (provisionally) a high-powered campaign manager, Tad Devine, who worked on the presidential campaigns of John F. Kerry and Al Gore. He's buttonholing reporters with even more zeal than usual. And this week, he even submitted to the gentle ridicule of faux conservative Stephen Colbert to win seven minutes of national television time.

“A self-described socialist!” Colbert faux-sneered. “Do you frighten people when you walk around the Capitol? Are they afraid you're going to take their tractor and give it to the whole village?”

“Hopefully we frighten the billionaire class,” Sanders replied as a youthful studio audience cheered.

Get ready to hear Sanders repeat that phrase, “the billionaire class,” a lot. It's the core of his message, the theme that makes him passionate: his conviction that the wealthy have hijacked not only the economy, but also the political system.

There may not have been a major-party presidential candidate with so blunt a populist message on the economy since Franklin D. Roosevelt ran against “economic royalists” in 1936.

“The biggest issue in the country is that we don't discuss the biggest issue in the country,” Sanders told me in his Senate office last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“How does it happen that today the economists tell us that 95% of all new income created in America goes to the top 1%? How does it happen that we have by far the most unequal distribution of wealth and income of any major country on Earth, where one family, the Walton family of Wal-Mart, owns more wealth than the bottom 40% of the American people? How does that happen, and what do we do about it?”

Sanders' answers on what to do come from a crisp checklist: Higher taxes on the wealthy, a much higher minimum wage, $1 trillion of new spending on roads and public transportation and European-style national health insurance (which he tries to make less foreign by calling it “Medicare for all”).

He's asking the right questions. The stagnation of middle class incomes in the midst of an economic recovery has become the central challenge for both political parties. Exit polls in this month's midterm elections found that 63% of all voters believe the U.S. economic system isn't fair to most Americans, but “favors the wealthy.”

But does Sanders really think his untrammeled populism can win him the nomination, much less a general election?

“I'm running to win,” he insists. “It won't be just an educational campaign.”

When pressed, however, he acknowledges that he thinks even a losing campaign would be a good thing because of its potential to bring more attention to his ideas, widen the national debate and put pressure on Hillary Rodham Clinton or any other eventual Democratic nominee.

Win or lose, Sanders will fill a familiar role if he decides to run. Democratic presidential primaries almost always include at least one populist or quasi-populist candidate on the left. In 2008, it was John Edwards. In 2004, it was Howard Dean. In 1992, it was California's own Jerry Brown. And none of them won the nomination.

This year, there could be three candidates running to the left of Clinton. In addition to Sanders, there might be Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (who says he's running, but hasn't succeeded in defining much of a theme yet) and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who spent most of the summer saying she wouldn't run, but recently modified that to “I don't think so.”

Meanwhile, former Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) has been talking about running as a moderate to Clinton's right.

Challenges like these would be a good thing for Clinton.

For one thing, they would give voters a reason to tune in to Democratic primary debates; otherwise, the brawling Republican field would get hours of television time all to itself.

For another, if she has challengers on both the left and right, Clinton could conveniently cast herself as the woman in the middle, the champion of her party's broad center.

And finally, it would be good for Clinton to work through her campaign style in more friendly waters. The last thing she wants is to sail through the primaries untested and have to develop her battle skills in actual combat with her Republican opponent. “She needs to get out of the cocoon of inevitability,” former Barack Obama strategist David Axelrod said last week.

If Clinton wins the nomination, she's unlikely to thank her Democratic opponents for trying to stop her from breaking the glass ceiling — but she should.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press: "2016 contest overshadows GOP governors meeting"

By Steve Peoples and Jill Colvin

November 19, 2014, 3:30 a.m. EST

BOCA RATON, Fla. (AP) — No fewer than a half-dozen potential presidential candidates are gathering in Florida as the Republican Governors Association prepares to select its next leader.

The organization's annual conference begins Wednesday in a luxury oceanside resort where the nation's Republican governors will celebrate their party's recent success in the midterm elections. Privately, they're jockeying for position as the 2016 presidential contest looms. None of the most likely White House candidates is expected to seek to replace New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie as chairman, a position with responsibilities that would conflict with the presidential primary season.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said he would not run for the RGA chairmanship for just that reason.

"It's pretty obvious at least it's something I should consider," Walker said of a White House bid during an interview with The Associated Press. "And if I'm going to do that, I'm not going to put my colleagues in the position of having someone in place who isn't 100 percent committed to the leadership of the organization."

The conference comes two weeks after the GOP's midterm rout, in which they gained control of Congress and expanded their majority of governorships across the country. In January the Republican Party will control 31 compared with Democrats' 19. The party's strong performance offers a presidential springboard to governors who won re-election, Walker among them, and others, like Christie, who played a leading role in the GOP's success.

While Hillary Rodham Clinton remains the overwhelming Democratic front-runner should she seek the presidency, the prospective Republican field is crowded and without a clear leader. A handful of Senate Republicans may join the 2016 contest, but many donors and party officials would prefer a presidential nominee to emerge from the ranks of the Republican governors, who have executive experience and are not tainted by Congress' low approval ratings.

Christie arrives in Florida in a strong position after having broadened his national network while raising tens of millions of dollars to help elect Republican governors. Christie and Walker will spend this week alongside a list of other prospective presidential candidates that includes Indiana Gov. Mike Pence, Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, Ohio Gov. John Kasich and Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder.

Governors, governors-elect, senior aides and prominent donors began to descend on the Boca Raton Resort & Club on Tuesday. The bright pink resort is a sprawling maze of fountains, manicured gardens, ballrooms and high-end restaurants, complete with its own beach club, marina and golf clubhouse.

The coming days will be filled with dinners and receptions, where governors can meet privately with donors and strategists. While much of this week's action takes place behind closed doors, a Wednesday open session titled "Republican Governors: The Road Ahead" features five prospective presidential contenders: Pence, Perry, Jindal, Walker and Kasich.

In one of the gathering's only formal agenda items, Christie will hand over the reins of the RGA on Thursday, ending what has arguably been a politically life-saving tenure as the group's chairman. Beyond boosting his 2016 prospects, he has used the position to help repair his reputation after the political retribution traffic scandal in New Jersey that badly tainted his brand earlier in the year.

But the role has also cost him at home. An AP analysis of his public schedule shows that Christie will have spent about 40 percent of his second term out of state by the time he finishes up in Florida on Friday. At the same time, his popularity has slumped at home, according to a number of local polls, with increasingly vocal critics charging that he's neglected local issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

None of the Republican governors considering the presidency is particularly popular at home, however, according to interviews with voters after this month's midterm elections. Just a quarter of Louisiana voters said Jindal would make a good president, while one-third of Texas voters said the same of Perry. For Walker, who just won his third gubernatorial election in four years, just over 4 in 10 of Wisconsin voters said he is presidential material.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· November 19 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton is honored by the National Breast Cancer Coalition (Breast Cancer Deadline)

· November 20 – Memphis, TN: Sec. Clinton attends the dedication of The Marlo Thomas Center for Global Education & Collaboration at St. Jude (WMC)

· November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton presides over meeting of the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves (Bloomberg)

· November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton is honored by the New York Historical Society (Bloomberg)

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

· December 16 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton honored by Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights (Politico)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 9/8/2014 7:19:00 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday September 8, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Monday September 8, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: As FLOTUS, Clinton received Mother Teresa award for her humanitarian work, Albania's highest civilian honor #HRC365http://1.usa.gov/U6M2xM [9/7/14, 4:00 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

MSNBC: "Clinton and Bush get chummy at joint event"

"A potential future president, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was also there, taking a seat in the back. She did not speak."

Associated Press: "Clinton, Bush Trade Jabs, Launch Scholars Program"

"With Hillary Rodham Clinton seated in the fourth row, Bush noted that many people ask him about the possibility of another Bush-Clinton White House campaign. His father, President George H.W. Bush, lost to Clinton in 1992, and his brother, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, may seek the GOP nomination in a race that could pair him against Hillary Clinton. 'The first one didn't turn out too good,' Bush quipped."

U.S. News & World Report blog: The Run 2016: "How Hillary's 2016 Timeline Will Affect the Others"

"In essence – due to her unique stature in American politics – once Clinton is in, it will be difficult for others to wait."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "Benghazi panel to hold first hearing"

"The House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi will hold its first public hearing next week, according to a committee spokesperson."

Washington Post blog: Erik Wemple: "False advertising on 'Meet the Press': People are afraid to say Hillary Clinton's running for president"

"Now, what is the thing that people have been so afraid to say of late? According to yesterday's show, it's that Hillary Rodham Clinton is running for president. So Todd said it: 'Yeah, it's obvious … that she's running.'"

Burlington Free Press (V.T.): "Sanders would tempt fate, and history, as Democrat"

"Sanders says he's yet to decide whether to run for president in 2016. But he has plenty of supporters urging him to run — and to do so as a Democrat."

Slate: "Field of Dreams"

"There will also be thousands of normal human beings in that Indianola field, extending their phones like periscopes to capture one or both of the Clintons as they pledge allegiance before a vast flag or pretend to cook steak on a grill that's almost as large."

Washington Post blog: WorldViews: "Obama's new man in Moscow doesn't do Twitter"

"When McFaul arrived in Moscow, then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was pushing her envoys to use Twitter to reach new audiences in the countries where they were the public face of America. McFaul was happy to comply."

Associated Press: "University of Miami President Shalala to Retire"

Shalala's goal was simple: She wanted to make Miami "the next great American university" and seemed to succeed in raising the school's profile."

Articles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MSNBC: "Clinton and Bush get chummy at joint event"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 8, 2014, 12:17 p.m. EDT

The bonhomie was flowing between former presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush Monday morning at an event to announce a new scholarship program run jointly by their presidential centers.

Bush's father, George H.W. Bush was there in spirit, sending a lighthearted note urging his successors to keep their remarks brief at the event hosted by the Newseum in Washington, D.C. A potential future president, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was also there, taking a seat in the back. She did not speak.

The scholarship program is aimed at leveraging the experience and resources of the former presidents to teach new generation of leaders, so the two former presidents discussed at length what they admired about the leadership style of other occupants of the Oval Office, including each other.

Clinton revealed that Bush would call him twice a year in the latter's second term to talk casually for 30 to 45 minutes. "I felt good about that. I thought that was a really healthy thing," Clinton said. He's now become especially close with the elder bush, whom both former presidents praised movingly. The younger Bush has a new book coming out about his father next month.

With two Clintons and two Bushes in the mix, the specter of dynasty and the 2016 presidential election loomed over the event, but only addressed once. The families have been close, but Hillary Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush are both considering runs, which could pit the clans against each other once again.

Bush, who was relaxed and casual, joking as often as he was serious, said he was recently asked about the prospect of another Clinton-Bush matchup. "My answer was: The first one didn't turn out too good," he joked he replied. Joshua Bolten, Bush's former chief of staff who was moderating the discussion, quickly moved the conversation elsewhere.

At one point while Clinton was speaking on stage, a cell phone ring could be heard. The former president reached into his pocket to pulled out his device and silence it. "Only two people have this number, and I'm related to both of them," he said, with his wife in the room. "I hope I'm not being told I'm about to become a premature grandfather."

While Clinton has used his post-presidency to engage in global issues and remain on the public stage, Bush has led a relatively quiet life. "One of the things I've learned, maybe through my painting, is that I'm trying to leave something behind. Something to make the world a better place," he said in a rare introspective moment.

Clinton, as is his style – Bush called him an "awesome communicator" – was more voluminous in his remarks. Both presidents were asked what they admired about each other and Clinton gave a lengthy response, praising his successor's conviction and humility. Bush replied more briefly, praising Clinton's empathy and oratory skills.

"Is that enough? It was a lot shorter than your answer," Bush said. Bolten assured him the answer was "equally powerful." "Thank you, Josh, former chief of staff, I appreciate you saying that," Bush replied sarcastically to laughter.

Clinton spoke about the need for compromise in politics, saying that he loved the film "Lincoln" and the Broadway show "All the Way" about LBJ because they both showed presidents getting things done, even when it sometimes required ugly dealmaking. "If you read the Constitution, it ought to be subtitled, let's make a deal," he added.

Clinton said he hoped the new scholarship program would bring together leaders from various walks of life and in different sectors. For example, he hoped it would bring together tea party activists and community organizers in inner-city African-American or immigrant communities, who might find surprising common ground.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The program is a joint project of the presidential centers of George H.W. Bush, Clinton, George W. Bush, and Johnson, with support from private foundations. It's a non-degree program for people who have already proven themselves and are ready to advance to another level. The board of advisors is made of alumni of both Clinton and Bush White Houses, as well as retired General Stanley McChrystal, the former Afghan War commander who was relieved by President Obama.

Finally, Bolten asked Bush if he had any advice for Clinton on becoming a grandfather. "Get ready also to be, like, the lowest person in the pecking order in your family," he replied warmly.

Associated Press: "Clinton, Bush Trade Jabs, Launch Scholars Program"

By Ken Thomas

September 8, 2014, 12:57 p.m. EDT

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Political opposites turned friends, former Presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush launched a new scholars program at four presidential centers with an opening act that might have been mistaken for a comedy routine.

The two former presidents - one a Democrat, the other a Republican - shared laughs and a buddy-like banter on stageMonday, talking about presidential leadership while trading stories about their famous families and life after the White House.

Bill Clinton said he and Bush laughed backstage about people coming up to them at restaurants and asking to take "selfie" photos. Quipped Bush: "At least they're still asking."

With Hillary Rodham Clinton seated in the fourth row, Bush noted that many people ask him about the possibility of another Bush-Clinton White House campaign. His father, President George H.W. Bush, lost to Clinton in 1992, and his brother, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, may seek the GOP nomination in a race that could pair him against Hillary Clinton.

"The first one didn't turn out too good," Bush quipped.

The 42nd and 43rd presidents joined together to announce the Presidential Leadership Scholars program, a partnership between the Clinton, Bush, George H.W. Bush and Lyndon B. Johnson presidential centers. At a time of partisanship and gridlock, both presidents said they hoped the scholars program would attract people in business, public service and the military interested in learning about presidential decision-making and applying it to their own careers.

Clinton revealed that he and Bush would speak twice a year during Bush's second term, 30-to-45 minute conversations about policy and politics. While they didn't always agree, Clinton said he never talked about their discussions and said the talks "meant a lot to me."

Clinton said the test of any democracy is finding ways of having a vigorous debate and still reaching resolution to the nation's problems. "If you read the Constitution, it ought to be subtitled: `Let's make a deal,'" Clinton said.

The elder Bush got in the act from afar, writing in a letter read aloud that every former president displays different qualities, "for example, not all of us skydive."

Bush, who celebrated his 90th birthday in June by making a tandem parachute jump, urged the two former presidents to "keep it brief."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

George W. Bush campaigned for president in 2000 on restoring "honor and dignity" to the White House following Clinton's impeachment over a sex scandal. But the two former presidents have developed a bond, strengthened by their mutual admiration for the elder Bush, whom Clinton visited in Maine last week.

Clinton and the younger Bush worked together on relief efforts after Haiti's devastating earthquake in 2010 and have been active in the fight against HIV/AIDS in Africa.

Bush noted that his upcoming book, called "41: A Portrait of My Father," would be a "love story. It's a story about seeing someone you admire and learning from them."

As moderator Josh Bolten joking plugged the book's Nov. 11 release date, Clinton mused about writing his own competing Bush 41 book. "I think I can put one together that would be ready to go," Clinton joked.

U.S. News & World Report blog: The Run 2016: "How Hillary's 2016 Timeline Will Affect the Others"

By David Catanese

September 8, 2014, 12:30 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Clinton's unique place in American politics could force an earlier start to the 2016 race.

Hillary Clinton's signal that she'll finally settle on whether to run for president again in January – a mere four months from now – likely will force the rest of the prospective field to reassess their own timelines for entry.

Assuming Clinton allows her intentions to be known during the first month of the year and assuming she decides to run, the 2016 White House campaign could commence before people have packed away their holiday decorations.

In essence – due to her unique stature in American politics – once Clinton is in, it will be difficult for others to wait.

None of her potential rivals from either party are as well known or as vetted as she is. Among Democratic constituencies, the expected rush of unity around Clinton will only hasten the drumbeat for those like Vice President Joe Biden and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley to make a decision quickly. If either of them were to defiantly move ahead, it would be a suicide mission to wait very long to begin gathering staff and attempting to raise funds.

Top Republican operatives argue Clinton's timeline won't affect the GOP tribe. There remains a line of thought within GOP circles – or perhaps it's wishful thinking – that Clinton isn't running after all.

"To me, she looks more like a person ending her career than starting," says Keith Nahigian, who managed Minnesota Rep. Michele Bachmann's 2012 presidential bid.

"I think very few GOP wannabes care what she does," offers Dave Carney, Texas Gov. Rick Perry's former top political aide. "More than a few think she won't pull the trigger anyway."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet the better odds are that Clinton is running and the regular trickle of paid speeches, book tour events and winks and nods in interviews is just a drawn-out warm-up act to the 2015 kickoff.

It also explains why the emerging Republican field has taken shots at Clinton at every chance afforded to them.

Because the GOP primary contest currently has only a marginal, tenuous front-runner and is expected to turn into a wide open and divisive free-for-all, there will be an incentive to get in early – beginning with the traditional formation of an "exploratory committee" – and define oneself.

Given that financial capacity within GOP circles is likely to be divided among a handful of upper-tier candidates, free media will be vitally important for the Republican slate – especially when juxtaposed against Clinton, who will attract nonstop coverage the moment she's in.

As one unaligned operative notes, Clinton has graced the covers of supermarket checkout tabloids for almost a quarter of a century. Not one of the Republican aspirants can match that level of familiarity. But they must raise awareness of their biographies to compete in both the primary and general elections.

A slightly compressed primary calendar – with fewer debates – only adds to the urgency for Republicans, especially if Clinton is largely unopposed for the Democratic nomination. Media coverage will slowly but surely begin to frame the 2016 contest regarding which Republican is best suited to match up against the former secretary of state.

Of all the Republicans mulling it, there are two that could wait somewhat longer than the rest: Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

Bush's name needs no explanation to the Republican primary voter and he'll have access to bundles of money whether he decides in January or June. Paul has some residual name identification from his father's three presidential endeavors, though the Kentucky senator has been the most aggressive contender in laying the groundwork for 2016 and it seems unlikely he'd wait long after the new year to announce a bid.

In the 2012 presidential cycle, most of the GOP field triggered exploratory committees – a legal vehicle that allows candidates to test the waters with fundraising and operational staffing – in March and April of 2011, with official announcements following in May and June.

But that timeline was calculated against a sitting president with no intraparty opposition.

A better parallel is to look back at the last time there was an open seat for the presidency without an incumbent. That, of course, was the 2008 race.

Then-Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., announced his exploratory committee on Jan. 16, 2007. Clinton dove in four days later onJan. 20.

But it's often forgotten that several Republicans got out in front of them with extraordinarily early announcements.

Former Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., announced his exploratory committee on Oct. 30, 2006 – a week before the midterm elections.

It's unlikely any major candidate would pull the trigger that early, but both Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani waited only a little more than a week after the 2006 midterms to turn the switch for 2008. Giuliani and McCain pulled the trigger in 2006 on Nov. 14 and Nov. 16, respectively.

That early of an entry would invite immediate scrutiny, but it would also position a candidate to be on equal footing with Clinton when she makes her expected announcement in January.

Maybe the political world won't even have to wait until after the new year for the next race for the White House; a daring contender could jump start things before Thanksgiving.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Politico: "Benghazi panel to hold first hearing"

By Lauren French

September 8, 2014, 10:49 a.m. EDT

The House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi will hold its first public hearing next week, according to a committee spokesperson.

The hearing will focus on the State Department's Accountability Review Board — a panel created by the State Department after the attacks — to review the government's security systems abroad.

That review board found "systemic" management and leadership failures at the State Department surrounding the militant attacks, which left Ambassador Chris Stevens dead. The panel issued more than two dozen recommendations in December 2012 to help the U.S government tighten its security controls.

The committee, chaired by Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), will focus on how the implementation of those recommendations has proceeded.

The 12-member panel has actively worked since it was first created earlier this summer, reviewing previous reports on the Benghazi attacks and requesting documents from the State Department on the U.S. government's actions in the region before, during and after the attacks.

The hearing was first reported by Fox News.

Washington Post blog: Erik Wemple: "False advertising on 'Meet the Press': People are afraid to say Hillary Clinton's running for president"

By Erik Wemple

September 8, 2014, 1:11 p.m. EDT

Chuck Todd did a good job in his debut yesterday as host of "Meet the Press." He asked good questions of President Obama in an interview that the show spread out over a few segments; he interviewed three mayors about how they were overcoming Washington's deep-set gridlock; and he acted like Chuck Todd — humble and smart and reasonable.

None of which stops the Erik Wemple Blog from posing a monster quibble with the program. As part of an effort to freshen up "Meet the Press," Todd introduced a segment titled "What everyone in Washington knows, but is afraid to say."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What a great premise! So bold and out-there. Now, what is the thing that people have been so afraid to say of late? According to yesterday's show, it's that Hillary Rodham Clinton is running for president. So Todd said it: "Yeah, it's obvious … that she's running."

What courage. Todd is the first person to come out and make such a declaration. Except for:

The Washington Post's Chris Cillizza, who wrote, "Let's be honest: Hillary Clinton is running for president."

Carl Cannon, who wrote: "Yes, let's get that out of the way: Hillary Rodham Clinton is not deciding whether to run for president; she's already running for president."

The Week, which wrote, "Yes, Hillary Clinton is running for president."

UCLA political science professor Lynn Vavreck, who wrote in the New York Times that the world is "sure she's a candidate, and they are treating her like one."

Miami Herald world affairs columnist Frida Ghitis, who wrote on CNN.com, "Yes, Hillary Clinton is running for president, and she is running away from President Barack Obama's record on foreign policy."

A commentator on CNBC, who said that it "appears that she's running for president."

"Daily Show" host Jon Stewart, who said in an interview with Clinton, "It sounds to me like, if I may, you've declared for president." A boomlet of Clinton-is-running pieces sprung up after that July program. Here's one, another and another.

Burlington Free Press (V.T.): "Sanders would tempt fate, and history, as Democrat"

By Nicole Gaudiano

September 8, 2014, 8:12 a.m. EDT

WASHINGTON – Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont has belonged to one political party in his lifetime: the anti-war Liberty Union Party.

That was back in the 1970s. Since then, Sanders has forged his own political path, caucusing with Democrats in Congress but remaining independent on the ballot.

That could change as he considers a 2016 presidential bid. Among the decisions he's weighing is whether to run as an independent or as a Democrat.

On one hand, Sanders believes many people are dissatisfied with the two-party system and think Democrats are doing too little to protect working-class and middle-income Americans.

On the other hand, a Democratic presidential bid has definite advantages.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you run as a Democrat, it would obviously be much easier to get on the ballot," Sanders said during a recent interview. "And the advantage, again, running as a Democrat, is that you would be in the middle of Democratic primaries, you would be in debates, and you would, I think, attract more media attention for your ideas."

Sanders, who turns 73 today, is the longest-serving independent member of Congress in history. His progressive views, which he delivers forcefully in a Brooklyn accent on the Senate floor and left-leaning news shows, don't always align neatly with the Democratic agenda or party politics.

Democratic urges

A self-described democratic socialist, he believes lessons can be learned from the Scandinavian approach to governing, focusing on health care as a right, free higher education, and an emphasis on environmental issues and childhood poverty. In March, he held a subcommittee hearing on ways that countries such as Denmark and Canada offer better health care for less money.

"We should have a government that represents all of our people," he said, "not one which is dominated by big money which significantly works for the interests of the wealthy and large corporations."

Sanders says he's yet to decide whether to run for president in 2016. But he has plenty of supporters urging him to run — and to do so as a Democrat.

Progressive Democrats of America has gathered about 14,000 signatures on a petition, urging Sanders to run in the Democratic presidential primaries. The group is organizing steering committees in Iowa towns and plans to raise money for Sanders through its political action committee, Progressive Democrats of America Action Fund.

When Sanders makes various stops in Iowa this month, the group will have bumper stickers, signs and banners greeting him with the message, "Run Bernie, Run."

"If he runs as an independent, we just feel he would be isolated," said Conor Boylan, the group's co-executive director. "It wouldn't be a smart move for him."

Sanders would encounter "substantial procedural and legal hurdles" to accessing the ballot if he ran as an independent in the Democratic primaries or in the general election, said Tad Devine, a Washington media consultant and political strategist who has worked on two Sanders campaigns.

Devine, who has spoken with Sanders about the decision, said he thinks Sanders would run as a Democrat, or at least within the structure of the party.

"He understands that a third-party challenger of his nature could do something very bad, like help elect a Republican president, like, for example, (Ralph) Nader did in 2000," said Devine, who also has worked on presidential campaigns for Al Gore and John Kerry.

No spoilers

Sanders said that would never be his intention if he ran as an independent.

"If the campaign did not catch on, I would not stay in the race until November and play the role of a spoiler," he said. "But that decision would have to be made down the line."

Sanders noted that he's always won in Vermont as an independent, and his lack of party affiliation is part of his identity. His supporters in the state appear to like him that way, according to recent poll conducted by the Castleton Polling Institute in Vermont.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fifty-five percent of 608 people polled in May said they likely would support a Sanders presidential bid. Of that group, 55 percent said he should run as an independent, while 31 percent said he should run as a Democrat.

Boylan of the Progressive Democrats of America Action Fund, however, said Sanders is an "ideal" progressive candidate to run in the Democratic primaries, because the Vermonter would work to expand Social Security, protect Medicare and Medicaid and advocate for the poor and working classes.

"We don't want Hillary Clinton to be the presumptive nominee and to run unchallenged," Boylan said. "We need to have an open debate."

Priorities

Sanders, the son of a Polish-Jewish immigrant father and a New York-born mother, studied psychology at Brooklyn College and graduated with a political science degree from the University of Chicago, where he was active in the civil rights movement.

After graduating, he spent time on an Israeli kibbutz. He moved to Vermont in the 1960s and worked as a carpenter, filmmaker, writer and researcher. He lost several elections as a Liberty Union Party member before his successful bid as an independent for mayor of Burlington in 1981.

anders, now chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, has caucused with Democrats since his days as Vermont's lone congressman, beginning in 1991.

He believes the party does a better job than the GOP of standing up for working families, but he said there are "too many Democrats who are not prepared to stand up to the billionaire class, which today has incredible economic and political power."

His priorities include:

• Overturning the Supreme Court's 2010 ruling in Citizens United v. the Federal Election Commission, which allows corporations and unions to spend unlimited amounts of money on ads supporting or opposing individual candidates. Sanders calls the decision "disastrous."

• Addressing wealth and income inequality with a "massive federal jobs program" to rebuild crumbling infrastructure, an increased minimum wage, affordable higher education, a reformed trade policy to prevent corporations from shipping jobs overseas and a reformed tax system so profitable corporations can't avoid paying them and wealthy individuals pay more.

• Focusing on the "crisis" of climate change and the need to move away from fossil fuels.

• Creating a single-payer national health care system, also known as "Medicare for all."

"These are the issues," he said. "This is what is important."

Sanders has been traveling the country, visiting traditional and non-traditional presidential campaign stops. Last month, he visited North Carolina, South Carolina and Mississippi. On Labor Day, he was at an AFL-CIO breakfast in Manchester, N.H., and later this month, he'll be in Wisconsin, Iowa and New Hampshire again.

His message is simple: The country's middle class is collapsing, the gap between the rich and poor is widening, and if nothing changes, the country could move toward an oligarchic society where a handful of billionaires control the economic and political system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders said his main challenge is figuring out whether that message resonates.

"How many Americans are prepared to get involved in the political process and fight hard to prevent that?" he said. "That's the question that I have to deal with."

Slate: "Field of Dreams"

By John Dickerson

September 7, 2014, 11:55 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] A mixture of hope and high expectations brings voters out to see the candidates. But the 2014 midterm elections are about to dash both.

The Iowa State Fair is over, but the circus is coming to town. On Sept. 14, Hillary and Bill Clinton will attend the 37th annual Harkin Steak Fry, the famous Iowa political event named after Sen. Tom Harkin. A mess of journalists will rush after the couple, looking for signs of a presidential campaign and drawing conclusions on the nearest barn wall. (It is fitting that the event takes place on a hot air balloon field.) But there will also be thousands of normal human beings in that Indianola field, extending their phones like periscopes to capture one or both of the Clintons as they pledge allegiance before a vast flag or pretend to cook steak on a grill that's almost as large.

The press will be there to cover the hype (and create it), but the people sinking their folding chairs into the grass during the political speeches will be there for the hope. It is the engine that drives all presidential campaigns. Voters are exhausted with Washington politicians debating one another in adjacent boxes on TV, but they can still be thrilled by a presidential candidate walking in the fall air. Some will have brought their kids so they can get a glimpse of perhaps the first female president. That's not simply a change from the previous president, but from the 227 years there will have been presidents.

But is this the beginning or the end of something? This will be Harkin's last steak fry—the senator is retiring after five terms, and there's a tough fight to replace him. The winner will become a freshman in a body that is drastically different than the one Harkin entered—different even than the one Hillary Clinton joined in 2001. It is partisan and deadlocked, and the election of 2014 will show us why it's likely to stay that way. The structure of modern politics is driving toward more gridlock. That means the sense of hope and high expectation that's fueling all those people coming out to look at Hillary Clinton may be a vain one.

It's easy to see why presidential campaigns encourage hope for progress. It's not just that so many parties, including the media, are invested in the conceit that big ideas are being debated and decided by the electorate. The structure of the presidential campaign helps encourage the notion that, despite the occasional silliness, progress is being made. In Washington, it doesn't seem to matter how many people march or protest, little happens when the gavel sounds. In a campaign, though, every yard sign and Facebook posting is aimed at a guaranteed result: the verdict of Election Day. Everyone who chooses to participate can believe that he or she might be doing the thing that changes minds and determines outcomes. When that verdict is rendered, all the activity that led to it is supposed to represent the people's will. A president chosen through that productive process will have a honeymoon and a mandate. But is that an old idea that has died? The election of 2012 changed nothing: Afterward it was the same players, the same debates, the same clog. Still, voters will show up in that field in Iowa this week, full of hope.

Usually we have to wait until a president disappoints us before the hope dissipates, but the tall oaks of disappointment are being planted this fall. The election feels national—control of the Senate is at stake, after all, and the president's performance in office is on the ballot. But the electorate participating will be small, and there isn't much actual engagement on national issues that could provide a mandate or give us a sense of the public mood. And even if there were, the politicians would learn soon enough to ignore the public message and follow the guidance of the structure that rules elections.

In the election of 2014, only a small number of seats are in a position to act as a proving ground for a battle of ideas. The Center for the Study of the American Electorate suggests that this might be the lowest midterm turnout in history. The number of people who will participate in states with elections that will determine control of the Senate is even smaller still. The House represents a national election of sorts, since all 435 members are up for re-election, but of that group only 30 (6 percent) are in races that are considered up for grabs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even if there were a great chunk of the population being asked to weigh in on competing visions about the issues of the day, those people would have lots of free time. The two parties are running parallel campaigns aimed at motivating their core voters. Republicans want the race to be about national issues and the failures of the president. Democrats want it to be about everything but that, so they're focusing on local issues.

In North Carolina last week, Democratic Sen. Kay Hagan ran four ads with voters describing how the education cuts of her opponent, state House Speaker Thom Tillis, have affected them. On the other side, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce launched its second general election ad attacking Hagan for her ties to President Obama. When the two candidates participated in their first debate last week, Hagan focused her remarks on how Tillis was bad for women. Tillis talked about how Hagan was a rubber stamp for the president. If the candidates aren't discussing issues in an election, the election can't ratify one set of policy ideas over another.

Elections don't need to be about issues because, as the National Journal's Ron Brownstein points out, congressional elections are increasingly just a method for voters to show their presidential preferences. In the 2006 midterm election, Republicans won six of the 10 Senate races in states where exit polls showed President Bush's approval rating reaching 46 percent or above, but lost 19 of the 20 in states where he stood at 45 percent or below. In 2010, Democrats won Senate races in nine of the 10 states in which President Obama's approval reached 48 percent or higher, and lost 13 of the 15 states that gave him lower marks.

As Brownstein has been arguing, the death of split-ticket voting has changed the electoral structure so that senators who were once encouraged to compromise no longer have to. During the Reagan and Nixon presidencies, Republicans controlled about half the Senate seats in the states they won. That meant there were Democrats representing states that preferred Republicans at the presidential level. That encouraged compromise. A senator needed to show his voters who did not share his ideology that he was not abandoning them. But that pressure has disappeared. During Bill Clinton's term, two-thirds of the senators from states Clinton carried were also Democrats. Under President George W. Bush, that share became three-fourths. Now, under President Obama, Democrats hold 83 percent of the Senate seats in the states he won.

Democrats are sure to lose seats in 2014, and they may lose control of the Senate, which should be the ultimate rebuke of their party and their president. But since elections are increasingly driven by structural rather than policy differences, the incentive will be for Democrats to hew to the structure, not bend to some new policy view ratified by the last election. The 2016 map favors Democrats the way the 2014 map favors Republicans. Republican senators are on the ballot on blue or purple states like Wisconsin, Ohio, Florida, and Pennsylvania. Democrats will be encouraged to block Republican ideas and blame them as Obama-hating. In 2016 Democrats will run as the antidote to GOP overreach in a presidential election where members of the Democratic coalition turn out in greater numbers than they do during a midterm. If the first viable female nominee is on their ticket, that will help Democrats even more.

It won't just be Democrats with an inclination to keep things bottled up in Washington. Republican senators facing re-election will have to fear challenges from the Tea Party on the right. One GOP strategist is advising every Republican up for re-election in 2016 to plan for a primary. That will not encourage Republicans running in competitive states to take vast risks for the sake of bipartisanship, particularly if the Democrats are being difficult.

Hope doesn't have much of a chance in that environment. An even stronger version of this hope was on display at the Harkin Steak Fry in 2006 when President Obama was the keynote speaker. Iowa was a spiritual birthplace for Obama, since his victory in its state caucus boosted his chances. He went on to win the state twice in the general elections. But that hope was dashed, too. As I was typing this piece and making plane reservations to bring my tank of air to join the Hillary throng, an email came in from Gallup about the Iowa Senate race: "As a key U.S. Senate race unfolds in Iowa ... Obama's approval rating among Iowans for the first half of the year stood at 38 percent, five percentage points below the national average and the lowest rating Gallup has measured in Iowa during his presidency."

At an Iowa campaign rally, presidential candidates present a world of easy possibility. Solutions promise to be effective, and entrenched opposition is easy to vanquish. The stump speeches are infectious, because at a time of high cynicism, people allow themselves the chance to believe that it really could be like this. Perhaps Sen. Rand Paul or Gov. Chris Christie or Hillary Clinton can pull this off. Every presidential season the feeling that the right candidate can change things gets replanted like a field of corn. But the way elections are heading, the idea that salvation can arise from an Iowa cornfield is starting to feel like something that only makes sense in Hollywood.

Washington Post blog: WorldViews: "Obama's new man in Moscow doesn't do Twitter"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Michael Birnbaum

September 8, 2014, 12:36 p.m. EDT

MOSCOW – The old U.S. ambassador to Russia was a firecracker on Twitter, taking on critics and offering a view of Moscow life that was unusually unfiltered for a diplomat.

The new U.S. ambassador – who on Monday presented his credentials to the Russian Foreign Ministry – doesn't even have a Twitter account.

John Tefft's arrival in Moscow last week as Washington's new envoy here filled a post that had been empty since February, bringing a seasoned and traditional hand to the embassy at the time of the worst relations between Russia and the United States since the Cold War.

Tefft's predecessor, Stanford academic Michael McFaul, 50, had been President Obama's chief Russia advisor before his arrival in Moscow in January 2012, just as the protests against then-Prime Minister Vladimir Putin were reaching their zenith. McFaul dived in to the job with a glee and openness that befit his cheerful character and academic past – but it unsettled Kremlin policymakers who said he was in town to stoke a revolution.

When critics attacked him on Twitter, he was ready to fire right back, countering a Russian Foreign Ministry offensive against him in spring 2013 with a series of protestations. He was – and remains – happy to engage with both supporters and detractors on the messaging service.

The openness and speed of McFaul's Twitter communications were unusual for a U.S. ambassador, whose every public utterance is typically vetted and filtered in advance by the State Department. But when McFaul arrived in Moscow, then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was pushing her envoys to use Twitter to reach new audiences in the countries where they were the public face of America. McFaul was happy to comply.

Clinton's "message was that our diplomacy goes beyond meeting with our counterparts in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs," he said in a January interview with The Washington Post, shortly before he announced he would be departing after the conclusion of the Winter Olympics held in Sochi, Russia.

That experiment with Twitter may have backfired in Russia -- and Tefft's appearance in Moscow is a reversion to a more traditional form of diplomacy that may play better in the Kremlin's gilded hallways than McFaul's ever did.

Tefft, born in 1949, is a career diplomat and former ambassador to Ukraine, Georgia and Lithuania who was brought out of retirement for the Moscow job. He has a far different style, one more accustomed to working the quiet channels of diplomacy than punching out pithy 140-character observations on his State Department BlackBerry. And his arrival is a retrenchment of sorts for the Obama administration, which is gambling that his conservative approach to diplomacy will play better for getting business done The embassy has said that if ever his words appear on Twitter, they will come over the official embassy account, and he won't be the one doing the tweeting.

After he presented his credentials on Monday, he said that "as Ambassador, I have two main responsibilities. First and foremost, I am here to promote, defend, and explain the interests of the United States. Secondly, I am here to help my own government understand Russia's goals and perspectives.

"America's relations with Russia have a long and complex history. We have been allies, and we have been adversaries. We have cooperated and we have clashed. One thing, however that has never changed is America's enduring commitment to engage with Russia, its people, and its government," he said.

His words were published on Facebook.

But he wasn't the man who did the typing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press: "University of Miami President Shalala to Retire"

By Tim Reynolds

September 8, 2014, 12:12 p.m. EDT

CORAL GABLES, Fla. (AP) -- University of Miami President Donna Shalala plans to step down in 2015, ending a tenure in which she raised the school's profile but also guided the athletic department through a controversial move to the Atlantic Coast Conference and a scandal involving a rogue former booster.

Shalala, 73, told the school's board of trustees of her decision Monday. She took over at Miami in 2001 after serving eight years as Health and Human Services Secretary under President Bill Clinton, with whom she remains close.

Shalala's goal was simple: She wanted to make Miami "the next great American university" and seemed to succeed in raising the school's profile. Miami is now consistently ranked among the nation's top 50 colleges and universities. The school's first "Momentum" fundraising campaign under her watch raised $1.4 billion, and the second such drive is on the way to a goal of another $1.6 billion.

The school's next fiscal year begins June 1. It's expected a new president could be in place by then.

Shalala also has been the chancellor at the University of Wisconsin and the president of Hunter College. She has received the Presidential Medal of Freedom from President George W. Bush, is a recipient of the Nelson Mandela Award for Health and Human Rights, and was a Peace Corps volunteer in Iran in the 1960s. She once made national headlines for foiling an attempted robbery at an ATM from which she had just withdrawn cash in Washington. She still teaches classes at Miami.

Sports has long been a major part of Shalala's life, and it was a major part of her Miami presidency as well. On the day she announced she was Coral Gables-bound in 2000, Shalala referenced the Hurricanes' football team, saying that she knows why the program had long been a perennial power.

"They know how to recruit," Shalala said.

Now, Miami will be recruiting her replacement.

She has long been a regular at Miami games, no matter the sport. She's been to World Cup matches, thrown out ceremonial first pitches at Olympic softball games and served on the board of directors for the U.S. Soccer Foundation. She enjoys telling the story of her first Little League coach when she was growing up in the Cleveland area - a man by name of George Steinbrenner, who would eventually own the New York Yankees.

It may be fitting that Shalala's best-known legacies at the school will be tied to athletics, even though the school's reputation and its medical and research reach grew considerably under her leadership.

The Hurricanes' basketball teams play in an on-campus building now, the Bank United Center, the construction of which she spearheaded. Some moves from her presidency made were far more controversial, including Miami's part of the ACC expansion in 2003 and the school's decision to move home football games from a decaying (and now demolished) Orange Bowl for Sun Life Stadium, home of the Miami Dolphins.

Football won its fifth national championship a few months after Shalala's inauguration as Miami's fifth president. It has not won a title since, and the program is beginning to emerge from a cloud that hung over it for years after a former booster and convicted Ponzi scheme architect went public with tales of lavish spending on athletes in violation of NCAA rules.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The NCAA investigation ended last year, but not before Shalala - who was complimentary of the NCAA for much of the process, until it became known that investigators working the case were breaking their association's own rules - lashed out at the governing body for college sports and demanded that Miami be treated more fairly.

"Her leadership throughout this chapter was amazing," football coach Al Golden said when the investigation ended last year.

Shalala is a 1962 graduate of Western College for Women, got her doctorate in 1970 from Syracuse and holds more than 50 honorary degrees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/11/2015 12:15:19 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.11.15
Attachments:	6.11.15 H4A Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 11, 2015

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

ABC and CBS did not report on 2016 issues. NBC had a brief segment on Jeb Bush's campaign staff shakeup. Bush tries to downplay the changes in top campaign positions. He remains a favorite among many Republicans; however, he is not the front runner anymore. Reporters claim that changes to campaign staff is symbolizing campaign weaknesses.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 5

Hillary Clinton's Hard Choice: Her First Instagram Post // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 10, 2015 5

Hillary Clinton win could mean an end to paid speeches by Bill // WaPo // Rosalind S. Helderman – June 10, 2015 5

Clinton far out front of rivals from both parties in fielding army of organizers across US // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 10, 2015 6

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 8

Scott Wong (6/10/15, 9:43 am) - House will vote Friday on #TPA, say Rs emerging from GOP conf meeting 8

Reid Epstein (6/10/15, 9:52 am) - Inbox: Whole slew of NH Republicans send an open letter to Fox & RNC calling for wholesale changes to 2016 debate format..... 8

Lis Smith (6/10/15, 10:51 am) - Corrigan Brothers, who penned song about @BarackObama, now on the @GovernorOMalley train. Listen here: https://soundcloud.com/the-irish-times/martin-omalley-song ... 8

Azi (6/10/15, 4:27 pm) - attending @HillaryClinton's rally? Bill de Blasio: "No .. I'm waiting to hear ... her larger vision to addressing income inequality."..... 8

Azi (6/10/15, 4:28 pm) - "I've always liked what i heard from Bernie Sanders" — @BilldeBlasio..... 9

Maggie Haberman (6/10/15, 9:42 pm) - Meanwhile, as the turmoil-in-Jebland stories roll on 9

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 9

How the $15 minimum wage could become a new dividing line in the 2016 primary // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund & Lydia DePillis – June 10, 2015 9

Hillary's lurch to the left has been greatly exaggerated // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 10, 2015.. 10

Bill Clinton Likely to Stop Accepting Pay for Speeches If Hillary Clinton Is Elected President // WSJ // James V. Grimaldi – June 10, 2015..... 12

Clinton Foundation Helps the Poor // WSJ // Donna Shalala – June 10, 2015..... 14

Clinton student loan reform plan has Warren stamp // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015..... 14

Hillary's Game-Changing Voting Reform // Politico // Michael Waldman – June 10, 2015..... 17

Hillary digital push highlights organizing before NYC rally // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 10, 2015 19

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

J Street poll: Jewish Americans favor Hillary over Jeb // Politico // Nick Gass – June 10, 2015..... 21

Every wedding should have a Hillary Clinton Bible reading // Politico // Kate Glassman Bennett – June 11, 2015 21

Domestic Worker Groups Announce Alliance At Clinton Global Initiative Conference // HuffPo // Samantha Lachman – June 10, 2015..... 22

Journalists Meet With Clinton Campaign Officials Over Access Concerns // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – June 10, 2015 24

New York's Forgotten Island Shrugs At Hillary Clinton's Big 2016 Debut // HuffPo // Scott Conroy – June 10, 2015 25

The selective liberalism of Hillary Clinton // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 10, 2015..... 27

Bill Clinton Says He'll Nix Paid Speeches If Hillary Wins // NBC News // Andrea Mitchell and Cassandra Vinograd – June 11, 2015..... 31

Hillary Clinton and the New Politics of $15 // The Nation // John Nichols – June 10, 2015..... 31

Bill Clinton Says Hillary Win Could Change His Philanthropy Role // Bloomberg // Margaret Talev – June 10, 2015 34

Hillary Clinton Needs a Do-Over // RealClearPolitics // Jonah Goldberg – June 10, 2015..... 35

Check Out Hillary Clinton's First Instagram // TIMES // Olivia Waxman – June 10, 2015..... 36

Hillary Clinton launches Instagram account // CBS News // Hannah Fraser-Chanpong – June 10, 2015 37

Hillary Clinton joins Instagram with a photo of her red, white and blue pantsuits // Mashable // Bryian Ries – June 10, 2015 37

Parties set events; Democrats draw Clinton to dinner // North West Arkansas Gazette // Michael R. Wickline - June 11, 2015 38

It's official: Hillary Clinton's logo is actually perfect // Quartz // Annalisa Merelli – June 10, 2015 39

Hillary to be honored at Wildlife gala after making // NY Post // Geoff Earle – June 10, 2015..... 41

Bill Clinton contradicts Hillary on email claims // Fox News – June 10, 2015..... 41

De Blasio likely to skip Hillary Clinton's campaign launch // Crain's New York // Andrew Hawkins – June 10, 2015 42

Democrats Line Up Hillary Clinton For Jefferson-Jackson Dinner // Talk Business – June 10, 2015 43

Clinton Has Edge Among Mass. Voters; Gov. Baker Remains Popular // WBUR // Fred Thys – June 10, 2015 44

No blueprint on cutting college debt // Boston Globe // Tracy Jan – June 11, 2015..... 45

Clinton plans 'Launch Party' in Concord during Monday visit // WMUR // John DiStaso – June 10, 2015 48

How Huma Abedin became Hillary Clinton's confidante and 'translator' // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 10, 2015 49

Clinton Foundation donors have a bribery problem // The Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – June 10, 2015 50

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 52

O'MALLEY..... 52

Martin O'Malley Backs Controversial Cybersecurity Bill // US News // Tom Risen – June 10, 2015 52

2016 hopeful O'Malley steps out on cybersecurity // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 10, 2015..... 53

SANDERS..... 55

Bernie Sanders Denies Internet Claim on Dual Israeli Citizenship // NYT // Gerry Mullany – June 10, 2015 55

De Blasio to Skip Clinton Rally, Praises Rival Sanders // WSJ // Erica Orden – June 10, 2015 56

Sanders wants war spending paid for // The Hill // Jordain Carney – June 10, 2015..... 57

Bernie Sanders, Gun Nut // Slate // Mark Joseph Stern – June 10, 2015 58

Lead, follow or get out of the way : Bernie Sanders opts for latter in Islamic State fight // The Washington Times // S.A. Miller – June 10, 2015..... 59

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHAFEE..... 60

Chafee: Hillary is 'more like the Republicans' // The Hill // Jesse Byrnes – June 10, 2015..... 60

The hidden history behind Lincoln Chafee's metric proposal // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 10, 2015 61

OTHER..... 64

Clinton, O'Malley , Sanders and Webb to attend Iowa dinner // AP – June 10, 2015..... 64

Warren shames both parties on college affordability // Politico // Allie Grasgreen – June 10, 2015 64

GOP..... 67

BUSH..... 67

How Jeb Bush's campaign ran off course before it even began // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe and Robert Costa – June 10, 2015 68

Jeb Bush's 'It's June!' argument has two major flaws // WaPo // Philip Bump – June 10, 2015..... 72

Jeb Bush say s U.S. bank rules may have contributed to systemic risks // Reuters // Reuters – June 9, 2015 73

Jeb Bush After Shake-Up: 'I Don't Read the Polls' // NBC News // Benjy Sarlin – June 10, 2015 74

Jeb: It's too early for poll-watching // The Hill // Jonathan Easley - June 10, 2015..... 75

Jeb Bush is a compassionless conservative: His "Scarlet Letter" law was even worse than it sounds // Salon // Katie McDonough – June 10, 2015..... 76

Hillary Clinton v s. Jeb Bush: A Boring Disaster Waiting to Happen // The Blaze // Chris Markowski – June 10, 2015 78

Tom Coburn on Jeb Bush: 'His last name will kill 47 percent of the votes' // The Washington Examiner // Philip Klein – June 10, 2015..... 80

Shaming Unwed Moms Was the Law in Jeb Bush's Florida // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodroff – June 10, 2015 80

Jeb Bush to visit Jimmy Fallon on 'Tonight Show' next week // LA Times // Meredith Blake – June 10, 2015 81

RUBIO..... 82

Florida Poll: Rubio Gaining on Jeb // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 10, 2015 82

PAUL..... 83

At GOP fundraiser in Mary land, Rand Paul decries racial injustice, champions diversity // WaPo // Ovetta Wiggins – June 10, 2015..... 83

WALKER..... 84

Walker makes case for education reforms nationwide // AP – June 10, 2015..... 84

Walker: We changed broken education system // The Des Moines Register // Scott Walker – June 10, 2015 86

Scott Walker Courting Mitt Romney Donors After Slamming Candidate Romney // Bloomberg News // John McCormick – June 10, 2015..... 87

A teacher central to Scott Walker's education pitch would like him to stop using her story // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 10, 2015..... 89

Wisconsinites Blast Scott Walker's Stadium Deal As 'Outrageous' // Think Progress // Alice Ollstein – June 10, 2015 90

Scott Walker To Remov e Waiting Period For Wisconsin Gun Purchases // Breitbart // Awr Hawkins – June 10, 2015 91

CRUZ..... 92

"If y ou live by the pen, you die by the pen" // WaPo // James Hohmann – June 10, 2015..... 92

Ted Cruz team looks beyond Iowa, New Hampshire // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 10, 2015 94

Ted Cruz Going After the Libertarian-Hawk Vote // Reason // Matt Welch – June 10, 2015..... 96

Ted Cruz And The False Narrative Of Christian Persecution // Forbes // Rick Ungar – June 10, 2015 96

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHRISTIE..... 98

In Washington Speech, Chris Christie Sounds Like He's Ready to Run // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 10, 2015 98

Court Ruling Removes a Bump From Chris Christie's Path // NYT – June 10, 2015..... 99

N.J. Gov. Chris Christie Uses Court Pension Win in Fundraising Pitch // WSJ // Heather Haddon – June 10, 2015 100

Christie faults GOP for sounding unwelcoming to Latinos // AP // Luis Alonso Lugo & Jill Colvin – June 10, 2015 101

For Chris Christie, 'good' news is relative // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 10, 2015..... 102

PERRY..... 103

Perry's cherry-picked claim that America would have lost 400,000 jobs without Texas // WaPo // Michelle Ye Hee Lee – June 10, 2015..... 103

Rick Perry Tries Again // HuffPo // Chris Weigant – June 10, 2015 105

The Legal Trouble That Could Haunt Rick Perry's Presidential Campaign // Mother Jones // Patrick Caldwell – June 10, 2015 108

Perry Switches On Trade: TPP's Become 'An Animal' That 'Needs To Go Away' // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 10, 2015..... 109

GRAHAM..... 110

The most interesting candidate you're not paying any attention to // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 10, 2015 110

Lindsey Graham to Sean Hannity: Knock it off // Politico // Nick Gass – June 10, 2015..... 112

Lindsey Graham's abortion push could imperil fellow GOPers // Politico // Burgess Everett – June 10, 2015 113

SANTORUM..... 116

Rick Santorum is getting lost in the growing GOP pack // LA Times // David Horsey – June 10, 2015 116

HUCKABEE..... 117

Co-Author Of Mike Huckabee Books Was Accused Of Child Molestation In Two Legal Cases // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski – June 10, 2015 117

Huckabee: Fox News Staff Thought I Was A "Psychopath" For Owning An AR-15 // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 10, 2015..... 119

KASICH..... 120

Kasich Leads Field In Ohio // Public Policy Polling – June 10, 2015 120

CARSON..... 121

Ben Carson: Let's spy on government workers // MSNBC // Jane Timm – June 10, 2015..... 121

Carson: Gay rights aren't the same as civil rights // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe – June 10, 2015..... 122

Carson identifies as 'pragmatic dove' for conservative voters // The Des Moines Register – June 10, 2015 123

FIORINA..... 125

Fiorina's campaign-trail attacks leave out her own ties to Clinton Carly Fiorina // LAT // Joseph Tanfani – June 11, 2015 125

Carly Fiorina Steps Up Campaign Against Hillary Clinton // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 10, 2015 127

TRUMP..... 128

OTHER..... 128

Republicans Still Playing Catch-Up on the Digital Campaign Trail // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 10, 2015 128

New Hampshire Republicans Urge Networks to Alter Debate Criteria // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 10, 2015 131

Their state economies may lag, but Republican hopefuls still brag // Reuters // Andy Sullivan – June 10, 2015 131

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Polling Memo: Clinton 'Clearly Unpopular' Among Battleground State Independents // GOP.com – June 10, 2015 131

GOP ready to counter Hillary Clinton's speech // The Washington Examiner //David Drucker – June 10, 2015 133

TOP NEWS..... 135

DOMESTIC..... 135

Senate GOP denies funds for lawyers for immigrant children // AP // Andrew Taylor – June 10, 2015 135

Republicans take aim at IRS budget // Politico // Rachael Bade – June 10, 2015..... 136

EPA takes crucial step toward climate rules for airplanes // Politico // Alex Guillén – June 10, 2015 138

Senate shows Ex-Im support in test vote // The Hill // Kevin Cirilli – June 10, 2015..... 142

INTERNATIONAL..... 142

Hackers May Have Obtained Names of Chinese With Ties to U.S. Government // NYT // - David Sanger & Julie Davis – June 10, 2015..... 142

U.S. Expands ISIS Involvement, Sending Up To 450 Military Personnel To New Training Site In Iraq // Huffington Post – June 10, 2015..... 145

American Keith Broomfield killed fighting in Syria // CNN // Elise Labott – June 10, 2015..... 147

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 147

Jeb Bush's Learning Curve on Russia // NYT // Carol Giacomo – June 10, 2015..... 147

Jeb Bush's recipe for a better society: Shame // WaPo // Catherine Rampell – June 10, 2015..... 149

Back Clinton for voting rights // The Quad-City Times // Elaine Baxter - June 10, 2015 151

Bernie Sanders Was Just Another Hippie Rummaging Through My Mom's Fridge // The New Republic // Chelsea Summers – June 10, 2015..... 151

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton's Hard Choice: Her First Instagram Post // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 10, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's first post on Instagram isn't a picture of her on the campaign trail or of supporters gathered at a house party. It's a play on her memoir, "Hard Choices."

The "hard choice" in this case? What to wear. The photo features a rack full of red, white and blue jackets of the pants suits Mrs. Clinton is known for.

The clothes hang in front of a sunny window presumably in Mrs. Clinton's home in Chappaqua, N.Y. A needlepoint pillow and oil painting appear in the background.

Mrs. Clinton has had some fun with social media since she joined Twitter in 2013. Then her avatar featured her image as secretary of state, in dark sunglasses on a military aircraft. Her bio, until she declared her candidacy, read "TBD." (Now it reads "Wife, grandma, women + kids advocate, FLOTUS, Senator, SecState, hair icon, pants suit aficionado, 2016 presidential candidate.")

The tongue-in-cheek Instagram debut, like most things Mrs. Clinton does, prompted a divisive reaction. In four hours, the post had more than 6,600 “likes.” But some commentators used the post as an outlet to attack Mrs. Clinton over her handling of the 2012 attacks on the American mission in Benghazi and her personal wealth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton win could mean an end to paid speeches by Bill // WaPo // Rosalind S. Helderman – June 10, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton might quit his lucrative career as a paid speaker -- if his wife is elected president.

In an interview conducted with Bloomberg TV Wednesday on stage at a meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative in Denver, Clinton said he would likely step off the lecture circuit that has earned him more than $100 million since he left the White House in 2001 if Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the presidency.

"I don't think so," he said when asked if he would continue to give paid speeches. "Once you get to be president, then you're just making a daily story."

He also offered a robust defense of the foundation that has been his life's work since his presidency ended, and which has been under intense scrutiny during the first phase of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

Clinton said he would like to remain involved with the organization as long as possible during the campaign, to ensure it raises the money necessary to fund its global charitable work, but it would up to his wife whether he would stay with the foundation if she is elected.

"I believe if you have been president, and the current president of either party asks you to do anything, if in good conscience you can do it, you should do it. Now that's the truth, quite apart from our being husband and wife," he said. "That will be not an easy decision, should she be elected president. And she will have to decide what's my highest and best use, including being around to buck her up every morning."

Clinton blamed political reporters for the increase in attention on donors to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation and whether they may have been trying to curry favor with the former president and his wife through their contributions. He said the organization has turned down money and avoided work in some areas because of its anti-corruption policies.

"If you're a political reporter primarily, or you're a business reporter you tend to see -- tend to see the world through that lens. And it's hard to imagine that there are businesses and individuals that contribute money for things that have nothing to do with politics," he said.

"Has anybody proved that we did anything objectionable? No. Have we done a lot of good things with this money? Yes," he said.

Clinton far out front of rivals from both parties in fielding army of organizers across US // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 10, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton has launched a sweeping national jobs program — for her presidential campaign.

In the eight weeks since she announced her run for the White House, Clinton's campaign has deployed roughly 100 organizers nationwide and opened 15 offices in early-voting states. That's far more than any other candidate of either party in the 2016 contest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Iowa, Clinton now has at least 27 paid organizers — three times as many as any of the roughly dozen Republicans in the race. Her campaign has hired at least one staff member in every state, the District of Columbia and the U.S. territories.

She has two regional directors in the reliably Democratic state of California and even put one person on the payroll in Wyoming, a state that has not voted for a Democratic nominee in more than 50 years.

The overwhelming favorite for her party's nomination, Clinton doesn't necessarily need the volunteers now. But her team, worried she will lack the power of a competitive primary to energize the core group of supporters she will need for the general election, has gone on an early hiring spree rare in presidential politics.

"You can't get to a point where the polls are tight and say, 'Oh, wow, we need to do some organizing,'" said Marlon Marshall, Clinton's director of state campaigns and political engagement. "These organizing relationships will create a sense of urgency to let people know why we have to do this work now."

The effort isn't cheap: Senior campaign aides have set a goal of raising $100 million to pay for Clinton's primary campaign.

Her campaign has organized 320 house parties, attracting almost 11,000 people. This weekend, her appearance at an event in Iowa will be streamed to a gathering in every congressional district nationwide. "At this point, it's more about finding people and getting them involved then convincing them to back Clinton," said Scott Hogan, a former gun control activist hired by Clinton's campaign to organize voters in deeply Democratic Minnesota.

At a meeting in Mankato on Tuesday, Hogan wanted to know why his batch of potential volunteers was "ready for Hillary." He didn't get the answer he wanted, but it was enough to get the conversation started.

"To tell you the truth, I like Bernie Sanders for just his honesty, but I don't think he's electable," said Gina Casey, 59, sitting at a conference table at a Democratic Party office. "So, I'm trying to love Hillary and I need to know more."

Hogan made the pitch for his boss over Sanders, the independent Vermont senator mounting a longshot challenge for the Democratic nomination.

"This campaign is about you," Hogan told Casey and other Democrats in the small group gathered on a hot night. "It's not about me. It's not about Hillary."

Clinton's campaign staff takes great pains to keep a focus on the primary campaign, despite her crushing advantage. Should the Democratic race somehow become competitive, Minnesota — voting in the first big set of primaries after the first four states — could be decisive.

But if Clinton runs away with the Democratic prize, and if Minnesota votes for the Democratic nominee as it has done since 1972, the supporters Hogan is organizing now will become valuable for raising money, making calls and traveling to neighboring battleground states such as Iowa and Wisconsin.

The staff working in reliably Democratic states will be redeployed to battleground areas at the end of this month. The goal is to leave behind engaged volunteer networks to organize small-dollar fundraisers and make sure

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is represented at local events.

Clinton aides said the early investment will pay dividends in the final weeks of the campaign. Data analyzed by President Barack Obama's campaign showed a direct correlation between supporter enthusiasm in the last six weeks before the election and when local operations began in their area, according to former staffers.

"The earlier you start, the larger your volunteer structure will be the last two weeks or last month of the campaign, which is ultimately when that investment pays off," said Mitch Stewart, who oversaw battleground states for Obama's campaigns and advised the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary.

In Mankato, the gathering was half political strategy session, half team-building retreat.

They each wrote a word that described her candidacy on a Post-it note and stuck it to a handmade poster of her campaign logo. Hogan encouraged them to post their support on social media, directed them to Clinton's website and promised to follow up. The meeting ended with a group photo.

At one table, a group of women had a suggestion for Hogan: Farmfest.

Before the meeting, they hadn't thought seriously about putting together a booth for Clinton at the three-day agricultural trade show in August, a must-attend event for political candidates in this part of the state.

"Next year will be the more important time to be out there," said Lori Sellner, 46, of Sleepy Eye, Minnesota. "This is just earlier than we've seen before."

SOCIAL MEDIA

Scott Wong (6/10/15, 9:43 am) - House will vote Friday on #TPA, say Rs emerging from GOP conf meeting

Reid Epstein (6/10/15, 9:52 am) - Inbox: Whole slew of NH Republicans send an open letter to Fox & RNC calling for wholesale changes to 2016 debate format

Lis Smith (6/10/15, 10:51 am) - Corrigan Brothers, who penned song about @BarackObama , now on the @GovernorOMalley train. Listen here: https://soundcloud.com/the-irish-times/martin-omalley-song ...

Azi (6/10/15, 4:27 pm) - attending @HillaryClinton's rally? Bill de Blasio: "No .. I'm waiting to hear ... her larger vision to addressing income inequality."

Azi (6/10/15, 4:28 pm) - "I've always liked what I heard from Bernie Sanders" — @BilldeBlasio.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

How the $15 minimum wage could become a new dividing line in the 2016 primary // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund & Lydia DePillis – June 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An unexpected thing happened over the weekend. Activists and union members convening in Detroit to rally for a $15 hourly minimum wage got an unexpected call from Hillary Rodham Clinton, who addressed the crowd by phone.

The former secretary of state did not endorse a $15 minimum wage. But she suggested her allegiance is with the efforts of the rallying workers. "All of you should not have to march in the streets to get a living wage, but thank you for marching in the streets to get that living wage," she said.

Two of her rivals for the Democratic nomination, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, have already embraced a $15 minimum wage. And so Clinton's decision to call the fast-food workers shows not only the potential power of organized labor in the 2016 campaign, but the way that the $15 minimum wage may become a kind of litmus test for Democratic candidates.

Asked about Clinton's position, the campaign provided the following statement: "She strongly supports workers in the fast-food industry in cities across the country mobilizing to fight for a living wage. In the coming weeks, she will lay out her specific plans for increasing wages."

The level of the minimum wage could prove to be an important theme in the Democratic primary.

"We need more cities and states to follow the lead of Los Angeles and St. Louis and New York," Clinton told the fast-food workers. The Los Angeles City Council recently voted to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour. The mayors of New York and St. Louis have proposed eventually raising the minimum wage to $15, as well. Other successes for the movement include San Francisco and Seattle.

Workers at the convention were gratified by Clinton's measured support but said they were aware of the political constraints she confronts as a candidate.

"I honestly believe that Hillary Clinton is trying to use her voice to back up her campaign more than she is to back up our campaign," said Ashona Osborne, 23, an Arby's employee from Pittsburgh. "It's great that she's supporting our movement, but we have to keep in mind that she's willing to do whatever she can to get more votes."

The minimum wage is not the only major economic issue on which Clinton has not outlined a clear position. As Dan Balz reported for The Washington Post over the weekend, Clinton has said little about banking regulation and free trade.

Labor activists oppose the trade deal the Obama administration is negotiating in the Pacific, which Clinton supervised and advocated for as secretary of state. Recently, though, she's stuck to generalities about fairness, workers' rights and economic growth.

Sanders said in a statement that he thought the federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour was "a starvation wage." He's argued it should eventually be raised to $15 an hour. "That is what I believe every candidate for president should say," he said.

"We don't know where Secretary Clinton stands on the minimum wage," said Haley Morris, a spokeswoman for O'Malley. She noted that O'Malley signed a bill raising Maryland's minimum wage to $10.10 an hour by 2018 while he was in office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are reasons that Clinton might hesitate to support a minimum wage of $15 an hour. Most economic research on the minimum wage has focused on the small changes that states and cities have made in the past. No one is sure what will happen if the federal minimum wage more than doubles from its current level. Dylan Matthews has argued in Wonkblog that a $15 minimum wage would be too risky, while Demos's Matt Bruenig gave a rebuttal.

According to some experts, dealing with the issue on a local level might be best anyway, since the cost of living and the average wage vary from city to city.

Clinton is expected to give a series of substantive speeches on policy beginning Saturday in New York.

Hillary's lurch to the left has been greatly exaggerated // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 10, 2015

For days now, a noisy battle has reverberated throughout the Beltway Pundit Thunderdome. Is Hillary Clinton's campaign too focused on winning Obama coalition voters, at the exclusion of everyone else? Could that endanger her candidacy? Wouldn't winning that way imperil her ability to govern and tear the country asunder?

The New York Times kicked things off with an article quoting anxious Dems (is there any other kind?) floating these frightful questions. David Brooks and Ron Fournier added to the hand-wringing. In response, Ed Kilgore, Paul Waldman, Jonathan Chait, Ruth Marcus and others noted that due to deeper polarization and demographic change, the electorate and map are vastly different today.

I thought I'd go through Clinton's stances on the issues, to see if that sheds more light on what she's really up to. Short version: Clinton is indeed ministering to Obama coalition voter groups — minorities, millennials, college educated whites. But nonetheless, she's thus far campaigning like a mainstream Democrat. In fact, those things are now two sides of the same coin. Meanwhile, very few of her positions thus far preclude reaching beyond those groups.

Immigration: Clinton supports a path to citizenship. That has majority support nationally. While many note she suggested she'd go further than Obama's executive actions on deportations, in reality she has only proposed building on them very modestly, if at all. Would that alienate other voter groups? Maybe, but national polling is mixed on executive action.

Even so, because the Democratic Party is far more unified on immigration than ever, partly because of its increased reliance on Latinos, backing executive action is a must in a nominee. (Indeed, Martin O'Malley is attacking her from the left on immigration.) On this issue, she's a mainstream Dem.

Gay rights: Clinton's shift in favor of gay marriage occurred relatively late. But so did that of many, many other leading Dems. It would now be unthinkable for a Dem nominee not to support marriage equality. Yes, former president Clinton was a relative troglodyte on the issue. But this only underscores how rapid the cultural shift on it has been — forcing both parties to play varying degrees of catch-up. Indeed, it now has broad majority support across the country and may soon receive protection as a Constitutional right. So it's hard to see how favoring gay marriage precludes reaching beyond the core Dem coalition.

Criminal justice reform: It's true that Clinton called for an end to the era of mass incarceration that her husband helped usher in. While that is partly about speaking to minority voters, the cultural shift among the broader electorate since the 1990s on crime has been so pronounced that criminal justice reform is now a bipartisan issue.

Voting rights: Clinton's embrace of automatic, universal voter registration is certainly an example of her speaking directly to the Obama coalition. In fairness, this could alienate some groups outside that coalition. But absent good polling on this, it's hard to know for sure. It's possible, for instance, that a key Hillary target, non-college white women — particularly single ones, who tend to vote more sporadically — might support it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Climate change: Yes, Clinton has pledged to protect Obama's climate actions. It's also true that some Dems in more conservative states have balked at his climate agenda. But even this is starting to change: Gary Peters won a Michigan Senate seat last year with an aggressive climate message. It's also true her stance might alienate some blue collar whites in the Rust Belt. But we still have no idea how much of an emphasis Clinton will put on climate issues. Meanwhile, Clinton actually is seen by advocates as insufficiently hawkish on climate.

It's hard to see a Dem winning the nomination without adopting an agenda that acknowledges global warming as a major challenge, making this yet another area where Clinton is basically a mainstream Dem.

Minimum wage: Clinton supports hiking the federal minimum wage to $10.10 per hour, another mainstream Dem position that has majority support. But she has refrained from endorsing the $15-per-hour goal of a burgeoning lefty movement.

Other economic issues: Clinton has not yet said whether she backs a financial transaction tax or breaking up the big banks, or whether she opposes the Trans Pacific Partnership — three of the most important priorities of the Elizabeth Warren wing of the party. There are reasons to think she could stop short of embracing the first two. She very well might back the TPP, if its labor and environmental protections are given the thumbs up by experts.

On taxes, Clinton may mostly stick to supporting the sort of loophole-closings and tax hikes on inherited wealth and capital gains that Obama has called for. She may well stick to a slate of policies she's already come out for — ones that strengthen the safety net, foster family-friendly workplace flexibility, and invest in education and job creation — without backing quite the kind of far-reaching economic agenda some on the left want. This, too, would put her in the Democratic mainstream.

Conclusion: Clinton has shifted to the left on some cultural issues, and that is partly about speaking to the Obama coalition. But this reflects the changing nature of the Democratic Party. Indeed, the party's growing reliance on the Obama coalition is the very reason she's speaking more directly to those voters in the first place. Does that mean the party has moved leftward? Maybe, but on many of these issues, the rest of the country has, too. So none of this necessarily precludes broadening beyond that coalition.

Meanwhile, on economic issues, she has not embraced the Warren-wing agenda in key areas, and the key economic prescriptions she has adopted have broad majority support. Have I mentioned that based on her campaign thus far, Clinton is essentially a mainstream Democrat?

Bill Clinton Likely to Stop Accepting Pay for Speeches If Hillary Clinton Is Elected President // WSJ // James V. Grimaldi – June 10, 2015

Bill Clinton on Wednesday said he likely would stop accepting money for speeches if his wife was elected president, and he gave his most forceful defense to date of fundraising by the Clinton Foundation.

Mr. Clinton's comments, made at a foundation-related event, addressed two of the controversies that have followed the former president and his wife recently: the large sums the Clintons have received for speeches while Hillary Clinton was a likely presidential candidate, and foreign donations to the family's foundation.

Asked by Bloomberg Television whether he would make paid speeches if his wife was elected, Mr. Clinton said, "No, I don't think so…because once you get to be president, then you are just making the daily story."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I will still give speeches, if I’m asked to do so,” without accepting honoraria for them, he said.

Earlier this year, Mr. Clinton said he would continue to make paid speeches during the time his wife is a candidate for office. “I gotta pay our bills,” he told NBC News. ”I also give a lot of it to the foundation every year. You know, we’ve got a lot to do.”

Mr. Clinton on Wednesday said that no donors to the Clinton Foundation ever asked for favors from Mrs. Clinton when she was secretary of state.

“Has anybody proven that we’ve done anything objectionable? No,” said Mr. Clinton, answering his own question. “Have we done a lot of good things with this money? Yes.”

He said Mrs. Clinton’s future wasn't an issue when the Clinton Foundation was created or when he launched the Clinton Global Initiative, one of the foundation’s projects, 10 years ago. “It wasn’t like we were working on the presumption that one day Hillary would be running for president,” Mr. Clinton said.

Mr. Clinton cited a $500,000 donation from Algeria that breached a promise not to accept certain foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served in the state department. He said it was true that Algeria was lobbying the State Department at the time of the donation, but that the two events weren’t related.

Mr. Clinton said the foundation was a “pass-through” for the donation, which went to help aid efforts after the 20120 earthquake in Haiti, and that no overhead was deducted for the foundation.

“There are very few countries in the world I would not accept for help to Haiti,” Mr. Clinton said.

He said there were only a couple of countries from which the foundation turned down money and overall he believes the foundation has performed well. “There may be a thing or two that I would change, but the basic idea is right. I still think it is the right thing to do to solve as many problems a possible” by working with foreign governments, corporations, nongovernmental organizations and charities.

Mr. Clinton’s defense of his charitable work came in media interviews at the fifth Clinton Global Initiative America meeting.

Mr. Clinton also answered questions about what he would do if Mrs. Clinton was elected.

“I believe that if you have been president, and the current president of either party asks you to do anything, you should do it,” Mr. Clinton said. “That will not be an easy decision if she’s elected. She’ll have to decide what is my highest and best use, including to be around to buck her up in the morning.”

However, Mr. Clinton said his wife might not accept all of his advice. “If there is one thing she knows more about than anybody on earth, it is on what subjects I should be listened to and what subjects I shouldn’t,” he said.

He didn't say what would happen to the Clinton Foundation if Mrs. Clinton was serving as president, though he has said in the past that he wanted it to keep operating and raising money. On Wednesday, he said he would stay on the foundation board “for this year, as long as I can.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She's got better judgment about what is the highest and best use for me is," Mr. Clinton said." She's been stuck with it for 40 years."

Clinton Foundation Helps the Poor // WSJ // Donna Shalala – June 10, 2015

I'm just finishing my first week as president of the Clinton Foundation, but I've worked here long enough to know that Kimberley Strassel's "The Clinton 'Charity' Begins at Home" (Potomac Watch, June 5) misses the mark about the foundation and its dedicated, professional staff who any organization in the world would be proud to have.

The foundation is a unique organization that has created a partnership model to tackle our world's biggest challenges. Our senior leadership reflects this collaborative approach, with more than 200 years of management experience in diverse fields including global logistics, international development and finance.

It's true that some at the foundation have worked with President Clinton or Secretary Clinton at other points in their long careers. These are good people, and I am honored to count myself among them. I know from my own experience that people are drawn to positions in public service for the same reason they are drawn to nonprofits like the foundation—they want to make a difference in others' lives. That's what they do every day at the foundation.

To claim that we are only interested in "the occasional good deed" is demonstrably false. The foundation and its affiliates have helped 9.9 million in 70 countries access HIV/AIDS medicines; more than 16 million kids in America get healthier meals at school; and more than 85,000 farmers in Malawi, Rwanda and Tanzania increase their incomes.

Helping people is not only our full-time job—it's a deep passion that burns within everyone who works here.

Clinton student loan reform plan has Warren stamp // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015

On a litmus test issue for liberals, Hillary Clinton's campaign has sought out policy experts with ties to the Massachusetts senator.

In weekly calls and meetings over the past few months, Hillary Clinton's policy team has been soliciting input from policy experts with ties to Sen. Elizabeth Warren, with the goal of making student loan reform the core of Clinton's economic mobility agenda.

The effort to make college more accessible — a litmus test for liberals and key to attracting grassroots support on the left — comes as the Clinton campaign finds itself under increasing pressure to accommodate progressive demands. Yet it also could provide Clinton with a signature domestic policy issue, similar to healthcare for Barack Obama in 2008. With a student debt crisis climbing upwards of $1.2 trillion, Clinton's camp views the issue as one where the former secretary of state could drive the conversation and create a mandate for reform

In one of the clearest signs of the importance the policy team — headed by senior adviser Ann O'Leary — is placing on the issue, student loan reform is expected to be one of the earliest policy roll-outs after Clinton's campaign kick-off Saturday. The campaign is expected to unveil its student loan plans in detail in mid-July, multiple sources said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To the great relief of restive progressives, Clinton's campaign has sought out policy experts with strong ties to Warren, who has crusaded on the issues of making college more affordable and refinancing student loans so that students get the same interest rates on federal loans as banks do on theirs.

Heather McGhee, president of the liberal think tank Demos, has discussed the issue directly with Hillary Clinton, sources said. McGhee's think tank is aligned with Warren, whose daughter, Amelia Warren Tyagi, serves as chairman of the board.

The Clinton campaign has also been seeking advice from Rohit Chopra, the top student loan official at the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, who was hired by Warren when she launched the agency. Chopra remains close with Warren, who recently endorsed him as her top candidate to replace Ben Lawsky as the next New York state superintendent of financial services, after his name was floated in the press.

Other experts who have also been speaking regularly with O'Leary and her team, sources said, include Mark Huelsman, a senior policy analyst at Demos; economist Gene Sperling; James Kvaal, who was Obama's policy director in the 2012 election; and longtime Clinton advisor Neera Tanden, president of the Center for American Progress.

None of the policy details have been finalized, and it's still unclear how Clinton plans to pay for any of the proposals currently being discussed.

But on the table is a plan to support debt-free college — including reducing the cost of attendance. That goes beyond what either of Clinton's Democratic opponents, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders or former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, have discussed when addressing the issue of debt-free college. Sanders has used it to mean simply covering the cost of tuition, and O'Malley has focused more on capping student loan payments.

It's not clear yet exactly what form Clinton's debt-free college proposal will take — whether students will pay based on a percentage of their income, or carry some obligation based on their ability to pay.

But covering the cost of attendance is appealing to the progressive policy makers advising Clinton. "The total cost of attendance is a more expansive view of the actual cost of higher education," said Huelsman. "We and other groups have encouraged Clinton to include the cost of attendance as the definition of debt-free college. That would be a big deal."

Also under discussion is allowing students to refinance their loans, an issue that Warren championed in a bill that was defeated last year by Republican opposition. "It would help a lot of middle class families with student debt," said Huelsman.

Outside experts are also pitching the campaign on a bill of rights for student loan carriers, and risk-sharing for colleges, which would mean a school would be penalized if a student defaulted on his or her loans. Both of those are currently under discussion with campaign officials.

"It doesn't hurt to have had a lot of people in the more progressive side of the Democratic party say we want this to be a key issue going into 2016," Huelsman said. "It seems like they want to do something big on this. I'm extremely encouraged."

O'Leary has invited a group of experts to an hours-long briefing in Washington, D.C. on Thursday, at the Center for American Progress, to discuss these issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A campaign spokesman declined to comment about the meeting or the policies under review.

But Clinton officials have made clear even in the ramp up phase of her campaign that the issue is at the forefront of their planned agenda. “What voters are looking for in this election is someone who is going to be a champion for everyday people,” campaign manager Robby Mook said in a CNBC interview in May. “For young people, that’s debt-free college, that is finding that job after you graduate.”

Clinton herself has addressed it in her limited forays on the campaign trail. “We have to deal with the indebtedness — to try to move toward making college as debt-free as possible,” she said last month in Iowa.

Clinton’s most engaged moment during the roundtables she has participated in so far was with Bryce Smith, a 23-year-old Iowan who owns a bowling alley, who told her student loans were harming his ability to access credit for his small business. “I’ve never heard anyone so persuasively link it to the slowdown in business start-ups,” Clinton told him.

She has also complimented Obama’s $60 billion community college plan, which would provide students with two years of free community college. Her plan, however, is expected to be more expansive and influence more institutions than just community colleges.

Hillary’s Game-Changing Voting Reform // Politico // Michael Waldman – June 10, 2015

last week, in Houston, Texas, Hillary Rodham Clinton denounced the wave of restrictive new voting laws enacted by Republican legislatures around the country. Those of us who aren’t wild about disenfranchising eligible citizens welcomed Clinton’s passionate defense. It’s been years since a major candidate made democracy reform a central issue. But the most important thing about the speech was her embrace of a transformative policy innovation: automatic, universal registration of voters once they turn 18. It’s an idea that’s already begun to gain ground across the country, building on reforms with bipartisan support. Now we have a chance to take it even further.

In a campaign season criticized for a dearth of big new ideas, this one’s a doozy.

Why is it so important? Between a third and a quarter of all eligible Americans remain unregistered and therefore cannot cast a ballot. Automatic, permanent registration as Clinton proposes would add up to 50 million to the rolls. It would cost less than today’s paper-clogged system. And it would curb the potential for fraud. Amid rising political inequality and declining voter interest, this could give the ailing political system a much-needed jolt of citizen energy.

Our ramshackle voter registration system disenfranchises more people by accident than even the harshest new laws do on purpose. To be sure, some people just don’t want to register and never will. Call them the “Don’t vote—it will only encourage them” caucus. But many others fall off the rolls, or become tangled in the mess of the current system. According to a 2012 Pew Center on the States study, 24 million entries are either invalid or inaccurate. Many eligible voters are under the impression that when they file a change of address form with the U.S. Postal Service, their voter registration information automatically updates. And, yes, plenty of dead people have stayed registered. All these flaws risk undermining election integrity.

While we deposit checks on our iPhones and push a button to start our cars, many states and localities still rely on piles of paper records to maintain their voting lists. Civil servants who perform data entry from paper-based applications must interpret citizens’ chicken scratch handwriting. Typos are common. And today’s system poorly reflects today’s hypermobile society. More than 26 million voting-age Americans move each year, and because of residency requirements, many of them fall off the rolls, even if they move within the same state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These glitches are a chief cause of polling place confusion and delay—which lead to long lines on Election Day. In all, according to the definitive study by Cal Tech and MIT, some 3 million eligible citizens were unable to vote in 2008 because of registration problems. Many took time from their families or jobs, only to learn they were nowhere to be found in the voter rolls. The problems aren't going away: The 2012 election saw a 40 percent jump in the number of in-person voters who experienced registration problems.

Other democracies do it better than we do. In 2009, the Brennan Center studied voting systems in 16 democratic countries. The United States was one of only four that put the responsibility for registering solely on the voter. Great Britain, Canada, Germany, France all boast registration rates above 90 percent. Ours were as much as 30 percent lower. That's one kind of American exceptionalism we don't want to boast about.

Tinkering won't suffice. It's time to modernize the way we run elections, and bring them into the 21st century. That's where a system of universal, automatic registration would come in.

So how would Clinton's proposal work? From now on, the government rather than the voter would be responsible for making sure all eligible citizens are registered to vote and that rolls are accurate and complete. Citizens would register at 18 and stay on the rolls for their entire lives. All would be given the chance to opt out; nobody would be registered against their will.

Clinton has not released details of her plan, so we don't know for sure what she'd enact, but there are several innovative reforms that could achieve complete and accurate voting logs through collaboration between various government agencies. Universities, for example, could automatically register 18 year olds, Medicare could do the same for seniors. And the U.S. Postal Service could let the voter registration agency know when someone has moved.

Some states are ahead of the curve. Ever since the Brennan Center published its proposal for Voter Registration Modernization in 2007, a package that included permanent and portable registration, at least two dozen states have implemented voter registration reforms—moving to online registration, for example. High school "pre-registration" programs, in which young people register as future voters and are automatically signed up when they turn 18, are already in place in at least 10 states.

The biggest breakthrough on this front—and one that Clinton mentioned in her speech—came in March in Oregon, when Gov. Kate Brown signed a law that automatically registered to vote anyone 18 and up who obtained a driver's license (unless that person chose to opt out). The move is likely to add at least 300,000 voters to the rolls right away, and could end up giving Oregon the highest registration rate in the country. Other states could expand on the model, moving beyond the DMV. When someone receives Social Security benefits, pays state taxes or applies for disability benefits, her information could be passed along for registration or updates to an existing record.

States should keep pressing forward with initiatives like these on their own. But, as Clinton suggested, there needs to be one national standard—a mandate to ensure that all eligible voters are registered no matter where they live. A comparable proposal from Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand and Rep. John Lewis would set core federal standards while giving some flexibility to states. In 2002, the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) took such an approach. It required states to move to electronic voting, and provided federal funds to help them do it. This would be a similar technological upgrade—voting 2.0—this time applied to registration.

What are the risks? Some worry non-citizens would inadvertently find themselves registered, even voting, without realizing they cannot—putting them at risk of deportation. So it's hugely important to make sure that the lists omit non-citizens.

Others might worry about cost. So far, the move to digital records has proved very cost efficient in states that have tried it. Every so often, someone will grumble that this plan would—somehow—open the way to fraud. But that rationale quickly crumbles. After all, digital government lists, checked and rechecked, are likely to be more accurate than the names submitted by voter registration groups or private citizens. For those really worried about "Mickey Mouse" registering to vote, don't worry—he's not on the government list, even in Orlando (where he lives).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In fact, automatic voter registration gives both left and right what they demand. It enfranchises more people. And it protects better against fraud. The bipartisan Presidential Commission on Election Administration, co-chaired by Mitt Romney's top attorney and Obama's counsel, has endorsed key registration reforms.

The biggest reason for opposition to a proposal like Clinton's, if unstated, is the notion that maybe we don't really want everyone to be able to vote. But we all know that idea runs afoul of our most fundamental core precepts. Thomas Jefferson, in the Declaration of Independence, wrote that government is legitimate only if it rests on the "consent of the governed." That consent becomes muddied by missing data, illegible lists and long lines of voters. Last year, turnout fell to its lowest level in seven decades.

One leading candidate has already spoken up. As 2016 approaches, let's hope that all candidates from both parties will tell us what they would do to improve our democracy.

Hillary digital push highlights organizing before NYC rally // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 10, 2015

Days before Hillary Clinton will take the stage on New York City's Roosevelt Island to headline her presidential campaign's first full-scale rally, her political team is ratcheting up an effort to swing the spotlight away from the candidate, framing the first two months of Clinton's candidacy as an organizational victory beyond just the early-voting states she has visited so far.

The former secretary of state has faced no shortage of scrutiny during the 'ramp-up' phase of her presidential effort — a two-month period during which she has focused on small round tables and political meetings rather than open speeches or traditional events, often facing charges of running a distant campaign. But Wednesday will see a concerted online effort to highlight the inroads made by volunteers and organizers working on her behalf.

A memo from the campaign's top organizing official, a series of images from volunteer meetings across the country, and a handful of maps and hand-picked supporter quotes will pepper Clinton's online presence.

The note from Director of State Campaigns and Political Engagement Marlon Marshall points to the fact that the Clinton camp has hired 50 organizers in the early-voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, and has brought on 51 more staffers in the other states, Washington, D.C., Puerto Rico and the territories. It also notes that the campaign — which frequently says it is taking the Democratic primary seriously despite Clinton's commanding lead in national polls, and in this kind of organizing — has opened 15 offices between the four early states, and that it has held nearly 4,000 one-on-one meetings with early-state voters.

The effort comes at a delicate moment for the Clinton camp, as it transitions from a relatively quiet period for the candidate to a more public phase, while Bernie Sanders emerges as her primary liberal antagonist. The front-runner has seen her poll numbers slip slightly while she continues to receive fire from Republicans and Democratic critics for not interacting more with voters or the press, and all eyes are on her Saturday rally, which will seek to energize her Democratic base after being pushed back by a few weeks.

After the speech she will quickly hit all four early-voting states, and will then start holding more public appearances at open events.

While Clinton has recently started to deliver more policy speeches, like her Houston address on voting rights last week, she has been primarily focused on gathering money across the country before the end of the fundraising quarter as part of her broader goal of raising $100 million by the end of 2015, a circumstance that factored into her campaign's decision to move the rally to mid-June after it was originally planned for May. Aides say the rally was moved to separate it from the onslaught of presidential announcements that came at the end of last month, but it now sits just two days before Jeb Bush's launch.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nonetheless, Wednesday's digital push is an effort to underscore the rapid construction of the campaign's organizing infrastructure, which in some ways mirrors the 50-state strategy made famous by former presidential candidate and Democratic National Committee chairman Howard Dean.

The Clinton campaign is similarly trying to bolster Democratic operations in states where the party has been decimated in recent years, in some cases holding meetings in states that have not voted for a Democratic president in decades. The campaign says it has held or scheduled 320 such get-togethers outside of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

And Marshall's memo notes that nearly 11,000 people have attended organizing meetings outside of the four early-voting states, on top of nearly 12,000 commitments to volunteer within the first four.

While the campaign had no formal infrastructure when it officially launched in April, it did have the benefit of being able to informally build off work done by the Ready For Hillary PAC that was active in the early-voting states during 2013 and 2014. In late May the campaign got access to the PAC's email list of roughly 4 million Clinton supporters.

J Street poll: Jewish Americans favor Hillary over Jeb // Politico // Nick Gass – June 10, 2015

American Jewish voters have a clear favorite between Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton and likely Republican candidate Jeb Bush, according to a new national survey.

According to a poll commissioned by the left-leaning J Street Group, Clinton beats Bush in a hypothetical matchup by a count of 68 percent to 30 percent, with 2 percent undecided.

The Democratic Party also fared well in the poll, with a 46 percent favorability rating, compared to 20 percent for the Republican Party.

Asked whether they would "favor or oppose an agreement that would ease some of" the economic sanctions on Iran in exchange for restrictions on its nuclear program without ending it and submit to greater international inspection standards, 59 percent said they would support such a deal, while 53 percent of all Americans responded that way to a similar CNN/ORC question in April.

At the same time, just 22 percent in the J Street poll said that they have heard "a great deal" of information about the agreement, compared to 45 percent who said "some," 25 percent who said "not much," and 9 percent who said "no information at all."

Republicans have repeatedly clashed with President Barack Obama over his administration's stance toward Israel, especially with regard to ongoing nuclear talks with Iran. The president, for his part, has said that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu puts his country's credibility at risk with shifting comments about a two-state solution with the Palestinians.

In 2012, Obama defeated Republican nominee Mitt Romney among Jewish Americans by 39 points, according to exit polls — down from a 57-point advantage over John McCain in 2008.

The J Street poll, conducted by the Democratic-leaning GBA Strategies, was conducted May 31-June 3 among 1,000 self-identified Jews in the United States. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Every wedding should have a Hillary Clinton Bible reading // Politico // Kate Glassman Bennett – June 11, 2015

You know you're tight with the boss when she attends your wedding, but it's a whole other level of closeness when she takes part in the ceremony. Such was the case this past weekend as Jake Sullivan, Hillary Clinton's steadfast foreign policy adviser, married Maggie Goodlander on Saturday at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut.

The Democratic presidential front-runner was on the program at the couple's evening wedding, reading from the Letter of St. Paul to the Romans, as the duo tied the knot at Battell Chapel on the Yale campus, where Goodlander attended law school and Sullivan has been teaching. (Clinton's was a bigger role than that of U.N. Ambassador Samantha Power, who gave a toast at the couple's barbecue rehearsal dinner the evening before, which was also attended by Bill Clinton.) Hillary Clinton, for her part, squeezed the wedding into a busy week of East Coast fundraisers that included stops in Greenwich, Rhode Island, Boston and D.C.

Clinton's gesture signals the devotion she has to Sullivan, who political watchers say may be poised to become the youngest national security adviser in history should she take the White House in 2016. Sullivan, 38, was one of Clinton's most trusted confidants when she served as secretary of state. Before starting his teaching post at Yale Law School last August, he was Vice President Joe Biden's national security adviser. Goodlander, 28, is no stranger to politics either, having worked as a national security and foreign affairs adviser to Sen. Joe Lieberman.

Wonky Washington CVs aside, Sullivan and Goodlander—who could not be reached for comment as they are reportedly unplugged on a Caribbean honeymoon—evidently hope to spend a portion of their married lives exploring destinations far away from our nation's capital. Aside from the standard Crate & Barrel stuff, Sullivan and Goodlander registered for wanderlust funding via Traveler's Joy, a website that collects cash from friends wishing to donate to an adventure kitty, in lieu of candlesticks and Cuisinarts. According to the couple's profile, "Maggie wants to travel to the front lines of freedom," and "Jake wants to visit the places that shaped the course of history (and also hit some of the obscure, out-of-the-way countries he missed while he was at the State Department).

Domestic Worker Groups Announce Alliance At Clinton Global Initiative Conference // HuffPo // Samantha Lachman – June 10, 2015

The growing social movement advocating for domestic workers and Care.com, which calls itself the world's largest online care marketplace, will announce a new partnership Wednesday afternoon at the Clinton Global Initiative America conference in Denver.

The collaboration, called the Fair Care Pledge, joins the website, the National Domestic Workers Alliance and Hand in Hand, a network of domestic employers. The alliance is an "exemplary approach to addressing critical domestic challenges," according to the Clinton initiative, an offshoot of the foundation founded by former President Bill Clinton in 2005. Clinton and his daughter, Chelsea Clinton, are serving as the conference hosts.

According to a press release on the announcement, Care.com will promote the pledge by inviting hundreds of thousands of its members to affirm that they will make an effort to be fair and respectful when they hire a provider to work in their home cleaning or caring for children or seniors. The pledge asks families to commit to fair pay, clear expectations and paid time off for their care providers.

"We believe that care jobs will be the jobs of the future. It's in all of our interest to ensure that the quality of these jobs reflects the value and importance of the work," Ai-jen Poo, director of the National Domestic Workers Alliance, said in a press release. "Fairness and quality care go hand-in-hand and we're thrilled to be able to work with Care.com to promote these values."

Poo has been a leading advocate for re-conceptualizing domestic work. The United States appears unprepared for an impending crisis as the "Baby Boomer" generation ages. Twenty-seven million Americans will need some form of long-term care by 2050.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“As a member of the ‘sandwich generation,’ I’ve relied on a slew of caregivers to help me juggle caretaking of my mother during her decline from Alzheimer's, caring for my two daughters and pursuing my legal career," Julie Kay, a Hand in Hand leader, said in the release. "While I’m so appreciative of the work these women do, many times I've asked myself whether I was doing right by them. The Fair Care Pledge provides me with guidance, information, and the assurance I’ve been looking for."

The domestic worker industry has traditionally been difficult to organize and advocate for, given the isolating nature of the work. Ninety-five percent of domestic workers are women, and nearly half are immigrants. Because domestic workers are excluded from many protections guaranteed by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act, many in the industry are paid below the minimum wage and are denied overtime, sick pay and vacation pay.

The Department of Labor released regulations in 2013 that would cover some home health care workers under those federal minimum wage and overtime compensation laws. But a lawsuit filed by home care companies has tied up those regulations.

Care.com members and pledge-takers will be able to display an online badge on their profile allowing care providers to know they're "fair employers," according to the press release.

“Just as care impacts families, enterprise, policy and government in various ways, so must all those groups be involved in the solution,” said Sheila Lirio Marcelo, the founder, chairwoman and CEO of Care.com. “One key to driving real change is the professionalization of the caregiver industry. We believe it’s critical to attract and retain skilled caregivers. Families who employ full-time domestic workers should pay fair and legal wages, and provide vacation, overtime, and other critical protections that every professional deserves.”

The groups' partnership comes as debates about gender and workplace standards are gaining increased scrutiny. Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, who is not at this year's CGI conference, has advocated for Democratic Party-backed legislation that would promote gender parity in pay. Clinton has also spoken about how the United States is one of just three countries to not require paid maternity leave for new parents.

Journalists Meet With Clinton Campaign Officials Over Access Concerns // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – June 10, 2015

Two top communications officials with Hillary Clinton’s presidential campaign met Monday in Washington with representatives from the traveling press corps to discuss journalists' frustrations over access.

The journalist-campaign détente followed a nearly two-hour meeting last week in which about 17 reporters covering the campaign, from outlets including The New York Times, The Washington Post and Politico, privately aired grievances.

As The Huffington Post reported last week, journalists expressed concerns over issues including not receiving enough advanced notice about public events, being kept too far from Clinton at campaign stops, and not being permitted inside to cover fundraisers. Journalists also have taken issue with the campaign reflexively providing information “on background,” or on a not-for-attribution basis, even when it may not appear particularly sensitive.

Clinton Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri and press secretary Brian Fallon represented the campaign at the meeting, which included three journalists: McClatchy’s Anita Kumar, The Washington Post’s Anne Gearan and Politico’s Gabriel Debenedetti.

In emails to The Huffington Post, Gearan and Kumar confirmed the meeting happened, but both declined to get into specifics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Our conversations are ongoing -- a work in progress -- so I don't feel comfortable sharing the details right now,” Kumar wrote.

Fallon declined to comment on behalf of the campaign.

The group appeared to make progress Monday on some issues. For instance, the campaign seemed amenable to providing more advance notice for events, perhaps a week ahead, according to a source familiar with the discussions who was not authorized to comment. Still, the two sides aren't completely on the same page. The campaign still expects to keep fundraisers closed to the press for now.

There was also talk during Monday's breakfast about eliminating background briefings like one that recently took place at the campaign’s Brooklyn headquarters. CNBC’s John Harwood, an attendee, later mocked the campaign's request that top officials not be named in reports or even quoted blindly. A later tour of the headquarters, he noted, was off the record.

On Friday, Palmieri and campaign manager Robby Mook will be speaking on the record at a Politico-sponsored function in Manhattan, a day before Clinton holds her first campaign rally on Roosevelt Island.

As Clinton ramps up her campaign this weekend, she's expected to begin engaging more with the press. Though Clinton has answered some questions at campaign events, she has still not given an interview during her two months as a presidential candidate. The campaign has yet to announce any scheduled interviews as Clinton heads in the coming weeks to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

New York's Forgotten Island Shrugs At Hillary Clinton's Big 2016 Debut // HuffPo // Scott Conroy – June 10, 2015

It’s easy to understand why Hillary Clinton is holding her first 2016 campaign rally at Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park on Saturday. The symbolism is about as subtle as a yellow-cab driver caught behind a slow-moving vehicle with the windows rolled down.

Her midday speech will take place in the city where her family’s multibillion-dollar Clinton Foundation is based in the state she represented in the Senate for eight years and at a park that honors one of the most famous speeches delivered by America’s most revered Democratic president.

"She has long been inspired by FDR’s belief that America is stronger when we summon the work and talents of all Americans,” said Clinton spokesperson Kristina Schake. “Her fight, like his, is to work to ensure that everyday Americans can achieve not just a sense of economic stability, but lasting prosperity."

Though the park's namesake will be a fundamental element of Clinton’s speech, less central to her unofficial campaign kickoff is Roosevelt Island itself -- a quirky sanctuary of inner-city suburbia, which bisects the East River between Manhattan and Queens.

To the people who live here, though, that’s not much of a surprise. This is a place that is used to getting overlooked.

A 2-mile by 800-foot sliver of land that is currently inhabited by about 14,000 people in a city of more than 8 million, Roosevelt Island remains a peaceful hamlet by New York City standards. It is perhaps best known for the aerial tramway that offers a mobile addition to the Upper East Side’s skyline and was featured in a memorable fight scene in the 2002 "Spider-Man" film.

By and large, in a city famous for its islands, this particular needle-shaped landmass -- which falls under the jurisdiction of Manhattan -- has long been largely anonymous outside (and sometimes inside) the city.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“When I was growing up and through high school, you’d tell kids, ‘I live on Roosevelt Island,’ and it was like, ‘Where?’” said Mike Babcock, whose family was one of the pioneering families to move to the island in 1975, when the first residential building opened. “And these were kids who lived in the city.”

But that undistinguished image has been changing quickly.

Over the last couple of decades, Roosevelt Island has experienced a demographic evolution and construction explosion that has left it a more diverse and heavily urbanized place than it was decades ago -- a lot like the American electorate that the Clinton campaign believes will propel her to the White House.

“On the tram, you used to pretty much know everyone by sight,” said Lillian Kirkman, who has lived on Roosevelt Island since 1982. “Now it’s pretty much like riding the subway.”

It’s possible to traverse Roosevelt Island on foot in under a minute, but this is no longer a parochial place.

Take a stroll down Main Street, and it can feel like you’re walking the halls of the United Nations just across the river, as more than 40 percent of the population here was born in a different country.

The modern incarnation of Roosevelt Island was founded as a place where small-town charm could be found within spitting distance of the most exciting city on earth, but its enduring legacy has long been that of a place in constant transition.

Back in the 19th century when it was known as Blackwell’s Island, it was home to a prison, the nation’s first hospital for treating smallpox sufferers, and the New York City Lunatic Asylum where investigative reporter Nelly Bly faked insanity and later reported in the New York World her groundbreaking investigation of the facility’s wretched conditions.

After a long period of decline, the island was rechristened Roosevelt Island in 1973 in honor of the nation’s 32nd president, and a dramatic revitalization effort began that turned it into a thriving community intended primarily to offer subsidized housing to young families with a wide range of income levels.

An increasingly Democratic slice of a heavily Democratic city, it’s not just the Starbucks and Duane Reed, both of which opened a few years ago, that has signaled Roosevelt Island’s absorption into the modern urban aesthetic that has taken hold from coast to coast since Clinton’s husband’s presidency.

The Octagon -- a relatively imposing structure presiding over the northern end of the island -- originally served as the asylum’s main entrance. Now it is the entranceway for a pair of solar panel and fuel cell-equipped high-rise apartment buildings.

And in 2011, then-Mayor Michael Bloomberg announced that Roosevelt Island would be the site of a more than $2 billion science graduate school for Cornell University -- likely the single most transformational development in the island’s recent history. The “Four Freedoms” Park, where Clinton will speak on Saturday, opened the year after that.

Still, unlike just about every other corner of New York, even as it has changed rapidly, Roosevelt Island has resisted some of the allures of its neighboring localities. Here, $16 cocktails and ironic handlebar mustaches remain as scarce as they are common to the Instagram-saturated streets not far from the Clinton campaign’s Brooklyn Heights headquarters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You will, however, find some of the same generally unimpressed attitudes that prevail in the hipper parts of town.

“We’ve had lots of local politicians -- senators and congressmen -- no one like Hillary,” said Judy Berdy, president of the Roosevelt Island Historical Society and a lifelong resident. “But I just shrug. It’s part of living in New York. You get used to it.”

Just four days before the big rally, there were few signs that anything particularly special was on the horizon, as residents prepared for Saturday’s Roosevelt Island Day -- an annual, family-friendly event that will take place concurrently with the Clinton rally.

At Piccolo Trattoria on Main Street on Tuesday, a sparse lunchtime crowd ordered pizza slices and deli sandwiches, as employees mopped the floor and took some run-of-the-mill verbal abuse from one woman, who wasn’t especially impressed by the yellow sign that warned her to watch her step.

“Seriously, it’s very slippery in here,” she said. “If I fall, you’re screwed!”

After Jesus Alvarez, 19, took the woman’s order from behind the counter, a reporter approached to ask what he thought about Hillary Clinton coming to the neighborhood.

Alvarez, who has been working at Roosevelt Island’s lone pizza slice joint for about a year, offered a perplexed look along with a reminder that for the vast majority of Americans, the 2016 election remains far from the forefront of their minds.

“There’s a rally here?” he asked. “I hadn’t heard about it.”

The selective liberalism of Hillary Clinton // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 10, 2015

There's a term for the way Hillary Clinton has handled policy in the early stages of her campaign: Clintonian.

That is, on the issues that most divide the Democratic base from its centrist wing, she refuses to box herself into a position. She'd rather wait to see how things play out — a tendency that reinforces the often asserted (but sometimes unfair) criticism that she doesn’t have core convictions.

1. She’s thrilled that fast-food workers are fighting for a $15 minimum wage, but she won’t say whether she’ll fight for it — or even whether she thinks that's the right level.

2. She’s decidedly undecided on the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal, even though she called it "the gold standard in trade agreements" when she was secretary of state.

3. And her campaign has completely dodged the question of whether she thinks her husband’s welfare reform law was the right policy.

It's true that Clinton has rolled out a string of positions that please constituencies on the left, from support for

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LGBT rights and voting rights to repudiating the results of her husband's 1994 anti-crime law and vowing to enhance President Obama's executive action on immigration. These are important issues, perhaps more important than the exact level of a wage increase that surely won't be $15 an hour as long as Republicans control either the House or 41 seats in the Senate. But Clinton has been very selective about how she's courted her party's progressive base, speaking as much to identity politics as to actual policy. On some of the more controversial policy questions, she's taking a pass.

As Ruth Marcus put it in the Washington Post Wednesday morning, "The left-leaning positions she isn't taking are as significant as the ones she has endorsed."

In keeping her powder dry, she is reminding voters — Democrats, Republicans, and independents — that it's hard to pin down a Clinton. Her husband was famous for practicing political "triangulation," letting others stake out their positions and then standing in the middle. Clinton's unwillingness to commit to either side on the minimum wage, trade, and welfare reform (Jeb Bush is calling for a new round of it) leaves everyone wondering what she really believes on those issues. That feeds an existing narrative that she's less than trustworthy. And that's not good for Clinton.

Clinton's honesty problem

Most adults say the label "honest and trustworthy" doesn't apply to her.

Nearly two-thirds of men think Clinton isn't trustworthy, compared with about half of women.

The CNN/ORC poll released earlier this month is one in a series that show Americans have greater faith in her ability to lead than in her willingness to tell the truth. The problem is particularly acute with men and whites — two subcategories that lean more Republican and that have been problematic for Clinton.

The silver lining: almost three-fifths of nonwhite adults do believe she's honest and trustworthy, and about half of women say the same. The positions she's taken on voting rights, immigration, and ending the "era of mass incarceration" should bolster those numbers. She still leads all Republican challengers in head-to-head matchups.

But if voters don't trust what Clinton says, it will be harder for her to persuade them to vote for her. Pew polling suggests honesty is an essential leadership trait.

The $15 head fake

Clinton's main rivals in the Democratic field, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, have both taken firm stands in favor of a $15-an-hour minimum wage. Clinton gave a head fake this weekend.

Clinton seemed to be taking a stand on Sunday when she called in to a fast-food workers convention to say she stood behind them in their push for a $15-per-hour wage floor. The Washington Post noted that Clinton used language mirroring labor's campaign for the higher pay standard and ran a headline suggesting she was endorsing the $15 level. At first, her aides declined to say whether she meant that she backs a $15 minimum wage. And then, after a couple of days, they still declined to say.

One campaign spokesperson said Tuesday night that Clinton will eventually have a position.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"As Hillary Clinton expressed this weekend, she strongly supports workers in the fast-food industry in cities across the country mobilizing to fight for a living wage. In the coming weeks, she will lay out her specific plans for increasing wages."

That leaves open the question of whether she might back something other than the most often cited figures, $15 an hour and $10.10 an hour. It's a little reminiscent of the scene from There's Something About Mary that revolves around one-upsmanship on whether six-, seven- or eight-minute abs is the most effective workout routine.

O'Malley spokesperson Haley Morris made the point that her boss raised the wage floor in his state (to $8.25 an hour).

"We don't know where Secretary Clinton stands on the minimum wage, but Governor O'Malley's stance couldn't be clearer: he supports efforts to raise it to $15 an hour. This is another issue where he doesn't just talk -- he's gotten things done. Last year, Maryland was just the second state to raise its minimum wage."

Trading places

For years, it would have been hard to find a more ardent advocate for a Pacific Rim trade deal than Clinton. As Obama's secretary of state, she was a leader of the US "pivot" to Asia, which was later recoined a "rebalancing." She wrote about the benefits of the Trans-Pacific Partnership and spoke publicly about them. As White House Communications Director and former State Department spokesperson Jen Psaki put it on MSNBC this week, Clinton spent a "great deal of time" extolling the virtues of the deal when she was a member of the administration.

And then, in April, with pressure bearing down on Democrats to take a position, Clinton backpedaled — through a spokesman.

"Hillary Clinton believes that any new trade measure has to pass two tests: first, it should put us in a position to protect American workers, raise wages, and create more good jobs at home," Nick Merrill said in a statement. "Second, it must also strengthen our national security. We should be willing to walk away from any outcome that falls short of these tests. The goal is greater prosperity and security for American families, not trade for trade's sake."

Senior aides have since said that she doesn't need to take a position until the deal is finalized and the fine print can be analyzed. If she's lucky, the House will reject Trade Promotion Authority for Obama this week, mooting TPP. But as it stands, the vast majority of House Democrats — and party activists — oppose the deal. If Clinton supports it, she'll disappoint them and give more fuel to Sanders and O'Malley, both of whom oppose the pact. If she opposes it, she'll have flip-flopped and turned her back on Obama.

Welfare reform

There's also distance between Clinton and her rivals on welfare reform.

When she said she wanted to end the "era of mass incarceration" — which was spurred by Bill Clinton's anti-crime law — the next logical question was whether she would seek to reverse another major social policy law from his presidency: welfare reform. As first lady, she had praised it.

It became a more pressing matter when Bush, in the wake of violence in Baltimore, called for new welfare reforms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, Clinton and her aides have refused to address repeated questions about where she stands with regard to the 1990s law, which largely addressed government benefits and work requirements for women. As with other issues, they say she'll have more policy to detail over the summer.

Sanders voted against the 1996 welfare reform law, which split Democrats almost evenly.

In 2000, O'Malley signed a document expressing appreciation for the Clinton law but calling on government to "finish the job" by creating more employment opportunities for people moving off of government assistance.

On this, too, Democrats are anxious to hear what Clinton thinks in this presidential run.

Time to choose

It's tempting to think that Clinton has plenty of time because it's early in the presidential election cycle or because her Democratic rivals probably don't have what it takes to beat her in a primary. But by sidestepping important policy questions, she's giving oxygen to doubts about her sincerity. That's a character question that should be familiar to Clinton fans who watched Barack Obama turn honesty into a weapon against her in 2008, and it's one that crosses party lines.

Ultimately, Clinton is going to have to choose a side on these issues. The longer she takes, the more it looks like she's afraid of commitment.

Bill Clinton Says He'll Nix Paid Speeches If Hillary Wins // NBC News // Andrea Mitchell and Cassandra Vinograd – June 11, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton said he will most likely stop giving paid speeches if his wife Hillary is elected president.

The Clintons have been dogged by questions about potential conflicts of interest around their foundation and the amounts they've earned from high-profile speaking engagements.

When asked by Bloomberg Television whether he would continue to give paid speeches if Hillary Clinton is elected president, Bill Clinton replied: "I don't think so."

"I will still give speeches though on the subjects I'm interested in," he added. "I've really enjoyed those things."

Clinton said "it would be a very good thing for America" if his wife Hillary Clinton wins the presidency.

